If your excellency attends for a moment to the charge of hostilities committed by Indians inhabiting this province on citizens of the United States in consequence, as is alleged, of the hostile feelings suggested and fomented by the Spaniards, it will be no difficult matter to repel it, and refute an insinuation so injurious to the Spanish character. Truth needs no circumlocution to prove it; in communicating, therefore, evidence on this point, it will suffice to lay before you my correspondence with Boleck, a Seminole chief, making part of the enclosed documents, for the purpose of enjoining on him a strict observance of peace, good order, and friendship with the people of the United States. This will demonstrate to them and to the world that the Government and inhabitants of this province, so far from being instigators of hostility and discord, have performed the office of friends and peace-makers, and that the political conduct of the superior officers in East Florida has been founded on the principles of reason, justice, and friendship. Influenced by the sentiments of honor and good faith which have ever characterized the Spanish nation, I was solely animated by them when I invited the chief Boleck to come and see me, which he did. I then recommended to him most earnestly to refuse any retreat or asylum within his territory to the fugitive slaves from the United States, and offered to act as a mediator in his differences, if he had any. To which he replied, that he had no other than those connected with his endeavors to preserve his cattle, which were daily stolen from him by the Americans, who, besides, were endeavoring to dislodge him from his territories.

I leave it to the discernment and decision of politicians to pronounce whether, in the course of the events alluded to, the most unimpeachable neutrality and good faith have not been observed by the Government of this province. The proofs referred to in support of this are so clear and convincing that I refrain from trespassing further on you, satisfied as I am that your accurate judgment will give the proper direction to the affair in question.

God preserve you many years.

SIR: I have received yours of the 8th instant, informing me of the arrival of the King's schooner the Empezinada; also of the appearance off the bar of seven frigates, three brigs, and two schooners, supposed to be English. In reply to the first part of your letter, I have to request that you will afford the commander of the Empezinada all the facilities in your power for the repair of his vessel; and to the second, that, as His Majesty has recommended to me the observance of the strictest neutrality, you will firmly maintain it in a becoming manner, by not permitting any foreign troops to land within the Spanish territory, or affording any aid or assistance directly or indirectly, the said troops being at war with the United States. You will not fail to give me immediate advice of whatever may occur.

I further inform you that, as circumstances have rendered it necessary to prohibit the export of provisions from the province, you will not permit any to be taken off, and on this ground, as well as that of necessity, you will, in the most civil manner, decline offering or affording any supplies to the English, of provisions, arms, warlike stores, or anything else to be hostilely employed against the United States, or any aid or assistance for their remaining in their present position, pointing out to them, in the most attentive and becoming way, the necessity we are under of observing the strictest neutrality, recommended to us by our Court on the most serious responsibility; and that, in consequence, and to avoid the compromise of this province, it would be desirable they should cease their visits and communications with the

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: A complaint has been laid before me by Robert Harding, a citizen of the United States of America, stating the capture, by His Britannic Majesty's forces under your command, of his boat, called the Maria Teresa, then a, anchor within the Spanish waters of Bell's river, at the spot known by the name of Roun's Bluff, and claiming the protection of the Spanish Government, to which he conceives himself entitled, both by the law of nations and the sixth article of the treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, concluded between His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain and the United States of America, at San Lorenzo el Real, on the 27th of October, 1795, in order that a due inquiry may be made of the facts, to obtain the restoration of said boat. You will readily admit the propriety there is in my attending to this claim, and the importance attached to the maintenance of national jurisdiction and the faithful observance of treaties. This affair, being important, cannot be viewed with indifference, as silence would give room for conjectures unfavorable to the honor of the Spanish character, and to the good faith with which it observes treaties of compacts. The English nation, being in strict alliance and amity with Spain, cannot fail to disapprove such proceedings, which have a tendency to affect their friendship and that favor and protection which are justly due to so close a union. I trust, therefore, that your excellency, penetrated with the sentiments inseparable from these unshaken principles, will have the goodness to take this claim into consideration; and, relying on the mutual good understanding subsisting between Spain and England, I venture to request you will be pleased to give orders for the restoration of the above-mentioned vessel, as I have a satisfaction in reflecting that your well-known zeal and reputation will be a sure pledge of your respect for the honor of the Spanish nation, which reposes full confidence in the fidelity of its friends and allies.

I request you to receive the assurances of the high consideration with which I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

HEADQUARTERS, CUMBERLAND ISLAND,

February 13, 1815.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 4th instant, soliciting, on the grounds therein stated, the restoration of the Maria Teresa, a vessel belonging to Robert Harding, a citizen of the United States, captured by the force under my command. This affair took place before my arrival; and His Majesty's officers who made the capture affirm that the vessel was navigating the waters of the St. Mary's river, in violation of the blockade, at the moment they gave chase to her. They, consequently, thought themselves justified in capturing her; and it is, therefore, necessary she should be sent to some port where an admiralty court is established for the decision of such cases. In this view of the case, the impartial justice administered in the courts of His Britannic Majesty, as is well known to you, forbids any apprehension that this incident can interrupt the friendship and good understanding happily subsisting between the two Governments. It may, however, not be superfluous to call your attention to the inconsistency of such a claim on behalf of a citizen of the United States by the Spanish nation, and particularly through the medium of your excellency, when we reflect that the Americans have, in a hostile manner, possessed themselves of a considerable portion of the territory under your immediate command; and, further, that a number of them, styled patriots, were, at the very moment of the occurrence complained of, in possession of the territory surrounding the spot you allude to, (Rose's Bluff.) And although the Government of the United States, after having ordered Fernandina and part of East Florida to be occupied by their troops for a year, has thought fit to disclaim any authority for the invasion of the Spanish territory, you cannot be ignorant that the officer who co-operated with the gunboats in the hostile movements of the said Americans, styled patriots, still retained the command of that flotilla, which it is not presumable would have been permitted had he not acted conformably to his orders. A late occurrence at Pensacola, in West Florida, followed by the destruction of Fort Barancas, is an additional proof how little the Americans are disposed to respect the neutrality of Spain, except in cases like the present, in which they are likely to gain something. I beg your excellency, however, to be persuaded that, although I consider the foregoing remarks as indispensable, since they prove the slender foundation these people have to claim the protection of a neutrality which they have so recently and so extensively violated, yet it is my anxious wish to respect as sacred and inviolable not only the neutrality of the province under your government, but also all the rights you may claim of me in behalf of the Spanish nation, when they do not interfere with my duty to my own.

I beg leave to assure your excellency of the high consideration and respect with which I have the honor to be, your excellency's faithful and obedient servant,

PROTEST.

FERNANDINA, Amelia Island, E. F.

This third day of April, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, appeared before Don Jose Pacot, captain of the regiment of Cuba infantry, military and civil commandant and deputy of the royal treasury (hacienda) at said place, John Brown, late captain of the American ship Sabine, captured on the 30th of January by the British forces, who declared his wish to enter his protest against said capture, noted at this command, on the 23d of the same month, for the like cause, and in presence of the witnesses Don Jose Maria Ugarte, an inhabitant of this province, and Juan de Rosello, corporal of infantry, appointed to act in the want of a notary public, having first declared his acceptance and taken oath in due form, through the medium of Don Jorge Clark, appointed interpreter, on the Holy Bible, according to the Protestant faith, of which he is a member, to speak the truth, and nothing but the truth, deposes: That the said ship Sabine, formerly the Countess of Harcourt, was captured in the late war by the United States privateer schooner Sabine, and carried into St. Marys, in Georgia, where she was tried before the Court of Admiralty for the State of Georgia, and condemned as good prize, put up at public sale the 5th October, 1814, and bought by Messrs. Diego Williams, Juan Gooding, and Juan Donnell, merchants of Baltimore, as duly appears by the documents to be referred to. That the said purchasers of the prize, being apprehensive that she would be attacked by the British force, as actually happened, took measures to shelter, and did shelter, her within the Spanish territory, by making her fast in a creek connected with the Spanish river, Santa Maria la Chica, (Little St. Marys) in the firm belief that, under the protection of a neutral Power in amity both with Great Britain and the United States, she was not exposed to attack or injury, from the respect it was thought would be observed to her while within the Spanish limits. She was carried four miles up said creek, and made fast to the trees. In this situation she was boarded by a British force, detached by Admiral George Cockburn, who was in possession of the country towards St. Marys, with his headquarters at Cumberland Island. They carried off by force part of the property on board said ship, and the next day took full possession of her, and carried her off from the Spanish territory to Cumberland Island, where she had a cargo of negroes put on board of her, and was sent, as deponent was informed, to a British port, supposed to be Bermuda, for adjudication as prize of war; and as neither the deponent nor any one on board committed any act whatever that could serve as a motive for the proceedings of the captors in violation of the justice of Spain, and her dignity and absolute neutrality towards both nations, nor made the smallest resistance to the seizure, as is public and notorious, he therefore protests, once, twice, thrice, and as often as may be necessary, both on behalf of himself and of all those interested in the said ship, against the proceedings of the said Admiral Cockburn, as well as against all others of whom he may and ought of right to claim for the damages and losses sustained by this illegal seizure, and also against the violation of the neutrality of the province of East Florida, to the injury of the parties interested in the said prize before the seizure, declaring, as he now does, that he refers to the note of this protest, made on the 23d of January, which was made with all possible expedition at this command. All which he declares and confirms upon the oath he has taken; and having required this original document to take his recourse therewith, I have granted him complete and ample testimony of the same, and signed it, together with the said commander and interpreter, to which we witnesses present bear testimony.

MEMORIAL.

May it please your Excellency:

Mr. John Brown, late captain of the American ship Sabine, formerly the Countess of Harcourt, with all due respect submits: That the said vessel being within the shelter and refuge of a creek of the river called Santa Maria la Chica, (Little St. Marys,) within the limits of the dominions of Spain, was attacked and seized on by the forces of His Britannic Majesty, under the command of Admiral George Cockburn, in the mode and manner duly set forth in the annexed protest, made and entered before the military and civil commander of the town of Fernandina, and attested by proper witnesses, in the want of a public notary. The said river being within the limits of the dominions of His Catholic Majesty, and the vessel seized on when that Power was in a state of peace and amity both with His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, the offence committed by this outrageous act is evident, as well as the violation of the neutral territory, to which a sacred respect was due, and of those universal laws which are maintained and acknowledged by all independent States and Princes. It being the duty of this memorialist to claim of your excellency a demand of the restoration of said vessel, in virtue of the protection afforded to him by the stipulation contained in the sixth article of the treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, concluded between His Majesty the King of Spain and the United States of America, at San Lorenzo el Real, October 27, 1795, expressly applicable to cases of this nature. He, therefore, entreats your excellency to be pleased to cause the necessary orders to be issued, and therewith to employ all due efforts and energy, claiming the recovery and restoration of the said vessel, and addressing the same to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty of Great Britain, the judges of the several courts of admiralty or vice-admiralty, and all civil and military officers and functionaries authorized to take cognizance of such matters, to the end that, on the exhibition of such proofs as may be produced and appear satisfactory and competent to substantiate the contents of the afore-mentioned protest, the said ship may be restored, together with everything belonging to her at the time of her capture. All which is hoped from your justice.

OPINION.

May I, please your Excellency:

This petition is the third that has been presented in this superior tribunal, of like nature to that submitted by Mr. John Brown. In the two former cases, a letter was addressed to the English Admiral then at Cumberland Island, in which it was requested, with all the politeness and respect due to the existing alliance, to be pleased to cause to be restored to their respective owners the vessels claimed by each one, on the ground of their having been captured in our waters, it being essentially important to extend to them when so situated, the protection of our Government, in conformity to the sixth article of the treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, concluded between our Court and the United States on the 27th of October, 1795, which runs thus: [Here follow the words of the article.] But having been informed extrajudicially, not only that the vessels so captured within the Spanish waters have not been restored, but that the interposition of our Government has been received with indifference, it is expedient that the claim should be made with all the energy required by the case, and the honor of the nation asserted, by causing due respect to be paid to the inviolable rights of neutrality. By a reference to the foregoing article, it is abundantly proved that the citizens of the United States are entitled to the protection of our Government while within the Spanish territory, and, consequently, to resort to it in claiming for them the restitution of such property as may have been taken from them within the limits of our jurisdiction; it is therefore evident and incontrovertible that, as the said treaty remains in full force, it is indispensable to maintain and observe its whole tenor and stipulations.

But setting aside so decisive an authority in support of the protection due to a friendly Power so circumstanced, it is sufficient to view the case as connected with the principles of the laws of nations—a subject so thoroughly discussed by all politicians, that no one possessing any ideas upon international law dissents from the general opinion of all the civilians as to the degree of aid to be afforded to those who take shelter in the ports or within the limits of a friendly Power; and, according to the opinion of a native of the Kingdom, any vessel taking shelter under the cannon of a neutral port ought to be defended by it, by keeping the pursuers at the distance of cannon shot. And would it not be a stain on the character of our nation to pretend to misunderstand the fact of a friendly vessel being taken out of the Spanish waters, although only made fast to the trees of our territory, by a force belonging to a Power which, although our ally, was, however, then at war with the other? Such an indifference would give rise to all manner of conjectures, which every one would interpret as they pleased, but all tending to throw discredit on our national character. Doubts, at least, would be entertained of our good faith in observing our compacts, which delicate point is the distinguishing principle that has ever characterized the Spanish name; and it is well known how important it is for a nation faithfully to observe her treaties. The sixth article, above referred to, is so clear and explicit as to leave no room for the slightest misinterpretation; and if it were now to give it a sense different from that expressed in it, the mischievous consequences would be easily seen.

The general opinion of all political writers is, that, by a violation of a single article of a treaty, it is doubtful whether the whole ought not to be considered as violated. This point has been sufficiently discussed by all the civilians. It can-

ST. AUGUSTINE, December 30, 1814.

SIR: At the time you stated to me verbally the motives of your coming to this place, I had the honor to represent to you, in like manner, the orders I had received from my Government to observe the strictest neutrality; that I could not, therefore, permit any communication with the English vessels which might appear off the bar; that I would give you every facility for a passage to Providence; that you would be pleased to discharge the escort of the people of color, which, under an erroneous idea of this province being invaded, you had obtained from the Seminoles as a safeguard on your journey; all which I repeat to you officially for your information and government; and I now add that, by the treaty of peace of 1763, both the Floridas were ceded to Spain by Great Britain, with the same rights therein as possessed by the latter; and that by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso with the United States of America in 1796, the northern boundaries of those provinces were defined, namely, by a line commencing at the east bank of the Mississippi, at the thirty-first degree of latitude, and running thence to the river Chatahoochee, and from the junction of that river and the Flint, by a right line, to the head of the St. Mary's, in the State of Georgia; therefore, all the Indians inhabiting the country to the south of said line are under the dominion and protection of the Spanish nation; and such of them as inhabit eastward of the river Appalachee are included within the limits of the eastern province, under my government; in consequence of which, I have to inform you that any disembarkation of troops within those limits, or expedition directed towards this province for the purpose of attacking the United States, will be considered as a rupture on the part of Great Britain; and that in such case I shall conduct myself as becomes my duty.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two notes of this date. In reply to the former, permit me to assure you that I have never used any endeavors to induce the colored people (los morenos) of the province to desert; on the contrary, my instructions, since I have been in the Indian territory, have been to give every aid (as far as requisite) to the cause of our good and faithful ally, the Spanish nation; I am only authorized, in case any deserters should come in from the United States of America, to protect and recruit them for the service of His Britannic Majesty, agreeably to the proclamation of Vice Admiral Sir Alexander Cochrane; copy of which I enclose for your information. With respect to the few Indian and colored people (morenos) who attended me as an escort, as their appearance seems to have produced some sensation among the inhabitants, from an uneasiness about their slaves, I have given them orders to withdraw immediately to a greater distance from their neighborhood, and, if possible, I will leave this place in the evening. I should not have brought this small escort with me if I had not been informed by the Seminole chief Bowlegs that he had certain intelligence that a party of mounted banditti were committing hostilities against the Spanish authorities in this neighborhood. I am greatly obliged by the honor you do me by acquainting me with the boundaries of the territory which Spain considers as hers, which I shall communicate to my commanding officer.

DEAR FRIEND: I received your letter dated in May, and I am much gratified by the favorable opinion you are pleased to entertain of me. I did not expect to see the English here, but on their arrival they gave us good advice, which was to molest no one, and when they were gone to look on the Spaniards as our friends, since they and the Spaniards were as one. When we were at war with the Americans, all the Indians did us injury; I therefore remain quiet till I see what they will do. You are still calling for me, but it is not in my power to go; every day there are talks in the nation, and I cannot leave them. This is very agreeable to me, as it has procured me the satisfaction of proving the friendship I have for you, which would never allow me to leave unanswered the letters which you say you have written me, if I had received them. My wish that we should see each other arises solely from the pleasure I should have in knowing you; and if your sentiments are the same, when your duties permit, I shall take that opportunity of giving you my opinion as to the runaway negroes who have taken refuge in your territory—an affair which cannot fail to produce disagreeable consequences with the American nation, as I have seen that they lately destroyed the establishment at Appalachicola, as I have been informed by several of your warriors, and I am sorry to observe that some of them have fallen there. It gives me pleasure to send you some paper, and to assure you of my sincere friendship and good wishes.

NOVEMBER 18, 1816.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you, and I hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and my people. My warriors and others who go to St. Augustine return with false reports tending to harass and disturb my people, and prevent them attending to their usual avocations. At one time, the Americans, supported by a force of three thousand men, and such of our brethren as they have compelled to join them, are running lines far within our territory; at another, they are collecting a large force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns that may not join them. Now, sir, we know of no reason they can have for attacking an inoffensive and unoffending people, whose wish it is to inhabit their woods, without disturbing or being disturbed by any one. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since they made peace with our good father, King George; we have followed the orders of the officer of our father, who was among us, Colonel Edward Nicholls, and in nowise molested the Americans, though we daily see them encroaching on our lands, stealing our cattle, and murdering or carrying off our people. We were told by the same officer that, as allies of our father, we were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans, and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before the war; but, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are making daily encroachments, and forging treaties (which they pretend are concluded with our people) for cessions and grants of land which never were in existence, and the signatures to which are unknown to the chiefs of the Creek nation, who alone have a right to assign or transfer the common property. The want of a proper person among our people to acquaint us with these transactions is the cause of our long silence on them, and leads the world, as well as our friends, to think we are in league with the Americans.

The principal chiefs of the nation assembled lately at my town of Sawahna, and resolved to inform the Minister of King George at Washington of our grievances, and of the conduct and usurpation of the Americans, which was accordingly done, and copies sent to England. Until we have one or more persons among our people to watch over our rights and interest, we shall continue to be exposed to the same conduct on the part of the Americans, whose system appears to be the destruction of our peace and tranquility, and expelling us from our native land.

You desired that I would chase off those who steal my cattle, &c. Some of my people have lately driven away several Americans who were endeavoring to settle at Lachua, and I do not doubt they will represent that as an act of hostility, although you well know that Lachua is in the heart of my territory, and was, until the Americans killed my brother, our chief town. I return you my thanks for your letter,

FRIEND AND BROTHER BOLECK:

Your letter of the 18th November was delivered to me yesterday by one of your servants, in which you inform me of the receipt of mine of the 26th September last, and other circumstances which give you and your warriors uneasiness. I see with pain that the whole comes from the information of persons in whom you ought not to place the smallest confidence, it being their principle to employ such opportunities for the purpose of seducing you and your people from their daily labors. In consequence of this, and of what you tell me of your desire to keep up the best understanding and correspondence with me, and of your hope that the opportunities will not be wanting, let me give you such counsel as may be useful to you, your people, and warriors. I will do so from the sentiments of sincere friendship I bear towards you—fearful, however, that the sentiments of others who come into the territory under the appearance of friendship, but with bad intentions, may influence your minds, and obtain your confidence, by their flattering representations. It is ascertained here that two persons have lately presented themselves as commissioners of the English nation, who have carried off several runaway negroes, belonging to subjects of the King my master and your friend; among whom was one of Don Francisco Pellicer's, and another of Bunch's—both inhabitants of this province. This did not seem credible to me, as I could not suppose that so good a friend to our nation as you are could consent to such proceedings. But, in case they have really happened, you will be sensible of their great impropriety, and of the just grounds of complaint on the part of the persons so injured, who are desirous, as well as myself, of assuring you of the sincere good will and friendship we have for the Seminole tribe of Indians, of which you are the chief.

SIR: I have received official advice, through different channels, that the expedition of French adventurers which left Philadelphia towards the end of last year, with the apparent intention of going to Tombigbee, but in reality to Galveston, is now receiving, at the former place, a considerable number of recruits, and large supplies of military stores from the ports of New Orleans, Charleston, Savannah, and others within this Republic; from whence they proceed in small parties to Galveston, and thus elude the vigilance of the Government.

From the period at which (namely, on the 6th of September last) I announced to you the preparations for this expedition, referring for its unquestionable certainty to the plan communicated to this Government by the Minister of France, which offered the most indubitable proof that Joseph Bonaparte was at the head of it, with the rash project of being crowned King of Mexico, I have relied on your assurances to the same Ambassador, and which were forthwith communicated by him to me, that the most effectual measures had been taken by the Government to prevent its execution. But, perceiving that this expedition daily takes a greater consistence, and that the recruiting and supplies clandestinely sent from this Republic are not put a stop to, I can no longer refrain from again calling your attention, and, through you, that of the President, to the enormous abuse of the hospitality offered by this Republic, on the part of Joseph Bonaparte and his adherents, with a view to disturb the tranquillity of Europe, and especially that of the possessions of the King, my master.

I would have considered myself dispensed from the necessity of again pressing this subject on your attention, if it had appeared possible for me to restrain these armaments by the employment of judicial means; but, unfortunately, the act of Congress of the 20th April last for preserving neutrality with foreign nations, and others already in force, although highly judicious, are easily eluded; and although these practices are public and notorious throughout the whole Union, His Majesty's Consuls advise me that, through a deficiency of evidence, they cannot be retained by a regular application of the law.

Convinced, however, as I am, that nothing is more remote from the intention of the President than to tolerate hostile expeditions within the territories of the Republic, directed against Powers with which it is in a state of profound peace, I cannot for a moment doubt that his excellency will take into his most serious consideration what is due to the demand which I now make in the name of my Sovereign, that Joseph Bonaparte, the Generals Lallemant, and other Frenchmen now residing in this country, be compelled to keep themselves within the bounds prescribed by the hospitality and generosity with which they have been received, and prevented from continuing to organize expeditions for the purpose of invading the territory of His Catholic Majesty, and disturbing the peace enjoyed by his subjects.

I therefore hope that you will be pleased, sir, to inform me of the measures which may be taken on this subject, in order that, in communicating them to my Sovereign, His Majesty may see in them a confirmation of the amicable sentiments of this Republic towards his monarchy.

I renew to you the assurances of my respects, and pray God to preserve you many years.

BRISTOL, June 9, 1818.

SIR: At my passage through Baltimore, on my way to Philadelphia, it was represented to me by his Catholic Majesty's Consul for the State of Maryland that there were then in that port four pirates or privateers, if you please so to call them, namely, the "Independencia del Sud," Captain Grennolds; the "Pueyrredon," alias "Mangore," Captain Barnes; the "Republicano," Captain Chase; and the schooner "Alerta," Captain Chaytor. These pirates, denominated privateers or vessels of war of the pretended Government of Buenos Ayres, have entered the port of Baltimore for the purpose of dividing the spoil resulting from their depredations on Spanish commerce, and of refitting and arming to renew these excesses on the high seas. It is a matter of universal notoriety at Baltimore that three of the above-named vessels were fitted out there, and the fourth is a schooner captured by them from Spanish subjects. It is no less so that their commanders and the greater part of the crews are American citizens, and that there is scarcely a single individual belonging to Buenos Ayres to be found among them.

Whoever has read the so-called constitution of the provisional laws existing at Buenos Ayres, (for there is nothing there but what is provisional,) must know that no vessel of the rebels can sail under their flag unless the captain and one-half of the crew be natives of that country; and that no foreigner can be naturalized there till after five years' residence. I submit to your judgment, sir, whether on such grounds the vessels in question can be admitted to be Buenos Ayrean privateers, or whether the American captains and crews that man them, commissioned or not by that rebel Government, can be considered as citizens of that country; and whether, agreeably to the laws of nations and the existing treaty between His Majesty and this Republic, they can be viewed in any other light than as pirates; and if it be possible for you to conceal from your discernment that the captains and crews of these vessels have violated the laws of this Union in perpetrating these atrocities to the dishonor of the American name. I repeat that I submit it to your consideration to determine whether the prizes made by vessels under these circumstances ought not to be restored to their lawful owners, or that these persons ought to be indemnified by the United States, seeing that they have tolerated such armaments in violation of their laws, of the laws of nations, and of the existing treaty between Spain and this Republic.

I am aware, sir, that you will tell me that the courts are open to the recognizance of claims of this nature, and ready to apply the law to such

SIR: It is now some time since information has been circulated through the medium of the newspapers, and through private channels, of different incursions and acts of hostility committed within the territory of the Crown of Spain by divisions of the army under the command of General Jackson, destined, as it appeared, to pursue and chastise the Seminole Indians; but I believed until now that this information, although constantly repeated and augmented, doubtless proceeded from vague and unfounded rumors, as I could not persuade myself that such acts of violence and hostility could be committed by the United States against a friendly Power, and in the midst of the most profound peace. How was it possible to believe that, at the very moment of a negotiation for settling and terminating amicably all the pending differences between the two nations, and while Spain was exhibiting the most eminent and generous proofs of a good understanding, and the most faithful observance of all the duties of good neighborhood, the troops of the United States should invade the Spanish provinces, insult the commanders and officers of their garrisons, and forcibly seize on the military posts and places in those provinces? Notwithstanding this, the official advices I have just received from the Governor of West Florida, confirm what I had conceived to be impossible.

General Jackson and his officers have made demands on the Governor of that Spanish province in the most unbecoming and insulting tone; they have in different places violated the Spanish territory and its waters; they have committed enormous vexations, unexampled in history. With considerable force they fell upon the fort of St. Mark, and compelled the Spanish garrison to surrender prisoners of war; they took possession of that fortress, with all the artillery, warlike stores, and effects, without drawing up an inventory of the same, and have extended their military possession over the bay of St. Mark and the adjacent country. In speaking of the conduct of the American General and his officers, I confine myself to what relates to the act of hostility and violence committed within the territory of the Crown of Spain, to the violation of peace, and the forcible occupation of the aforesaid country and fort.

Under the pretext of making war against the Indians on complaints or motives which have neither been communicated to the Governor of those provinces, nor to the Captain General of the island of Cuba, who is also Governor of them, nor to any other Spanish officer or public functionary, the dominions of East Florida have likewise been invaded, and the Spanish territory entered as if it was an enemy's country; in fine, General Jackson has omitted nothing that characterizes a haughty conqueror but the circumstance of adding to these monstrous acts of hostility the contradictory expressions of peace and friendship with Spain.

I seize this occasion to renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Relations with Spain.

I therefore find myself under the necessity of protesting strongly and solemnly, as I now do, in the name of the King, my master, against the invasion of the Floridas, and against the taking possession of the fort and bay of St. Mark by the troops of this Republic; and I request you, sir, to lay before the President this my protest, in full confidence that his excellency will cause things in both the Floridas to be reinstated and placed in statu quo; the fort of St. Mark to be delivered up to the Spanish commandant, together with all the ordnance, warlike stores, and effects found in that fortress; and all damages and injuries caused in the Floridas by the officers and troops of this Union to be fully indemnified and compensated. In the meantime, I repeat this most solemn protest in the name of my Sovereign, all which I shall duly communicate to His Majesty in the discharge of my duty.

I trust, sir, that you will be pleased to acknowledge the receipt of this note, and inform me of the resolution taken by the President thereon. In the meantime, I renew the expressions of my particular respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

BRISTOL, June 24, 1818.

Sir: In the National Intelligencer, which is considered in this country as the Government paper, I have seen the publication of the attack, assault, and capture of the place of Pensacola by the American troops under the command of General Jackson; which publication is repeated in other papers of the Union, and of which I have yet seen no contradiction, either in the Government paper or in any other. Notwithstanding which, the fact appears to be so improbable, from its very enormity, that I cannot but think the publication has originated in some ill-founded rumor; and, under this impression, I have deferred proceeding to the Federal city, in the hope that some light might be thrown upon what has really taken place; but as I have yet received no official advice from the Governor of Pensacola, or any other Spanish authority upon this point, and as the publication in the Government paper is still circulating extensively, I cannot avoid applying to you, sir, and requesting that you would be pleased to inform me, in a positive, distinct, and explicit manner, what has occurred in this matter, together with all the circumstances relating to it.

I await your answer on this subject, as well as that in relation to my protest and reclamation concerning the seizure of the fort and bay of St. Mark to which you have not yet been pleased to reply. I use this occasion to renew, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, July 8, 1818.

Sir: The article published in the National Intelligencer, and reprinted in other papers of the Union, referred to in my late letter written at Bristol, has unfortunately been confirmed. General Jackson, with the American forces under his command, has not only violated the Spanish territory under the pretext of pursuing and chastising the Seminole Indians, but he has taken possession by force of arms, of the fort and bay of St. Mark, driven the Spanish garrison from those places, and sent them as prisoners to Pensacola, the capital of West Florida. Not satisfied with this enormous outrage, he marched against the latter place, and has, by open rupture and bloodshed, violated the peace existing between Spain and the United States. He demanded the surrender of Pensacola, as if war had been declared between the two nations; and on the refusal of the Spanish Governor to surrender or deliver up the place, the American commander, availing himself of his superior force, attacked it, and bombarded the castle of Barancas, whither the Governor had retired with his small garrison and such of the inhabitants as chose to follow him. Having surrounded that fortress, he gave orders for the assault, and carried it. The Governor, with all his people, were made prisoners of war, and were sent off, as it appears by the American General, to Havana, who proceeded to extend his authority over the whole of West Florida, by hoisting on its forts the flag of the United States.

Thus has peace been violated, and rights trampled under foot, which have hitherto been held as most sacred and inviolable by all nations.

These facts need no comment; they are notorious, and speak for themselves: their enormity has filled even the people of this Union with wonder and surprise, and cannot fail to excite the astonishment of all nations and Governments.

The American General can have neither pretext nor subterfuge, of which he can avail himself, to give the least color for this invasion and excessive aggression, unexampled in the history of nations. Whatever pretexts may be resorted to, to mislead and impose on the vulgar, will be frivolous, contradictory, and falsified by the very course of events, public and notorious. It cannot be supposed that the Indians, against whom the American commander directed his operations, received protection in Florida. They never received either favor or protection from the Spanish authorities, either within or without the territory under their jurisdiction.

It is notorious that several atrocious offenders and ringleaders of the South American rebels have repeatedly taken refuge within the limits of this Republic, when, being pursued by His Catholic Majesty's troops, they were on the point of falling into their hands. No one can be ignorant that the asylum granted to the unfortunate in cases of this nature has ever been respected by all civilized nations, not one of which ever took up arms to go and tear them from the foreign territory in which they had found an asylum, and still less to invade and take possession of such territory, in violation of an existing peace, and in contempt of all the laws and sacred principles on which the mutual security of independent States reposes; but it is superfluous to insist on venerable truths and axioms, which form an essential part of the law of nations, inasmuch as the cases to which I refer do not occur to require their application.

The Governor of Pensacola had conducted himself with the most scrupulous circumspection, to avoid giving the slightest ground of complaint to General Jackson, his officers, and troops. Neither he nor the Governor of East Florida was notified of the war against the Seminole Indians, nor were they informed of the just causes of that war; nor was any call made upon them to seek and punish those Indians in case of their having committed aggressions upon the lands or citizens of this Republic. Notwithstanding the total omission of all this, which was to have been expected as a regular and necessary consequence of the stipulations of the existing treaty, the aforesaid Governor granted no favor to the Indians, but forbade them to enter the Spanish territory; and when a small number of them came to Pensacola to receive the annual presents, the Governor allowed only a few of them to enter the place, without their arms, and immediately after dismissed them. He further took every necessary precaution to prevent their being supplied with arms and ammunition within His Majesty's territories. These facts being of public notoriety, and impossible to refute, there can be no excuse, pretext, or subterfuge offered to palliate a series of such unheard of outrages.

I refrain from entering into a minute detail of the particular excesses committed by the American commander, his officers, and troops. On taking a view of them, it would be inferred that the war against the Indians has been merely a pretext for General Jackson to fall, as a conqueror, upon the Spanish provinces, unprovided as they now are, and reposing in perfect security, for the purpose of establishing therein the dominion of this Republic upon the odious basis of violence and bloodshed. I confine myself, for the present, to the scandalous capture of the fort and bay of St. Mark, and to the attack and occupation of Pensacola and Barancas, by the American commander, who, carrying his military measures to their utmost extent, has reduced the whole of West Florida, driven off the Spanish Governor, troops, military and civil officers, and established, in their room, the laws and authorities of this Republic.

I am persuaded that the Government of the United States cannot have authorized this hostile, bloody, and ferocious invasion of the dominions of Spain; and in this belief I only do justice to its humane feelings, and the enlightened and upright principles which govern its policy. In the President's Message to Congress of the 25th of March last, I observe that "orders have been given to pursue and chastise the Seminole Indians; and that if, in the course of the war, it should be necessary to enter the Spanish territory, the authorities of Spain are to be respected, and the territory evacuated the moment the war is at an end." I observe, too, that, in your official correspondence, you have given me assurances of the pacific views of your Government, and of the sincere desire of the President to preserve friendship and good understanding with the Government of Spain. Under these fortunate auspices, the most profound peace has subsisted between the two nations, to cultivate which has been the constant endeavor of His Catholic Majesty; and, at the same time, to give generous proofs of his high esteem, distinguished consideration, and perfect friendship for the United States, negotiations have been entered into with a view to terminate the existing differences between the two Governments to their mutual satisfaction; and the President will assuredly have been apprized of the generosity and frankness displayed by His Majesty in everything connected with the wishes manifested by this Republic, as far as the same have been compatible with the honor of his Royal Crown.

All these circumstances impress me with the belief that General Jackson has acted contrary to the orders of the President, tarnished the American name, and committed the reputation of his Government in the face of the universe. It is, therefore, my duty to protest, and I do hereby solemnly protest, in the name of the King, my master, against these public acts of hostility and invasion; and I demand, through you, of the President, in the name of my Sovereign, the prompt restitution of the fort and bay of St. Mark, also of Pensacola, Barancas, and other places in Florida, violently attacked and wrested from the Crown of Spain by the forces under General Jackson, in the midst of peace and the most positive assurances of friendship and harmony. In like manner, I demand the faithful delivery of all the artillery, warlike stores, and property, both public and private, taken at Pensacola, and other forts and places taken possession of by the American commander; indemnity for all the injuries and losses sustained by the Crown of Spain and the subjects of His Catholic Majesty in consequence of this act of invasion, and a satisfaction proportioned to the enormity of these offences; together with the lawful punishment of the General and the officers of this Republic by whom they were committed.

I therefore hope that the President, penetrated with indignation by acts of such enormity, will immediately comply with my demand, founded on such strict justice; and I impatiently await your answer to this note, which will communicate the resolution of the President for my information, in order that I may transmit the same to my Government with all requisite despatch.

In the meantime, I renew the assurances of my distinguished consideration and respect, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

mitting to my court official information of the events which have occurred in Florida, I have despatched to Madrid the courier I spoke to you of; and I greatly regretted that it was not in my power to forward, by the same opportunity, the answer of your Government to the reclamations and protests which, in the name of my Sovereign, I have presented to you, on the invasion and occupation of West Florida by the American army under General Jackson.

I have stated to my Government that I would send the said answer the moment I received it; and as one of the gentlemen attached to this legation will embark for Spain in a few days, I request you will be pleased, sir, to hasten your answer to my last note, that I may transmit it by this conveyance to the Government of the King, my master.

You must be aware of the expediency of a prompt and categorical answer; Spain expects it will not be delayed; and all the Powers await it, in expectation of those eclaircissemens which are claimed by the laws of nations, in consequence of an act of hostility enormous in itself, and incalculable in its consequences.

I anxiously await your answer, and in the meantime I seize this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration. God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis De Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 23, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letters of the 24th June and 8th instant, complaining of the conduct of Major General Jackson in entering West Florida with the forces under his command, taking the Spanish posts of St. Mark and Pensacola, &c.

Without recurring to the long standing and heavy causes of complaint which the United States have had against Spain; to the forbearance with which they have been borne, without despairing of obtaining justice from her by amicable means; to the efforts equally unceasing and unavailing which they have made to obtain that justice; or to the extraordinary delays by which it has been protracted and is still withheld, it is thought proper on this occasion to call your attention to a series of events which necessitated and justified the entrance of the troops of the United States upon the Spanish boundary of Florida, and gave occasion to those transactions of the commander of the American forces against which you complain.

It cannot be unknown to you that, for a considerable time before the Government of the United States issued the orders for military operations in that quarter, the inhabitants of their frontier had been exposed to the depredations, murders, and massacres of a tribe of savages, a small part of which lived within the limits of the United States, far the greater number of them dwelling within the borders of Florida. The barbarous, unrelenting, and exterminating character of Indian hostility is also well known to you; and, from the peculiar local position of these tribes, it was obvious that there could be no possible security for the lives of the white inhabitants of those borders, unless the United States and Spain should be reciprocally bound to restrain the portion of the Indians respectively within their territories from committing robbery and butchery upon the citizens and subjects of the other party. So forcibly was the necessity felt by both, that in the fifth article of the treaty of 27th October, 1795, the following remarkable stipulation is contained:

"The two high contracting parties shall, by all the means in their power, maintain peace and harmony among the several Indian nations who inhabit the country adjacent to the lines and rivers which, by the preceding articles, form the boundaries of the two Floridas; and, the better to obtain this effect, both parties oblige themselves expressly to restrain by force all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations living within their boundaries; so that Spain will not suffer her Indians to attack the citizens of the United States, nor the Indians inhabiting their territory; nor will the United States permit these last-mentioned Indians to commence hostilities against the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, or his Indians, in any manner whatever."

Notwithstanding this precise, express, and solemn compact of Spain, numbers, painful to recollect, of the citizens of the United States inhabiting the frontier—numbers, not merely of persons in active manhood, but of the tender sex, of defenceless age, and helpless infancy, had at various times been butchered, with all the aggravation and horrors of savage cruelty, by Seminole Indians, and by a banditti of negroes sallying from within the Spanish border, and retreating to it again with the horrid fruits of their crimes.

At a former period the Governor of Pensacola had been called upon, by letter from Major General Jackson, conformably to the stipulated engagement of Spain and to the duties of good neighborhood, to interpose by force and break up a stronghold of which this horde of savages and fugitive slaves had possessed themselves on the territory of Florida. The answer acknowledged the obligation, but pleaded an incompetency of force for its fulfilment. Copies of these important documents are herewith transmitted to you; and it may be within your knowledge and recollection that the orders and the competent force which Governor Zuniga stated in his letter that he had solicited from his Governor General, and without which he declared himself unable to destroy this fort, created upon Spanish territory for the purposes of united civilized, and savage, and servile war against the United States, were never furnished; and that the United States were finally compelled to accomplish its destruction by their own force.

The permanent and unvarying policy of the United States, with regard to all the Indian tribes within their borders, is that of peace, friendship, and liberality; and so successful has this policy been, that, for many years, no instance has occurred of their being in hostility with any Indian tribe, unless stimulated by the influence of foreign incendiaries. Even after the repeated commission of these depredations and massacres by the Seminole Indians, at the very moment when the Government of the United States was reluctantly compelled to employ their own military force for the protection of their people, offers of peace were tendered to them, and rejected.

Nor has the respect manifested by this Government for the territorial rights of Spain been less signal and conspicuous, even after the full and formal notice, by the Governor of Pensacola, of the incompetency of his force either to perform the duties of neutrality, or to fulfil the obligations of the treaty. When it became necessary to employ the military force of the United States for the protection of their frontier, on the 30th October last, the commanding officer in that quarter, while directed to take other measures for suppressing the hostilities of the Indians, was expressly instructed not on that account to pass the line, and make an attack upon them within the limits of Florida, without further orders. On the 2d of December instructions to the same effect were repeated. On the 9th of December they were again renewed, with the modification suggested by the continuation of Indian outrages, that, should the Indians assemble in force on the Spanish side of the line, and persevere in committing hostilities within the limits of the United States, the American officer was authorized in that event to exercise a sound discretion as to the propriety of crossing the line, for the purpose of attacking them, and breaking up their towns. On the 16th of December, upon information that an officer of the United States, with a detachment of forty men, had been attacked, and all destroyed, with the exception of six who made their escape, four of whom were wounded, the instruction, of which the following is a copy, was issued from the Department of War to the American General then in command:

"On receipt of this letter, should the Seminole Indians still refuse to make reparation for their outrages and depredations on the citizens of the United States, it is the wish of the President that you consider yourself at liberty to march across the Florida line, and to attack them within its limits, should it be found necessary, unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish fort. In the last event, you will immediately notify this Department."

These, with a subsequent instruction of the 26th of December to the Commander-in-chief, referring to them, and directing him, with a view to them, to adopt the necessary measures to terminate a conflict which it had ever been the desire of the President, from considerations of humanity, to avoid, but which was made necessary by the settled hostilities of the Indians, are all the instructions given in relation to Florida.

By the ordinary laws and usages of nations,

the right of pursuing an enemy who seeks refuge from actual conflict within a neutral territory, is incontestable. But, in this case, the territory of Florida was not even neutral. It was itself, as far as Indian savages possess territorial right, the territory of Indians with whom the United States were at war. It was their place of abode; and Spain was bound by treaty to restrain them by force from committing hostilities against the United States—an engagement which the commanding officer of Spain in Florida had acknowledged himself unable to fulfil. Of the necessity there was for crossing the line, what stronger proofs could be adduced than that it was within that line the American General met the principal resistance from the Indians which he encountered in the whole campaign; that within that line, at their towns which he destroyed, he found displayed, as barbarous trophies, the mutilated remnants of our wretched fellow-citizens, the murdered women and children, the accumulated barbarities of many years?

You have seen that no instruction or authority, inconsistent with the declaration of the Message of the President of the United States of the 25th of March last to Congress, was ever issued to the commander of the American forces. The possession which he took of the fort of St. Mark, and subsequently of Pensacola, was upon motives which he himself has explained, and upon his own responsibility. For his justification in the adoption of both those measures, he states them to have been necessary upon the immutable principles of self-defence:

That, at an early period of his operations, he had given full notice of their object to the Governor of Pensacola, by communication, dated the 25th of March last, warning him that every attempt on his part to succor the Indians, or prevent the passage of provisions for the American troops in the Escambia, would be viewed as acts of hostility:

That, in defiance of this admonition, the Governor of Pensacola did both give succor to the Indians, and delay the passage of the provisions to the American army, and thereby subjected them to the severest privations:

That the Governor of Pensacola had caused it to be directly reported to the American General that Fort St. Mark had been threatened by the Indians and negroes; and expressed serious apprehensions, from the weakness of the garrison and defenceless state of the works, for its safety:

That this information was confirmed to the American General from other sources, upon which he could rely, and completely warranted the amicable occupation by him of that fort:

That, upon his entering the fort, evidence, clear, unequivocal, and manifold, was evinced of the duplicity and unfriendly feeling of the commandant—evidence demonstrating, beyond the power of denial, that, far from acting in the spirit of that sacred engagement of his Sovereign, to restrain by force his Indians from hostilities against the United States, he had made himself, by every act in his power, a partner and accomplice of the hostile Indians, and of their foreign instigators:

That the same spirit of hostility to the United States was discovered by the Governor of Pensacola himself, by his refusal to permit, unless by the payment of exorbitant duties, the passage of provisions to the American army; by the reception and succors given to the Indians at various times; and, finally, by a letter which he sent to the American General, denouncing his entry into Florida as an aggression against Spain, and threatening, unless he should immediately withdraw from it, and should he continue what he thus styled aggression, that he would repel force by force. This was so open an indication of hostile feeling on the part of Governor Mazot, after he had been early and well advised of the object of General Jackson's operations, that this officer no longer hesitated on the measures to be adopted—the occupation of Pensacola and the Fort of Barancas.

The charges alleged by General Jackson against the commandant of St. Mark's, are not known even to have been denied. The Governor of Pensacola has partly, and but partly, contradicted those which applied to himself. He assured General Jackson that the information received by him, of the numbers of Indians who had been received and harbored at Pensacola was erroneous. It is possible that the numbers may have been somewhat exaggerated in the reports which General Jackson had received. But within ten days after the time stated in his letter to the Governor of Pensacola of this assemblage of Indians at that place, a large body of them were overtaken, surprised, and defeated by the forces of the United States, within one mile of Pensacola. Nor was it until after that event that the Governor issued his proclamation for refusing them supplies, and gave them the advice under which eighty-seven of them surrendered themselves to the American officer. But the measures of General Jackson were not founded upon one solitary fact. A combination of circumstances, all tending to convince him of the hostile spirit of the Governor, remains yet uncontradicted; and the General has furnished proofs that Governor Mazot's assertion, that there had been, since the surrender of those eighty-seven Indians to Captain Young, only two in Pensacola, and those in jail, was itself very incorrect. Besides the Alabama chief, included in the capitulation, one wounded Indian was found in the fort at Barancas. Holmes, a noted Red Stick chief, left Pensacola but the day before the American troops took possession, and a number of other Indians were seen about the same time within a few miles of Pensacola, and succeeded, with the aid of Spanish officers, in eluding the pursuit of the American troops.

A conduct not only so contrary to the express engagements of Spain, but so unequivocally hostile to the United States, justly authorizes them to call upon His Catholic Majesty for the punishment of those officers who, the President is persuaded, have therein acted contrary to the express orders of their Sovereign. In the full confidence that your Government will render to the United States ample justice in this regard, the President has directed all the proofs relating thereto to be embodied, as the ground of an application to that effect to your Government.

In the meantime, I am instructed by the President to inform you that Pensacola will be restored to the possession of any person duly authorized on the part of Spain to receive it; that the fort of St. Mark, being in the heart of the Indian country, and remote from any Spanish settlement, can be surrendered only to a force sufficiently strong to hold it against the attack of the hostile Indians; upon the appearance of which force it will also be restored.

In communicating to you this decision, I am also directed to assure you that it has been made under the fullest conviction, which he trusts will be felt by your Government, that the preservation of peace between the two nations indispensably requires that henceforth the stipulations by Spain to restrain by force her Indians from all hostilities against the United States should be faithfully and effectually fulfilled.

I pray you to accept the assurance of my high consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Washington, M. T., April 23, 1816.

SIR: I am charged by my Government to make known to you that a negro fort, erected during our late war with Britain, at or near the junction of the Chatahochee and Flint rivers, has been strengthened since that period, and is now occupied by upwards of two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom have been enticed from the service of their masters, citizens of the United States; all of whom are well clothed and disciplined. Secret practices to inveigle negroes from the citizens of Georgia, as well as from the Cherokee and Creek nations of Indians, are still continued by this banditti and the hostile Creeks. This is a state of things which cannot fail to produce much injury in the neighboring settlements, and excite irritations which eventually may endanger the peace of the nation, and interrupt that good understanding which so happily exists between our Governments.

The principles of good faith, which always insure good neighborhood between nations, require the immediate and prompt interference of the Spanish authority to destroy or remove from our frontier this banditti, put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, and return to our citizens and friendly Indians inhabiting our territory those negroes now in said fort, and which have been stolen and enticed from them. I cannot permit myself to indulge a belief that the Governor of Pensacola, or the military commander at that place, will hesitate a moment in giving orders for this banditti to be dispersed, and the property of the citizens of the United States forthwith restored to them and our friendly Indians; particularly when I reflect that the conduct of this banditti is such as will not be tolerated by our Government, and, if not put down by Spanish authority, will compel us, in self-defence, to destroy them. This communication is intrusted to Captain Amelung, of the 1st regiment United States infantry, who is charged to bring back such answer as you may be pleased to make to this letter. In your answer you will be pleased to state whether that fort has been built by the Government of Spain, and whether those negroes who garrison it are considered as the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if not by His Catholic Majesty, by whom, and under whose orders, it has been erected.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major Gen., com. Div. of the South.

ISAAC L. BAKER, Aid-de-camp.

PENSACOLA, March 26, 1816.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 24th of the present month, Captain Amelung, of the 1st United States regiment, put into my hands your excellency's letter, dated at Washington, Mississippi Territory, on the 23d of April last, in which, after apprizing me that your Government had given it in charge to you to inform me that the fort of the negroes, erected during the late war with Great Britain, near the junction of the Chatahochee and Flint rivers, had been reinforced, and was now occupied by more than two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom were seduced from the service of their masters, (who are citizens of the United States,) and that all of them are well armed, provisioned, and disciplined, you make many wise reflections with respect to the serious injuries which may result from tolerating such an establishment, not only to those in the immediate neighborhood of it, by disturbing the peace of the nation, but likewise to the good understanding which happily exists between our respective Governments; you enter into an investigation to show what the Spanish authorities ought to do to put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, in the mode prescribed by those principles of good faith which are the foundation of friendly neighborhood among nations; you distinctly state what this Government ought immediately to do, in failure of which your Government will be obliged to do it, to insure the safety of the inhabitants of the United States; and you conclude by requesting me to state, in my answer to your letter, whether the said fort has been constructed by the Spanish Government, and whether the negroes who compose its garrison are deemed subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if the fort was not built by Spanish authority, to state by what authority, and by whose order, it was built.

myself, that having arrived at this place nearly at the close of the month of March preceding, and being informed of what your excellency has communicated to me, with this difference, that the fort, instead of being where you place it, is to be found on the eastern bank of the Appalachicola, at about fifteen miles from its mouth, or entrance into the sea, I lost no time in proposing to my Captain General the measures which appeared to me proper, as well for securing the inhabitants of the country under my command from damages, losses, and injuries, which they have suffered and still suffer from this establishment, as to prevent the American citizens and the friendly Indians of the neighborhood from continuing to experience them. I have hitherto received no answer; and, consequently, your excellency, who knows how limited are the powers of a subordinate officer, cannot be surprised that I should make known to you that, although my mode of thinking exactly corresponds with yours as to the dislodging of the negroes from the fort, the occupying it with Spanish troops, or destroying it, and delivering the negroes who may be collected to their lawful owners, I shall not be able to act until I receive the orders of my Captain General, and the assistance necessary to enable me to undertake the enterprise with a moral certainty of accomplishing the end. I am persuaded that the determination of the said chief cannot be long delayed; and, should it authorize me to act, your excellency may rest assured and persuaded that I will not lose an instant in adopting, on my part, the most efficacious measures for cutting up by the root an evil which is felt to the full extent stated in your letter by the inhabitants of this province, who are subjects of my Sovereign, and whose prosperity and tranquillity it is my duty to preserve and protect.

With this explanation your beforenamed letter may be considered fully answered, as it gives you to understand that, thinking as your excellency thinks, with respect to the necessity of destroying the negroes, the fort of Appalachicola, occupied by them, was not constructed by order of the Spanish Government; and that the negroes, although in part belonging to the inhabitants of this province, and as rational beings, may be subjects of the King, my master, and deemed by me insurgents or rebels against the authority, not only of His Catholic Majesty, but also of the proprietors from whose service they have withdrawn themselves—some seduced by the English Colonel Edward Nicholls, Major Woodbine, and their agents, and others from their inclination to run off. But as your excellency manifests a particular desire that, in case the fort was not erected by Spanish authority, I should state by what authority and by whose order it was erected, I have no difficulty in satisfying your curiosity, by informing you that I have understood, ever since my arrival at this place, that the said fort, and another near the confluence of the Chatahochee and Flint rivers, which it appears no longer exists, were built by the order of the beforenamed Colonel Nicholls. I will not assure you that he did it under authority from his Government; but I can say that he proceeded to place artillery, munitions, and provisions in it, by the arrangement of Vice Admiral Malcolm; and that, when Colonel Nicholls and the troops of his detachment, after the conclusion of the expedition against Louisiana, withdrew from that point, he left orders with the negroes, totally contrary to the incontestable right of sovereignty which the King, my master, exercises from the line of thirty-first degree of north latitude to the south. My predecessors in this Government have given an account of all these actions to the authorities on whom they depended, that the satisfaction which the violation required might be demanded by those on whom this duty devolves.

I think I have answered your excellency's letter satisfactorily, and in terms which cannot leave a doubt of the sincerity of my intentions in favor of the common cause of the American and Spanish inhabitants, and that my present inaction does not proceed from a want of inclination. I likewise flatter myself that, until my Captain General decides, no steps will be taken by the Government of the United States, or by your excellency, which may be prejudicial to the sovereignty of the King, my master, in the district of Appalacnicola, which is a dependency of this Government; and, finally, I conclude by assuring your excellency that it will afford me particular satisfaction to have opportunities of evincing my desire, not only to contribute, so far as depends on me, to the cementing of the good understanding which subsists between our respective Governments, but also to prove to your excellency the high opinion I entertain of your virtues and military talents.

God preserve your excellency many years.
MAURICIO DE ZUNIGA.
His Excellency A. JACKSON.

BRISTOL, July 27, 1818.

Sir: It is some time since I have received positive and circumstantial information that a person, acting under a commission from the rebels at Buenos Ayres, had given orders for the building of two frigates, of twenty-eight or thirty guns each, at New York; and that, armed, equipped, and manned with citizens of this Republic, they are to proceed from that port on a cruise against the commerce and subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

Although so manifest a violation of the laws of the United States, to the injury of my Sovereign, imposed on me the duty of immediately soliciting of the President such measures as are in conformity with the laws of the Union and the peace and good understanding existing between the two nations, and would put a stop to this evil; yet, faithful to the system I have laid down of not trespassing on the attention of your Government, except in cases of indispensable necessity, I directed His Majesty's Consul at New York, after he had obtained all the legal evidence required by the courts, to have recourse to them with that calmness and confidence with which the justice of his cause should inspire him when submitted to impartial and enlightened magistrates.

His Majesty's Consul has just informed me that, agreeably to my instructions, he had applied to the district attorney, stating that he was possessed of sundry declarations of persons, corroborating each other, showing that the laws of the United States had been violated, and requesting him to cause the said vessels to be stopped and proceeded against, together with the parties concerned in their equipment, in the manner prescribed by the act of Congress of the twentieth of April last, section 11. The district attorney appears not to have been very anxious to carry the act into execution, as he replied that he would not do so, although fifty such declarations were presented to him. I do not pretend to inquire into the motives of the attorney's feelings or conduct, which, to say the least, was very extraordinary; but I deem it indispensable to transmit to you four of the original declarations referred to, that they may be laid before the President, and that he may be pleased to direct, with the urgency required by the case, the collector of the customs at New York to stop the above-mentioned vessels, in order that they, as well as the parties engaged in their outfit, may be proceeded against in due form of law, and the necessary force employed for the faithful execution of his duty.

This demand, which I renew in the name of my Sovereign, being in strict conformity with the laws of this Republic, I cannot for a moment doubt that the President will readily comply with it; and that you will have the goodness to advise me of its having been carried into effect, that I may direct the Consul to produce the necessary testimony for the elucidation and decision of a case transcendently important to the interests of my Sovereign.

I renew to you the assurances of my respect, and I pray God to preserve you many years.
LUIS DE ONIS.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City of New York, ss:

Samuel Samuels, by profession a mariner, at present in the city of New York, being duly sworn, says: That, about the 11th or 12th of July instant, deponent was at Dominick Morris's house, where they were shipping hands for the Curiazo; he met there a Mr. Brown, who was the man who attended on shore to the enlisting and shipping of the crew; this gentleman asked deponent whether he did not wish to ship on board of the Curiazo, and upon this requested him to walk up stairs, and he would inform deponent all about the object of the vessel; they went up stairs, and Mr. Brown then said that the Curiazo was destined to go around Cape Horn, or would go to Buenos Ayres in the patriot service; that she would join the other ship, which was lying in North river, named the Horatio, and they would be absent about two years; deponent signed articles, at the office of the notary, Mr. Palmer; he did not read the articles at the time of signing; the wages were fourteen dollars a month, and two months' advance, which sum is paid in like manner to all the crew, fourteen dollars at the time of signing the articles, and fourteen dollars after getting on board; he went on board on Tuesday, the 21st of July instant, and found sixty hands on board, agreeably to the muster which was made; and there were others on shore who had enlisted but not yet come aboard; there were a captain, several lieutenants, a sailingmaster, many midshipmen, a boatswain, boatswain's mates, boatswain's yeomen, several quartermasters, a gunner, gunner's mate, and two quarter-gunners, two captains for each of the tops—fore-top, mizen-top, and main-top, two captains of the fore-castle, two captains of the after-guard, a captain of the hold, and green hands to form a company of marines; deponent was captain of the main-top of the larboard watch; the hands were exercised every day in loosing and handling the sails; some of the hands were employed in making wads for the cannon; the guns were not yet come on board, but they were expected daily, and the hands conversed about the stations which they would hold at the guns; the exercising of the crews, which he has before mentioned, was the same as is customary in the service of the United States on board their vessels of war; there was a regular watch kept up during the day and night, one-half of the crew being on watch all the night; the hands were all piped by the boatswain and the boatswain's mate at their several meals; when officers came on board, the sides were manned for them by way of salute; and, in every respect, the discipline and duty kept up was the same as is practised in the navy service.

When the deponent shipped, the notary told him to leave a will and power to enable the landlord to receive the prize money which deponent might become entitled to; which deponent did accordingly in favor of Dominick Morris. The general understanding on board the vessel is, that they were to cruise along the coast of South America after their arrival at Buenos Ayres. The vessel is built in every respect as a vessel of war; the water below is secured exactly in the manner that it is done on board a man-of-war, which is different from what is usual in the merchant service. Deponent further saith not.

JAMES HOPSON, S. Justice.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City of New York, ss:

George W. Lynch, of the city of New York, merchant, being duly sworn, says: That on the 23d day of July instant, he went on board the ship Curiazo, lying in the North river, in this port, in company with a Mr. Atkinson, who said he was the purser of the said vessel; deponent counted thirty cannon lying on the deck, and a number of new gun-carriages which were lying upon one another, and appeared to be equally numerous; he was presented to the several officers, was told by them that there were a captain, four lieutenants, and a number of midshipmen; that the captain was named Delano, the first lieutenant is named Van Beuren, the second Grinnel, the third Smith, and the fourth Cobbett; he was told by the purser that the vessel, together with the Horatio, another ship lying near, was bound to Buenos Ayres; there appeared to be a great number of men on board; he was told by said purser that it was their intention to take one hundred men; that the crew were paid two months' advance, and that, as a further inducement to them to ship, they had the prospect of prize money. In conversation with a Mr. Sullivan, who is at the head of the surgical department for the two vessels, and was now on board the Curiazo, he (Mr. Sullivan) said, "I am sorry that the guns are not carronades instead of gunnades;" but then immediately added, "however, it is better as it is; we shall want long guns to fight the Spaniards." Deponent was carried through the vessel, and the different parts of it were pointed out to him; the captain's room, the lieutenants' room, and the midshipmen's room, were severally and respectively designated; there was a quantity of cannon balls between the decks; all hands were piped by the boatswain while deponent was on board. This vessel is newly built, has been launched but a short time, and is now preparing for her first voyage; she is pierced for many guns, and is built in every respect like a frigate.

Deponent left this vessel in company with the surgeon, Mr. Sullivan, and proceeded with him to the other ship, the Horatio. This gentleman is the surgeon of the Horatio, and told deponent that he had selected the surgeons for this and the other vessel, (the Curiazo;) that he had examined them in order to ascertain that they were duly qualified; he mentioned that the crews of each vessel would consist at present of one hundred men for each, but that their complement was three hundred men for each; that the medical list which was handed to him for both vessels was for six hundred men; he showed deponent his medicine chest, his tools, and other implements, and said that he had everything in complete order; he showed deponent into a room below the cabin, which he said would be his station in time of action; deponent said he supposed there would be little fighting, to which Mr. Sullivan answered, "I don't know, the Spaniards have got a fine frigate out there with five hundred men." Deponent was told on board of this vessel by the said surgeon, and by another officer, the second lieutenant, that, besides the captain, Skinner, who was Commodore of the two vessels, the Horatio had four lieutenants and a number of midshipmen; the first lieutenant is named Currie, and the second Eakin; deponent was shown into the several rooms of the captain, lieutenants, and midshipmen; the cannon had not yet been brought on board of this vessel, but the officers told deponent they expected them shortly; this vessel resembles the other in every respect, was built at the same time, and has never yet been to sea. Speaking about the complement of men for these vessels, Mr. Eakin, the second lieutenant, told the deponent that although they would take out for the present only one hundred men each, they would have no difficulty in making up the full number, which would be three hundred, at Buenos Ayres, because sailors there would leave the privateers to enter these vessels. He said that if Mr. Aguirre, when he commenced the building of these vessels, had employed a merchant, instead of making the contract himself, he would have saved a great deal of money, at least fifteen per cent.; that Dacy and Didier, of Baltimore had received money from Aguirre, and had offered to transact all the business of these vessels, and to bond them for five per cent., but that he was unwilling to allow them more than two and a half per cent.; they offered also to allow him bank interest for his money while it was in their hands; but they came to no agreement, owing to the smallness of the commission which Aguirre was willing to allow them; and that the vessels had cost him a very large sum of money, everything having been fitted up in the most costly manner; that the cannon had been made by Mason, of Washington. The surgeon, Mr. Sullivan, speaking of the discipline of the two vessels, said that of the Horatio was superior to the Curiazo; that, on board of the Horatio, the medical returns were made daily, the same as on board a man of war. When deponent went on board of the Horatio, the sides were manned, which was also done when he left it; this ceremony is a compliment or salute to the person who comes on board, and is customary on board vessels of war, and not in merchant vessels.

While on board the Horatio, the said Eakin said that he had always been treated well by the Spaniards, but said some other words, the import of which was that this was a speculation, and that he must do the best he could for himself; Mr. Currie, the first lieutenant, also said that he had always been well treated by the Spaniards, and that he would treat them so until he could not help doing otherwise—alluding to what he would do in time of battle.

Mr. Wynans, of the firm of Ten Eyck, Wynans & Co., told deponent that they, together with two other block-makers, made the blocks for both of the said ships; they were employed by Captain Skinner and Mr. Aguirre jointly, both being together; but Mr. Aguirre gave the directions to Skinner, and appeared to be the owner; that he (Wynans) called frequently upon Aguirre for directions; and, when all the work was done, Aguirre paid him.

Mr. Wakewell, a sailmaker, told deponent that Mr. Aguirre made the agreement with him for the sails of one of the ships, and paid him the amount.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City of New York, ss.:

John B. Sickles, being duly sworn, says: That on the 22d of July instant he called upon Joseph Skinner, whom he understood to be the captain or commander of the two vessels named the Curiazo and Horatio, which are fitting in this port for Buenos Ayres; he met him in the neighborhood of Washington Hall, at his residence, and found a number of gentlemen collected; there were about twenty, among whom was Mr. Aaron H. Palmer, the notary; the conversation was exclusively relating to those vessels, their arms and equipment, some saying that a portion of the guns were larger than others. On the 23d of July he saw Captain Skinner again, and asked him to provide the deponent with an officer's berth on board of one of the said vessels; Captain Skinner referred him to Mr. Palmer, who said that all the officers' stations were full; deponent repeated his desire to be employed, and Skinner told him he might go as supernumerary in the capacity of acting midshipman. During this conversation Mr. Palmer told Captain Skinner that he was short of funds; to which Skinner replied, "You must go to Mr. Aguirre for them, you know I am not the owner." On the 24th of July deponent saw Captain Skinner again at Palmer's office; deponent asked when he should go on board. Skinner told him during the course of the day. Deponent accordingly went on board on the 24th, in company with William Nesbit, a young man, who was also told by Captain Skinner that he might go as supernumerary; when deponent got on board of the ship Horatio, which was lying in the stream, he reported himself to Lieutenant Currie, who was the first lieutenant on board thereof. Currie told deponent and the said Nesbit that he could not receive them unless they brought a written order from the captain, because they had so many officers already; deponent remained on board about four hours, during which time he got into conversation with several of the officers; one of them, named Weed, told deponent that he is the captain of marines on board; that when the vessels arrived out at Buenos Ayres the officers expected to receive their warrants from the Buenos Ayrean Government; that Captain Skinner had promised them that he would get them from that Government for these officers; deponent was told by Mr. Weed that there were three lieutenants on board, that there were eight midshipmen on the list, and twelve supernumeraries besides deponent and Mr. Nesbit; that after the vessels got out to sea, if these persons were wanted, they would be turned forward; this deponent understood to allude to their being wanted in time of action. He said they had on board at present ninety-five men, and they intended to get more; he said he expected that it would be a troublesome job for him to exercise his marines, which he would have to do soon; the discipline on board this vessel is the same as that on board a vessel of war; the watch was changed while deponent was on board, and the lieutenants also changed their watch, the hands being piped by the boatswain; the arm chest, containing guns, pistols, cutlasses, &c., was brought on board while deponent was there; he was told that the great guns were expected on the following day, (the 25th,) that the guns of the Curiazo were eighteen pounders, between carronades and gunnades, but that those of the Horatio were long eighteens, that being the Commodore's ship; that they were brass guns, and had been selected for this vessel; that these guns were different from those of the other vessel, because these were intended for long fighting, or fighting at a distance, and the others for close engagement. After being on board for several hours, deponent came ashore with the said William Nesbit, and called upon Captain Skinner, told him what Lieutenant Currie had said, and asked him for an order, which Captain Skinner gave, and which is in the words following: "Mr. Currie: Sir, you will please to receive Mr. J. B. Sickles and William Nesbit on board the ship Horatio as supernumeraries, and you will oblige yours, Joseph Skinner. July 24, 1818." This note is directed "Mr. William Currie, ship Horatio." Deponent further says, that when he was on board the Horatio on the 24th, the officers were speaking about the cannon which was expected on board the Horatio, and that which was on board of the Curiazo, and said that they would mount it, because they did not expect that there would be any opposition from the Spanish Consul; there was a large quantity of potatoes on board, which they were employed in assorting, and, while thus engaged, one of the officers said those were very bad potatoes for a cruise; the number of barrels deponent supposes nearly two hundred. And further the deponent saith not.

BRISTOL, July 28, 1818.

I had the honor yesterday to transmit to you the declarations of four individuals, affording the most positive proof of the violation which has taken place in the port of New York of the laws of this Republic, to the signal injury of the interests of my Sovereign. I now enclose three other declarations, corroborating the former, and establishing the fact to which I refer.

I assure myself that, in consideration of these circumstances, you will have no doubt of the justice of the demand I now make, in the name of the King, my master, or of the urgency with which I claim of the President to issue the necessary orders to the collector of the customs at New York to detain the two Buenos Ayres armed ships alluded to, and the requisite instructions to have the case immediately brought before the proper tribunal.

I trust, sir, that you will have the goodness to transmit to the aforesaid collector the seven declarations forwarded to you, for the purpose of preventing the escape of these two armed vessels, as they have already endeavored to do; it being confidently relied on that, if the suit be once instituted, nothing can save them from the impartial justice of the court.

I beg you to pardon this trespass on your time to which circumstances have compelled me, and that you will accept the fresh assurances of my constant respect. God preserve you many years.
LUIS DE ONIS.

STATE OF NEW YORK, City of New York, ss.:

James Young, by profession a mariner, at present in the city of New York, being duly sworn, says: That about three weeks ago the deponent was requested by a former shipmate of deponent's, named David Rees, to enlist on board the ship Curiazo. Deponent went on board that vessel, and there saw Mr. Grinnel, who was the second lieutenant thereof. This gentleman gave deponent a note to Mr. Brown, who was the shipping officer of the vessels, recommending him to take the deponent as boatswain's mate for the said vessel. Deponent saw Mr. Brown, who told him there was no vacancy for boatswain's mate, because he had already shipped two, but that he might have the birth of quarter-gunner; this birth deponent accepted, and afterwards went to the office of the notary in Pine street, whose name deponent believes is Palmer. At this time deponent was told by Mr. Brown that the vessel was going to Buenos Ayres or to the Cape of Good Hope. Deponent did not read the articles when he signed them, which was about the same time before mentioned. Deponent went on board the said vessel, the Curiazo, which is commanded by Captain Paul Delano. This vessel is pierced for thirty-two guns, although there may be more, as deponent has never counted the number of ports. Since deponent has been on board, they have taken in a great quantity of extra spars and rigging, and a quantity of cordage, more than is used in the merchant service. She has a long-boat, yawl, and sundry other boats, six or seven in number altogether. Deponent continued on board until last Friday, the 17th instant. There are on board, and in the service of the vessels, a captain, three persons whom deponent knows to be lieutenants, a sailingmaster, master's mate, and more than half a dozen midshipmen, but how many precisely deponent does not know. When he left the vessel there were about seventy hands or sailors on board; and deponent was informed on board, by the people generally, that the number was to be increased to one hundred and fifty more. The third lieutenant said, in deponent's presence, that when they had one hundred and fifty more they would look quite smart. There are a boatswain and two boatswain's mates, four quartermasters, two captains of the fore-top, two of the main-top, and two of the mizen-top, two captains of the after-guard, two quarter-gunners, of which the deponent was one, a captain of the hold, and boatswain's yeoman. The crew are mustered every Sunday; the hands are piped to breakfast, dinner, and supper; and when an officer comes on board, the boatswain attends the side, and the whole service and duty is performed in every respect the same as is done on board a man-of-war, which deponent is conversant with, having served in the English navy nearly five years. A quartermaster is kept constantly on the look out, to prevent any persons coming on board without leave, and at night some watch forward, and some aft. It is the understanding of all hands on board, that when they arrive at Buenos Ayres they will be employed in the service there; and the officers have said they will make their fortunes by it. The boatswain, Mr. Crisp, told deponent yesterday that, the night before, the cannon were taken off board. James Johnson, the quartermaster, told deponent the same thing, and that thirty-two eighteen pounders had been taken on board, besides the quantity of shot. The same was mentioned by the boatswain's mate. He further says that the above deposition has been this day read to him, and that he declares the same to be in every respect correct. The Curiazo is a new vessel, just built in the port of New York, and has never been to sea. Captain Joseph Skinner, deponent has heard and believes, is captain of another ship, also lately built in the port of New York, and which has not yet sailed, but which is intended to go on the same service with the Curiazo. The name of the first lieutenant is Mr. Van Beuren.

David Rees being duly sworn, says: That he had heard, read, and examined the preceding deposition of James Young; that all the facts therein stated, relating to the condition and armament of the said ship Curiazo, are correct and true in every respect; that deponent is employed at present on board the said ship Curiazo in the capacity of boatswain's yeoman; he was shipped by Mr. Brown, the shipping officer of the vessel; he signed articles at Mr. Palmer's; has been on board the Curiazo since the 11th of July instant. On the 22d and 23d of July, the great guns were taken off board; last evening, and until a late hour of night, these cannon were taken from on board again, and also the shot, and were put on board of a sloop which, it was mentioned, and generally understood on board, was going down towards Sandy Hook, to be put on board again there. Captain Paul Delano commands the Curiazo; that a few days ago deponent told said captain that he would wait no longer, and would not go with the vessel; Delano urged him to remain, said he was only waiting for his sweetmeats, (meaning his cannon,) and that, as soon as they were got on board, they would show the Spaniards play; that at present they cleared out for Buenos Ayres, and all hands shipped as seamen, because they did not dare to do otherwise; but that as soon as the vessels got out to sea, then the several stations would be assigned to the men, respectively. This vessel is completely a frigate, duty is done on board the same as in the State service, and she has forty-two different signals, many of which deponent has seen. Captain Joseph Skinner commands the other ship, called the Horatio, which is to be used in the same service; he is the commodore of both vessels. Deponent was going to hoist a pennant one morning on board the Curiazo, when the lieutenant ordered him to stop and see whether the commodore (meaning the other ship, the Horatio) would hoist, and, finding that he did not, deponent stopped, and the pennant was not hoisted.

Both these vessels were lately built in New York; they have not yet been to sea.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

BRISTOL, August 5, 1818.

SIR: I have received your note dated the 23d July, by which you are pleased to reply to mine of the 24th of June and the 8th of July last, on the subject of the invasion of West Florida by the American forces under the command of General Jackson, in the midst of peace, and the most solemn assurances of amity and good understanding repeatedly given to His Catholic Majesty by this Republic.

It is very painful to me to observe, by your answer, that the President does not view in the same light I do the enormous outrages committed by that officer; and that, in citing the specious motives of which he has availed himself to gloss them over, you present them as fully justifying the conduct of the General, and exonerating the United States from all responsibility in the case. I shall take up these pretended motives in the same order you have arranged them, and demonstrate, in a simple manner, their total want of foundation, and their incompetency to palliate, in the slightest degree, the invasion of a province of a friendly Power reposing in the security of peace, under the safeguard of the public faith.

You begin by reproducing the old grievances complained of by the United States, and which have been brought forward by your Government, among the subjects of dispute now pending between the Governments. Conceiving it superfluous to resume the arguments which have been formerly advanced to refute them, I shall for the present merely refer to them.

You state, in the first place, "that it cannot be unknown to me that, a considerable time before the Government of the United States issued the orders for military operations in that quarter, the inhabitants of their frontier had been exposed to the depredations and massacres of a tribe of savages, the greater number of whom dwelt within the borders of Florida." It is true that in the newspapers I saw accounts of such depredations and massacres, but I never knew the certain motives which had occasioned them. In the correspondence of the Spanish Governors of the Floridas, I observe continual complaints of the Indians to those Governors, stating the incessant injuries and vexations committed on them by the citizens of this Republic inhabiting the frontiers of both the Floridas; the proofs of which, to a certain extent, have been already laid before you, in the copies of the original documents accompanying my former communications. The Spanish Governors, being near observers of these transactions, were fully enabled to judge of the facts. It is from their correspondence alone that I can form an opinion on these points, while at the same time I feel every disposition to respect the decisions of your Government.

I admit, with you, sir, the imperious necessity which induced the two high contracting parties, in the treaty of 27th October, 1795, to stipulate the agreement contained in the seventh article, which imposes on them, reciprocally, the obligation of restraining, by force if necessary, the Indians inhabiting within the territories of Spain and of the United States from committing hostilities upon American citizens or Spanish subjects. But this stipulation could only be fulfilled upon the most satisfactory proofs of an existing necessity. It would have been an act of injustice and cruelty in Spain, had she drawn the sword to chastise the Indians living under her protection, without knowing what offences they had committed, and fully ascertaining their unquestionable certainty.

In the second place, "that, during the confusion of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, the Governor of Pensacola was called upon, by letter from General Jackson, to interpose by force, and break up a stronghold which the savages and a horde of fugitive slaves had possessed themselves of in the territory of Florida; that the Governor acknowledged the obligation, but pleaded an incompetency of force; that the orders and competent force which he had solicited from the Governor General of Cuba were never furnished; and that the United States were finally compelled to accomplish its destruction by its own force."

I am not thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances of this affair; but what I perfectly well know is, that the application should have been made to his superior, or to the Spanish Government through my channel, or through that of the Minister of the United States at Madrid, if the importance of the case required it, or if the Governor of Pensacola declined dislodging this assemblage of savages and slaves. This affair, however, having then come to an issue, cannot now be considered as a ground to justify the recent outrages of General Jackson in Florida, because the fort has long since been destroyed; and whatever may have been the individual omission or failure of the Governor of Florida, the proper recourse was to his Government, to punish him if he deserved it, or to obtain a suitable reparation for the injury complained of.

Thirdly. "That, at an early period of his operations, General Jackson had given full notice of their object to the Governor of Pensacola, warning him that every attempt on his part to succor the Indians, or prevent the passage of provisions for the American troops, would be viewed as acts of hostility; and that, in defiance of this admonition, the Governor of Pensacola did both give succor to the Indians, and delay the passage of the provisions to the American army." Strange, indeed, must it appear to the whole world that General Jackson should arrogate to himself the authority of issuing orders and imposing restrictions on the Governor of Pensacola, when he should have confined himself to the communication of positive facts and unquestionable proofs of the offences committed by the Indians, and to a request of the co-operation of the Governor for the punishment and reparation of the injury. The Spanish Governor, un-influenced, however, by this dictatorial summons, proceeded, by every means in his power, to carry into effect the demands of the General. But the assertion of his having given succor to the Indians, and delayed the passage of provisions for the American troops in the Escambia, is wholly without foundation; the very reverse is proved by the official correspondence transmitted to me; and, in fact, such an assertion, lightly made, and unsupported by proof, is an additional insult to the person and public character of the Governor of West Florida, and a striking evidence of the animosity of the American commander. The Nos. 1, 2, 3, of the enclosed correspondence, evince extraordinary deference for the United States, and condescension for the General.

Fourthly. "That the Governor of Pensacola has caused it to be directly reported to the American General that Fort St. Mark had been threatened by the Indians and negroes, and expressed serious apprehensions, from the weakness of the garrison and defenceless state of the work, for its safety; and that this information was confirmed to the American general from other sources upon which he could rely." The Governor of Pensacola is wholly silent in his correspondence on the state of the fort; and, besides, it is a well-known fact, that neither that Spanish fort, nor any other in Florida, was ever attacked by the Indians and negroes alluded to.

Fifthly. "That, upon his entering the fort, unequal vocal evidence was evinced of the duplicity and unfriendly feeling of the commandant—evidence demonstrating, beyond the power of denial, that he had made himself, by every act in his power, a partner and accomplice of the hostile Indians, and of their foreign instigators." It is important that a charge of such a nature should be fully substantiated; and I, therefore, must request of you, sir, to have the goodness to transmit to me the documents in support of it. I repeat that, in such a case, the proper course was an application to the superior of that commandant that he might be tried according to law, and on the exhibition of the testimony and documents produced against him.

Sixthly. "That the same spirit of hostility to the United States was discovered by the Governor of Pensacola himself, by his refusal to permit, unless by the payment of exorbitant duties, the passage of provisions to the American army; by the reception and succors given to the Indians at various times; and, finally, by a letter which he sent to the American General, denouncing his entry into Florida as an aggression against Spain, and threatening, unless he should immediately withdraw from it, and should he continue what he thus styled aggressions, that he would repel force by force." I am wholly at a loss to comprehend how these expressions of the Governor of Pensacola can be deemed censurable. The passage of provisions or foreign troops through the territory and waters of the Floridas was strictly forbidden by the Spanish Government. The Governor of Pensacola had no authority to dispense with this regulation in any case whatever; and he, therefore, gave a proof of extreme condescension in favor of the American army, in permitting, on his own responsibility, the passage of the provisions, as appears by the documents above referred to, Nos. 1, 2, 3. The demand of payment of the duties fixed by the regulations and tariffs of the Spanish Government was an obligation impossible for him to evade without a criminal breach of duty. It is the first instance I have seen of a charge brought against an officer for the faithful discharge of his duty. In all events, the moment that the Governor of Pensacola signified to General Jackson his want of authority to grant his request, that General, or his Government, should have asked it of the Government of His Catholic Majesty.

Such are the grounds upon which General Jackson rests his justification, and which your Government appears to consider sufficient to exonerate him from any charge, and all responsibility to the United States, by reason of the invasion of West Florida; and these grounds, you add, are still further strengthened in favor of the General by the following facts: 1st. That "the charges alleged by General Jackson against the commandant of St. Mark's are not known even to have been denied." It would, indeed, have been difficult for him to have contradicted them without having first acquired a thorough knowledge of, and then minutely investigated, all the details connected with them. Nothing like this was allowed by the operations of General Jackson, who, in a moment, fell, like an impetuous conqueror, upon the chief place and military posts of Florida with his whole force, supported by a train of field and battering artillery—a train which can hardly have been thought necessary for battering the cabins of miserable Indians. 2d. That "the Governor of Pensacola assured General Jackson that the information received by him of the number of Indians who had been received and harbored at Pensacola was erroneous; and, notwithstanding this assertion, a large body of them were overtaken, surprised, and defeated by the forces of the United States, within one mile of Pensacola, within ten days after the time stated, in his letter to the Governor, of this assemblage of Indians at that place; nor was it until after that event that the Governor issued his proclamation for refusing them supplies, and gave them the advice under which eighty-seven of them surrendered themselves to the American officer; and that since their surrender there had been only two Indians in Pensacola, and those in jail, which was incorrect, as, besides the Alabama chief included in the capitulation, one wounded Indian was found in the fort of Barancas; and, further, that Holmes, a noted Red Stick chief, left Pensacola but the day before the American troops took possession, and a number of other Indians were seen, about the same time, within a few miles of Pensacola, and succeeded, with the aid of Spanish officers, in eluding the pursuit of the American troops." It seems to me that the bare recital of these trifling circumstances is sufficient to enable any one to judge of their utter insignificance. Let us suppose there were two or three, four or five, or several more Indians in Pensacola, or in any other Spanish post; and what is there remarkable or improper in that? What law or principle is there prohibiting the Governor of Pensacola from communicating with the Indians, and allowing them to bring in the usual supplies? The duty of the Spanish Governor was confined solely to withholding aid and assistance to the hostile Indians, and exhorting them all to preserve peace and abstain from any acts of injury or violence to the citizens of the United States. This duty he has religiously discharged; and nothing has yet been advanced that proves the contrary. Is it a crime to permit a wounded Indian, a wretched fugitive, disarmed and defenceless, to take refuge under the protection of Spain, and avoid the fate impending over his whole nation? Is it a crime to show humanity to such unfortunates, and not deliver them up to punishment? A different conduct ought surely to be considered a crime and an eternal disgrace.

And here I would not be understood as denying the cruelties exercised by the savages, or the horrors committed by them on the citizens of this Republic. I view with horror every act of barbarity and blind fury. Be pleased, however, sir, to compare the evils complained of with those which have, and do daily flow from those successive shoals of desperate adventurers, freebooters, assassins, and banditti, which have so long thronged from the American territory towards the adjoining provinces of the Spanish monarchy, and with the frightful swarms of corsairs, and pirates, who, after arming and equipping in the ports of this Republic, daily sail forth to infest the seas, destroy the Spanish commerce, and rifle every defenceless vessel they meet. To yourself and to the whole world it is notorious what deplorable atrocities have been committed by these barbarous and bloody wretches. I leave it to you to decide whether there can be any comparison between these excesses and those alluded to by General Jackson in his proclamation.

In fine, the very reasons assigned by General Jackson in justification of his conduct serve only to enhance its enormity. How can personal piques or disputes between subordinate officers possibly justify the invasion of a province, with all the apparatus and the fury of war, in the midst of peace? How can they justify the effusion of blood, the bombardment and capture of its fortresses and strongholds? How! is General Jackson an independent sovereign, or is the commandant of St. Mark's, or the Governor of Pensacola? Should not every altercation, disagreement, or complaint between these officers have been submitted to their respective Governments, by them to be decided? Most assuredly they should; and I cannot refrain from repeating that outrages of such a nature admit neither excuse or palliation. I am fully persuaded that the President, as you assure me, gave General Jackson no orders or instructions to commit such acts of violence and injustice, nor to depart from the course which the President, in his Message to Congress of 24th March last, announced it was his intention to pursue. It therefore follows, by a necessary inference, that General Jackson acted upon the impulse of his own mind, and took upon himself, as you say, the whole responsibility.

It is very satisfactory to me to be informed by you that the President agrees to restore Pensacola to the possession of any person duly authorized on the part of Spain to receive it; also, the fort of St. Mark, as soon as a Spanish force sufficiently strong to hold it against the attack of the hostile Indians shall make its appearance for the same purpose. I shall lose no time in transmitting the answer of the President to my Government, in order that, on taking it into consideration in relation to that point, it may give such orders as may be required by the case. But with a view to prevent any difficulty in the execution of this just measure adopted by your Government, I have to request you, and, through your ministry, the President, to give the necessary orders to the American commandant and officers now holding that province to deliver it up to the Spanish Governor, officers, and troops, who may be duly authorized to receive possession of it. At the same time, I persuade myself that the President, being disposed to take this first step in making satisfaction to Spain, will not refuse such others as will make that satisfaction complete and effective. I therefore renew, in the name of the King, my master, my instant requests and reclamations of due reparation for all the losses and injuries sustained by the Crown and subjects of His Majesty in consequence of the proceedings of the American General and the troops under his command in Florida; and, moreover, of his lawful punishment, with that of any other officer who may appear to be responsible by his participation in the acts complained of.

On the other hand, I assure you, sir, that whatever complaint the Government of the United States may have against the Governor of Pensacola, the commandant of St. Mark's, or against any other Spanish military or civil officer, it will be promptly attended to by His Catholic Majesty's Government, and orders issued for any inquiry into their conduct; and should it satisfactorily appear to be reprehensible, they shall be punished with all the severity of the law.

In concluding this note, I forbear to repeat to you assurances of the sincere and strong desire of His Catholic Majesty to see all pending differences speedily brought to an amicable conclusion. You are aware that, in April last, I despatched a courier to my Government, with full information on the state of the negotiation, submitting, agreeably to what you stated to me, and with a view of expediting the proceeding, its final arrangement by the Ministry of the King, my master, and the Minister of the United States at Madrid. On the first official notice of the result of that proposition, although it has not yet had the desired effect, I have no doubt that we shall be able to come to an understanding by means of my new instructions, and agree on the basis of a treaty mutually satisfactory.

In the mean time, I confine myself to offering you the renewed assurance of my constant respect, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, April 15, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 25th of last month has been delivered to me, also that of the 16th, in answer to mine of the 16th of February preceding. I now have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of both, and to reply to the former.

In the month of May last, yielding to a spirit of conciliation, I gave permission to the schooner

Relations with Spain.

Victory, from New Orleans, to pass up the Escambia to the American fort with a cargo of provisions; prompted by the same sentiment, I gave a similar permission in January last to Captain Call, of the schooner Italiana, to proceed to the same place; and subsequently, pursuing the same friendly and conciliatory feeling, I allowed Lieutenant Eddy, belonging to the garrison of the fort above alluded to, who had been commissioned for that purpose by Major Youngs, the commandant, to supply himself here with sixty barrels of provisions. The cargo of the schooner Italiana being still deposited here, I conceive that the introduction of the further supply requested by your excellency is not necessary at present. Notwithstanding this, as I infer from your excellency's letter that the said provisions are now on the way, and am disposed to grant the same indulgence as heretofore, while it is not less my duty to enforce the established regulations and restrictions, which require that the supplies should be consigned to a Spanish trading-house, which will undertake to forward them and secure the payment of the royal import and export duties, I will give permission for them to pass in like manner as the first; it being, however well understood that, neither now nor hereafter, the United States can pretend to or acquire any right in consequence of these indulgences, which are perfectly gratuitous, and granted solely in consequence of existing circumstances, which, as your excellency states to me, prevent the arrival of supplies to the said Fort Crawford, through any other channel. In addition, you are pleased to remark that you are not disposed to enter into any discussion with me on the subject of the right which may be claimed by the United States to the free navigation of the Escambia.

To a discussion of this nature I am no less averse than your excellency; because it is one not within my province, and because it is my duty, as a subordinate officer, to conform to the orders of my superior; therefore, until I receive orders to the contrary, I am bound, in reference to this point, strictly to adhere to the existing treaties between the United States and Spain. On referring to the last treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, I perceive nothing that stipulates the free navigation of the river alluded to; but, on the contrary, that the sovereignty of the King, my master, in and over all the territories, coasts, rivers, ports, and bays, situate to the south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, is solemnly and explicitly acknowledged by the United States; and if, in consideration of the present extraordinary circumstances, further momentary concessions are required, I request your excellency to have the goodness to apply for that purpose, in future, to the authority on whom they may depend, as I am wholly unauthorized in this matter.

God preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, April 27, 1818.

SIR: Your letters of the 27th instant, dated Camp on the Escambia and Fort Crawford, enclosing a proclamation, were this day delivered to me at 3 o'clock P. M. by an artificer, (a man of color,) whose immediate return does not allow me at present to reply particularly to them; and I shall only state that the few peaceful Indians who were at this place and in its neighborhood left it on the 26th, and at daybreak several of them were murdered by the troops of the United States, and among them some women and children. As I am unable to account for this act, and the violation resulting from it, I have to inform you that I shall transmit an account of the whole transaction to my superior; and I hope that in the meantime you will not permit any further hostilities to be committed on any pretence in this territory; and, in case the Indians give any reason for complaint, that you will inform me of it, that I may chastise them for it, as far as it depends on my authority.

If there be Indians still remaining in this territory, I will have them sought for, and communicate your letter to them, and advise you of the result. I do assure you on my word that your statement of the aggressions committed by the Indians is the first intelligence I have had of it, and that when I agreed to the passage of the escort of which you speak, those Indians of whom Lieutenant Eddy was apprehensive were the only ones pointed out to me.

I must repeat to you that all my wishes and efforts are directed to preserving the peace happily subsisting between our Governments, and relying on your friendly sentiments towards me, I offer you in return the assurances of mine.

God preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, April 30, 1818.

SIR: In consequence of the request contained in your letter of the 27th instant, I assembled the principal chiefs of the Upper Creek towns of Colome, Canaan, Corvalle, and Forsythe, and communicated its contents to them; they all replied that they had long been very unhappy and miserable, without shelter or country; but that, at last, by the advice of a good friend, they had found one; that they all cheerfully adopted it, and were very grateful for the offers you had made them. These Indians amount to about eighty-seven, including women and children. I have settled that they should divide into two companies, and they will set out as soon as your answer is received, which they think it prudent to keep, as you will, when informed of their acceptance of your offer, be enabled to give proper orders for their safety on their journey, and their avoiding any unpleasant rencontre with the Choctaws, who, if not duly informed of it, might attack them; in which case, the measures taken for the peaceful arrangements that we both have so much at heart would be defeated.

Opahi-hola, an Alabamian chief, on account of his age and infirmities, will remain here for the present with his family. I have given orders for his relief, and pledge myself for his good behavior.

You will always find me ready to unite with you in such measures as may be beneficial to our respective countries, and are conformable to existing treaties. I renew the assurances of my respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 10th instant I received your letter of the 27th of April last, informing me that on board a small schooner detached from this port for Appalache there were found several articles of clothing, such as are used by the United States troops, and which you suppose were taken in the boat in which Lieutenant Eddy was unfortunately cut off, together with his escort. You inquire of me how I became possessed of those articles of clothing, and you proceed to state that you regret the necessity which compels you to inform me that, from written and other proofs obtained at St. Johns, the quantity of American cattle found at St. Marks, and the active communication kept up between the latter place and the hostile Indians, there appears sufficient ground to believe that they were encouraged and excited to this savage warfare against the United States by the Spanish officers. You add that there exist positive proofs that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Marks; and you conclude by declaring that shelter and protection have been given at this place to the persons and property of the Indians who are in hostility with the United States, and have fled from the American territory; that these facts, and the refusal to allow the passage of provisions for the supply of your troops, fully evince the unjust conduct of the Spanish agent in the Floridas.

To these several charges I shall reply in their order, frankly, unreservedly, and unequivocally. The first relates to the articles of clothing found on board the schooner Maria, and detained on the presumption of their being the property of the United States. A part of these, as is proved by the copy No. 1, was purchased at New Orleans in May last; a part came from Havana and a part was bought here; all which being fully substantiated, the charge is consequently disproved, and your inquiry satisfactorily answered. The second is more serious, and refers to the conduct of the commandant of St. Marks, at a recent period. I immediately demanded of him an account of his proceedings; his report of which is enclosed under the No. 2. But as I am desirous that you would bring forward unquestionable proof of the misconduct of that officer, I have to request you to furnish me with it, in order that, if his misconduct be established, he may receive condign punishment; hereby assuring your excellency, with that sincerity that belongs to me, that in such an event he has acted entirely contrary to his instructions; and that on receiving the evidence required he shall be tried by a court martial, and punished in an exemplary manner, according to the merits of the case. Your sense of equity will, however, satisfy you that the Spanish Government cannot be held responsible for the misconduct of its agents while it does not support them in it, nor tolerate their errors when proved. Your subsequent complaints are directed personally and pointedly against me, and relate to the shelter and protection alleged to have been afforded to the persons and property of fugitive Indians, and to the passage of provisions up the Escambia. The best mode of giving a satisfactory answer to these charges will be to offer you a brief and faithful statement of facts. With respect to the Indians, you have assuredly not been correctly informed; for, although some few remained permanently here, chiefly consisting of women and children employed in supplying the inhabitants with fish, fuel, and other trifling articles, and had been living here long before the present war with the Seminoles, it is a fact that, when I sent round to assemble them for the purpose of communicating to them the proposal of Major Youngs, their whole number amounted but to eighty-seven; and surely the small proportion of men among them unarmed, miserable, and defenceless, could not be considered as objects of hostility to the United States; a proof of which was shown in the continual passage of American citizens to this place, travelling unarmed and alone, without a single instance of accident happening either to their persons or property. In regard to the passage of provisions up the Escambia, so far from suspending it, I facilitated it, as far as depended on me, even to committing myself; since, as a subordinate officer, I could not becomingly allow a proceeding which was not fully authorized. I therefore, in consideration of circumstances, took that responsibility upon myself, as I stated to your excellency in my letter of the 15th ultimo, by Major Perault, to which I beg your reference. But, with a view to the benefit of this place, by means of a free intercourse with the interior, I hereby declare that in future the merchants and traders belonging to it shall pass freely from hence to Fort Crawford, and other places on the frontier, and transport all necessary supplies, either by land or water; by which means it is to be expected they will be abundantly provided, and your excellency entirely satisfied.

In offering you these explanations and details, I flatter myself I have given so full and satisfactory an answer to your excellency's letter as to leave no doubt of the sincerity of my intentions, and at the same time to have presented a certain pledge that it is my earnest wish to contribute, by every means in my power, to the maintenance of the good understanding happily subsisting between our two Governments. God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

HIS EXCELLENCY ANDREW JACKSON.

Pensacola, 31st May, 1818. A true copy of the original deposited in the office of the secretary of the government of this Province, under my charge.

CARLOS REGGIO.

Secretary of State to Don Louis de Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, August 24, 1818.

SIR: I have received your letters of the 27th ultimo and of the 5th instant, with their respective enclosures, all of which have been laid before the President. With regard to the two vessels alleged to have been equipped at New York for the purpose of cruising under the flag of Buenos Ayres against Spanish subjects, the result of the examination which has taken place before a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States has doubtless convinced you that no prosecution commenced by the Government of the United States against the persons charged with a violation of their laws and their neutrality could have been necessary or useful to you, no transgression of the law having been proved against them.

It would be equally superfluous and unreasonable to pursue the discussion with you relative to the proceedings of the American Commander-in-Chief in entering Florida, and his conduct there, and to the misconduct of the Governor of Pensacola and of the commandant of St. Marks in aiding and abetting the savage enemies of the United States, whom Spain had, by solemn treaty, bound herself to restrain by force from committing hostilities against them. But you will permit me to observe that the obligation of Spain was positive and unqualified, and that an attempt to evade its force by the allegation that Spain could not carry it into effect until she knew what hostilities they had committed, and the possible causes of or provocations to them, would be equally unwarranted by the express terms of the article, and by the intentions of the contracting parties to the treaty. The stipulation of Spain was, not to punish her Indians for murders committed upon the aged and the infirm, the women and children of the United States, but to restrain them by force from committing them; and the insinuation that the Indians themselves had been provoked to such atrocious acts would be as disingenuous on the part of Spain to escape from the sacred duties of her compact as it would be unfounded in point of fact.

The letter from General Jackson to the Governor of Pensacola, a copy of which was transmitted to you in mine of the 23d ultimo, and its answer, were written, not as you allege, at the turbulent period of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, but, as their dates will show, more than a year after the conclusion of the peace. The fort had been built upon Spanish territory, under the sufferance of Spanish authorities, by British officers, during the war, for annoyance against the United States. After the peace it remained the stronghold of fugitive negro and Indian robbers and murderers, which the Governor of Pensacola, when summoned by General Jackson to destroy, alleged his inability to do it without reinforcement and further orders, which, as the event proved, were never received.

I have the honor to inform you that orders have already been forwarded to the commanding officers at Pensacola and St. Marks to deliver up those places, conformably to the notice in my letter to you of the 23d ultimo, to the former Governor of Pensacola and commandant of St. Marks, respectively, or to any person duly authorized from you or from the Governor General of the Havana to receive them.

I am further instructed by the President to assure you of the satisfaction with which he has seen, in the last paragraph of your letter, your expectation of being speedily enabled to make proposals containing the basis of a treaty which may adjust, to mutual satisfaction, all the existing differences between our two nations, and his earnest hope that this expectation, in the fulfilment of which this Government have confided, and adopted measures corresponding with it, may be realized at an early day.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, sir, your very humble and obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

BRISTOL, September 11, 1818.

SIR: I have received your official note of the 24th of August last, in reply to mine of the 5th of that month and 27th of July preceding; and I coincide with you in opinion that it is superfluous to continue the discussion on the conduct of the American General in the invasion of Florida, since the simple knowledge of acts of this description and notoriety sufficiently indicates that justice which I am persuaded cannot be dissembled in the view of unprejudiced reason.

I shall, therefore, not dwell further on the well-founded arguments and documents I have produced in my notes on this subject; but, merely referring to them, I have to insist on, and demand of the Government of the United States that most just satisfaction which I have already required of them, in the name of my Sovereign, and is imperiously claimed by the integrity of his monarchy and the honor of his Crown.

I immediately communicated to my Government the determination which you did me the honor to state to me, that orders had been given to the American commanding officers to deliver up the posts of Pensacola and St. Marks to such Spanish authorities as might be duly appointed to receive them, that it may, on a knowledge of that fact, adopt the measures requisite to the case.

Anxiously desirous to see the basis of a treaty established to the satisfaction of both Governments, I await the result of the negotiation pending, as you know, at Madrid, (information of which must soon be received here,) that we may proceed in conformity to it; and, it being fully evinced that the King, my master, has the most earnest wish to do what may be agreeable to this Republic, even to the diminution of his own interests, as far as is compatible with his honor and dignity, I doubt not that, in one shape or another, we may attain the most equitable mode of effecting a settlement on terms mutually satisfactory.

I reiterate the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States in Spain, to Mr. Adams, dated

MADRID, February 10, 1818.

The King has lately made large grants of land in East Florida to several of his favorite servants. I am credibly informed that, within these few days, he has, by a sweeping grant, given all the remainder to the Duke of Alagon, captain of his guards, and the Count of Punon Rostro, one of his chamberlains. This is, perhaps, his mode of preparing for a cheap cession of the territory to the United States.

MADRID, February 26, 1818.

The King has lately made large grants of land in the Floridas to several of his favorite servants. The enclosed papers (A and B) have been furnished to me as extracts from the deeds to the principal grantees—the Duke of Alagon, captain of the body guards, and the Count of Punon Rostro, one of the chamberlains. Mr. Vargas, treasurer of the household, has another grant. In fine, I am led to believe that His Majesty has given away the whole of the lands in that quarter which had not been previously granted.

All the uncultivated land not ceded in East Florida, which lies between the banks of the river St. Louisa and that of St. John, as far as the mouths by which they empty themselves into the sea, and the coast of the Gulf of Florida, and the adjacent islands, with the mouth of the river Hijuelos, in the twenty-sixth degree of latitude, following the left bank up to its source, drawing a line from Lake Macao, and then descending along the road from the river St. John to the Lake Valdes, crossing another line from the extreme north of said lake to the source of the river Amurama, following its right bank as far as its mouth, in the twenty-eighth and twenty-fifth degrees of latitude, and running along the seacoast, with all the adjacent islands, up to the mouth of the river Hijuelos.

To the Count of Punon Rostro.

All the uncultivated land not ceded in Florida, comprehended between the river Perdido to the west of the Gulf of Mexico, and the rivers Amurama and St. John, from Poca, until they empty themselves into the sea on the eastern side; by the north, the line of demarcation with the United States; and on the south by the Gulf of Mexico, including the desert islands on the coast.

MADRID, April 5, 1818.

In my despatch No. 60, [of February 26,] I mentioned the grants of land in Florida lately made by the King of Spain to several of his courtiers, and enclosed extracts from those in favor of the Duke of Alagon and the Count of Punon Rostro. I have just now obtained a copy of that in favor of Don Pedro de Vargas, treasurer of the household, and it is herewith transmitted. I hope soon to be able to obtain full copies of the grants to Alagon and Punon Rostro.

THE KING:

My Governor and Captain General of the island of Cuba and its district, Don Pedro de Vargas, under date of the 25th of January last, manifested to me as follows:

"SIRE: Don Pedro de Vargas, knight of the royal military order of Alcantara, treasurer general of the royal house and patrimony of your Majesty, with the most profound respect, at your royal feet exposes: That there is a quantity of vacant and unpeopled land in the Territory of the Floridas, and desiring that if your Majesty shall deign to reward his passable services, and the proofs which he has given of his loyalty, it may be without the least burden on the public treasury, or in the prejudice of any third person, as may be done at present by some lands of that country, he beseeches your Majesty that, by effect of your sovereign goodness, you would deign to grant to him the property of the land which lies comprised within the following limits: that is to say, from the mouth of the river Perdido, and its bay in the Gulf of Mexico, following the seacoast, and ascending by the bays of Buen Socorro and of Mobile, continuing along the Mobile till it touches the northern line of the United States, and descending by that in a right line to the source of the river Perdido, and following the river Mobile in its lower part, and the bay of that name, returning by the seacoast towards the west, comprehending all the creeks, entries, and islands adjacent, which actually belong to Spain, till it reaches the west line of the United States, then, returning by their northern line, comprehending all the waste lands which belong, or may belong to Spain, and which are in dispute or reclamation with the United States, according to the tenor of the treaties; and, also, all the waste land not ceded to any other individual, which is between the river Hijuelos, in East Florida, and the river St. Lucia, drawing a line from the source of one river to the source of the other, and following, by the coast of the Gulf of Mexico, from the mouth of the Hijuelos to the point of Tancha, and, doubling this, by the coast of the Gulf of Florida, to the mouth of the river St. Lucia, with the islands, &c., adjacent."

Considering the contents of this exposition, and attending to the merit of the individual, and his accredited zeal for my royal service, as also to the advantages to result to the State from peopling the said countries, I have thought proper to accede to the favor which he solicits, in as far as it be not opposed to the laws of these my dominions, and I communicated it to my Council of the Indies, for its fulfilment, in a royal order of the 2d of February last. Consequently, I command and charge you, by this my royal scroll (cedula), that, conforming to the laws which regulate in these affairs, and without prejudice to third persons, you efficaciously aid the execution of the said grant or favor, taking all the measures which may conduce to its due effect, as also to the augmentation of the population, agriculture, and commerce of the aforesaid possessions, giving account, from time to time, of the progress made; for this is my will, and that due notice shall be taken of this cedula in the Accountant General's Department of the Indies.

MADRID, April 26, 1818.

I perceive that Mr. Pizarro would be very glad to terminate it [the negotiation] here. In the meantime, I shall continue to work with him, to the end that his communications to Mr. Onis may be made as favorable as possible to a prompt adjustment of it at Washington. In this view, I asked him yesterday what had been said respecting Florida. He answered vaguely; but I perceived that there was some question of passing it to the United States in compensation for the claims. I therefore begged him to prepare, in his instructions to Mr. Onis, for a difficulty which must certainly arise if any "transaction" of that kind should be proposed; that the claims in question would probably be liquidated by the United States, in such form, by commission or otherwise, as might be most convenient to themselves; but that, finally, they must be paid out of the sale of the lands. Now, the King had lately given all those lands away, (as I had duly informed my Government;) to complete the "transaction," it would, therefore, be absolutely necessary that the whole of those grants should be cancelled. Mr. Pizarro here held me a long discourse about sovereignty, territorial property, &c. I told him that we had no difference of opinion about those distinctions, and the other matter connected with them, but that his error was in supposing we meant to pay for the sovereignty only. We did not estimate that so highly as he imagined. I enlarged very much upon whatever relates to these points, and brought him to consent that these grants might be cancelled, and indemnity given to the grantees in New Spain, or elsewhere. I say "brought him to consent"—I mean that he said enough to convince me that there will be no difficulty on this head. I am not so certain that I have induced him to send, by this courier, such instructions on it to Mr. Onis as may render another reference to his Government unnecessary; but I propose to see him again to-morrow, and to re-urge the matter.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated

MADRID, May 14, 1818.

In my last private letter (which was dated April 26) I related to you what passed between Mr. Pizarro and myself upon the subject of the grants of lands in the Floridas, lately made by the King, and I mentioned that I should see him the day following, and endeavor to press my opinion on that point in such way as, if possible, to obtain that he might in advance instruct Mr. Onis in conformity to it. I saw him on the 27th, as I proposed, before the departure of his courier; whether I produced the desired effect, or not, I cannot positively say; but, immediately after, he wrote to the Council of the Indies, in consequence of which the council sent orders to the Duke of Alagon and the Count de Punon Rostro, directing them not to make sales of the lands granted to them; this fact, which I had received through a private channel, I ascertained yesterday in conversation with Mr. Pizarro. I cannot find that the council has written to the other grantee, Vargas, but Mr. Pizarro said that it should have done so. Be that as it may, all sales made by the grantees are, ab initio, void, by the laws of the Indies; there are obligations, also, of a very onerous kind, imposed by those laws on all grantees, calculated, in fine, to produce the objects which such grants have in view, viz. the population and cultivation of the territory—obligations which grantees of large tracts (under a prohibition to make sale) cannot possibly fulfil; least of all such grantees as these, who, besides not having a cent, are overwhelmed with debt.

MADRID, June 12, 1818.

He [Mr. Pizarro] then entered into the principal matters in question, and, first, spoke of the limits on the side of Florida. He concluded this subject by saying that though the King, with a desire to accommodate himself to the views of the United States, had concluded to make the cession, and to make it as valuable as possible to the United States, as I had seen in the promptitude with which he had acted on my suggestion, and given orders to the Council of Indies relative to the late grants, (as particularly communicated to you in my private letters of May 14,) yet His Majesty was fully aware that the value of the public lands in the territory to be ceded would be infinitely beyond what the United States could demand under the head of indemnities; hence, it was reasonable to expect that the difference should be made up to him by concessions on the other side.

PALACE, July 8, 1818.

The First Secretary of State has the honor of transmitting to the Minister of the United States the copy of a paragraph of a note of the 7th of February, 1803, (and propositions which accompanied it,) to Don Pedro Cevallos; and he avails himself of this occasion to repeat the assurance of his consideration.

Copy of some paragraphs of a note directed to Don Pedro Cevallos, on the 7th February, 1803, by Mr. Charles Pinckney, Minister of the United States.

To obtain this, they have authorized me to say that, should His Majesty be now inclined to sell to the United States his possessions on the east side of the Mississippi, or between that and the river Mobile, (agreeably to the propositions enclosed,) the United States will make to His Majesty, and I do now make, in their name, the important offer of guarantying to him and his successors his dominions beyond the Mississippi.

Propositions on the part of the United States.

1st. The United States will purchase the post-sessions of His Catholic Majesty on the east side of the river Mississippi, for which they will pay — dollars.

2d. They will purchase these possessions, for which they will pay — dollars; and, moreover, guaranty to His Majesty and his successors his possessions beyond the Mississippi.

3d. They will purchase the country between the rivers Mississippi and Mobile, belonging to His Catholic Majesty, and also places of deposit near the mouths of the other navigable rivers passing from their territory through either of the Floridas, for which they will pay — dollars, or enter into other obligations which may be thought equivalent to the acquisition.

4th. If neither of these propositions can be acceded to, they will then purchase certain tracts of country on the banks of the Mississippi, and the other rivers passing from their territory into that of His Catholic Majesty, for which they will pay — dollars, or enter into other obligations which may be thought equivalent to the acquisition.

Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of yesterday's date, enclosing a paragraph from a note addressed to this Government on the 7th of February, 1803, by Mr. Pinckney, at that time Minister of the United States at this Court, together with certain proposals of the same Minister, to which the paragraph cited refers.

Though I find that these proposals are as explicit in their form as your excellency in conversation stated them to be, yet I also find, as I presumed, that they were not made or renewed by the special mission which treated with Mr. Cevallos in the year 1805, and that they do not affect and cannot receive any application to the great questions now under consideration. They, in fact, offer the United States as guarantee of His Majesty's possessions on the right bank of the Mississippi, in part consideration for cessions which he was to make of the whole of his then possessions, or certain districts of them to the eastward of that river; but posterior to this offer, namely, on the 30th April, 1803, the greater part of the territory thus proposed to be purchased, and the whole thus proposed to be guaranteed, passed into the possession of, and now make part of the United States. Thus the state of possession in that quarter having been changed, the motive to guaranty on one side, and the necessity to receive a guaranty on the other having ceased, all that passed upon the subject heretofore is as though it were obliterated from the records.

The only security which occurs to me as possible to be stipulated, under present circumstances, is that of the thirty leagues desert, which I mentioned in our two last conversations; and, in fact, this kind of material security in transactions between two great nations ought, according to my apprehension, always to have the preference over the other kind of stipulations; for, though such stipulations should be most religiously observed, even in the extreme cases wherein, by the universal practice of nations, they are deviated from or altogether dispensed with, yet, in the still greater extremity of war, they cease to be binding, of course, and cannot be renewed but after the war, and then the inducement to renew them may have ceased; whereas the material security of which I speak always remains. War does not cultivate deserts, but it makes them. However, these and other important considerations belonging to the subject will be duly deliberated on by His Majesty's Government. I can only say that, if my suggestion should be adopted, I shall be ready to put it into form, and with that I consider that the only great difficulty to a happy termination of our differences is removed.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

PALACE, July 9, 1818.

SIR: In several late conferences with you I have had the honor to manifest to you the regrets of His Majesty that it had not been possible yet to terminate the discussions depending between the two Governments, as His Majesty flattered himself might be done in consequence of the instructions given to his Minister Plenipotentiary, especially since, on the part of the King, there had not been, nor is there, any objection to carry into effect the arrangement of the indemnities reciprocally claimed by Spaniards and Americans; nor to proceed to the settlement of limits upon grounds conforming to the treaties and to continual and uninterrupted possession; nor for Spain to cede to the United States the two Floridas for a reasonable equivalent exchange in territory to the west of the Mississippi; nor, finally, in case of not being able to come to accord on all the pending questions, and especially those of limits, to refer to the arbitration or mediation of one, two, or more Powers, friends of both parties, without preventing, after the limit which should appear to be just should be settled by such arbitration or mediation, that we should proceed to effect, by means of the same mediation; or without it, if it should accommodate the United States, an exchange of the two Floridas for equivalent territory to the west of the Mississippi.

The King thought of this arbitration as the most certain and prompt mean of terminating the discussion of limits, each party exposing before the arbitrating or mediating Powers the title or grounds on which it rested its rights and pretensions; and he has not been able to change his opinion on seeing the answer given upon this point by the Secretary of State of the United States to Don Luis de Onis; for, in the proposal made by that Minister Plenipotentiary, by express order of His Majesty, respecting said mediation or arbitration, there has not been, nor is there, question, as Mr. Adams seems to suppose, of inviting the United States to take part in relations or ramifications belonging to any interests of the European Powers, nor in what he calls the labyrinth of their politics, but merely that one or more impartial Governments, friendly to both parties, should take cognizance of the data of fact and right on which they found respectively the demarcation of limits which each pretends to substantiate; which measure is, in effect, the same as that which the United States adopted in its last treaty with Great Britain for adjustments of a similar kind, there being no other difference between the two cases but in the greater or less importance of the territories in dispute.

In this state of things, and His Majesty animated with the most efficacious desire to employ whatever means are in his power to terminate satisfactorily all and every one of the points in question, I represented to His Majesty that you and I, in our late conferences, had been of opinion that it might contribute to facilitate the arrangement of those points on which, hitherto, both Governments have not been able to come to accord, to carry forthwith into effect that on which they are already agreed; that is, the settlement of the reciprocal indemnities of Americans and Spaniards which were the object of the convention of 1802, for which only was wanting the ratification on the part of Spain, suspended for reasons and by circumstances which are notorious. The King instantly applauded this suggestion of mine and yours, and, desirous of giving to the United States efficient proofs of his desire of an arrangement on all the points, commanded me immediately to draw out a ratification of the said convention of August 11, 1802, to be sent to Don Luis de Onis, to the end that he may present the same, and exchange it for that of the United States; and I have the honor to enclose the adjoined copy for your due information.

The termination of this point, already agreed on, in no respect can embarrass the ulterior progress of the negotiation upon the others; and if Don Luis de Onis, pursuant to his first instructions, or to the explanations which subsequently on two occasions have been given to him, or because the Government of the United States has reduced its demands to terms more compatible with the rights of Spain, shall, on the arrival of said ratification, have already settled this point conjointly with the others, there will not therefore result any kind of embarrassment or contradiction, since the recognition of the reciprocal indemnities between Spaniards and Americans, and the mode of liquidating them, (the only objects comprehended by the convention of 1802,) will always have to enter in the new arrangement which may have been effected or may take place; and only in the manner of paying the debt which shall result from the liquidations made can there be or arise hereafter any alteration, in case the territorial arrangements should be combined with the other indemnifications.

His Majesty hopes that the United States will see in this measure a proof of his friendly dispositions, and, if he may flatter himself with others equal and reciprocal on the part of the Government of the United States, he does not doubt that shortly will disappear the difficulties which hitherto have opposed themselves to the desired arrangements. The political, commercial, and territorial interest of the United States and Spain are not opposed to each other; extraneous circumstances, and independent, perhaps, of the will of both Governments, have been able to complicate and embarrass their political relations; a sincere desire to understand each other, and to approximate cordially, each ceding something of that which he supposes that he has a right to exact of the other, may perhaps be the commencement of a new order of things, in which the Government of Spain and that of the United States, far from occupying themselves in disagreeable discussions, will mutually contribute to augment the prosperity and well-being of both nations.

No occupation will be to me more agreeable than that of employing my weak efforts in serving the King, my master, in so interesting an object; and I should not do the justice which I owe to your rights, and conciliatory and friendly dispositions, if I were not persuaded that you will lay the whole before your Government in the same temper.

As Don Jose Martinez, who came from the United States last month with despatches from Don Luis de Onis, is to return thither, I notify you thereof, that you may, if you please, profit of this opportunity to send yours to that country.

I renew to you, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Copy of the ratification given by His Catholic Majesty to the convention settled on the 11th of August, 1802, between Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State and Despatch, as Plenipotentiary of Don Carlos IV., and Mr. Charles Pinckney, as Plenipotentiary of the United States of America.

Whereas, on the 11th day of August, 1802, there was concluded and signed in Madrid, between Don Pedro Cevallos, First Secretary of State of the King, my august father and lord, and Mr. Charles Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of my great and good friends the United States of America, competently authorized thereto by their respective Governments, a convention, which had for its object the reciprocal indemnity for losses, damages, and injuries which had accrued during the war then concluded, in consequence of excesses committed by individuals of both nations against the law of nations or the existing treaty; and no determined time having been fixed for the correspondent ratification, the said convention was ratified by the President of the United States, with consent of the Senate of the same, a year and a half after its conclusion; and on the part of Spain the ratification was further deferred, on account of the desire manifested to regulate at one and the same time, not only the points determined on by the said convention, but also those which had remained undecided on in the same, and others of a different nature, though of not less importance, which could not take effect on account of posterior occurrences in Spain, which are quite notorious; and I, now considering that in the present circumstances to carry forthwith into pure and due effect the stipulations of the said convention of 11th August, 1802, far from impeding the course and desired termination of the other questions depending between the two Governments, may contribute to facilitate the most prompt and satisfactory arrangement of all of them, and having seen and examined the said convention, which contains seven articles, the form and tenor of which is as follows:

Therefore have concluded to approve and ratify whatever the said convention contains in its seven articles, as in virtue of these presents I do approve and ratify, in the best and most ample form that I can, promising, on the faith and word of a King, to fulfil it and observe it, and to cause it to be fulfilled and observed, wholly, as though I myself had made and signed it. In testimony whereof, I have ordered to be despatched the present, signed with my hand, sealed with my secret seal, and attested by my underwritten Councillor and First Secretary of State and Despatch. Given in Madrid this 9th of July, 1818.

MADRID, July 16, 1818.

SIR: It was not till the evening of the 13th instant that I had the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 9th, communicating to me a copy of His Catholic Majesty's ratification of the convention made between the United States and Spain on the 11th August, 1802.

In the late conferences which I have had with you, I have received with great satisfaction the assurances which you have given to me of your sincere desire to terminate, by a general arrangement, all the questions in discussion between our two Governments. I do full justice to the conciliatory dispositions of your excellency, and am persuaded that the pressing importance of such an adjustment has not escaped your enlightened mind; but, however painful may be the disappointment of His Majesty at finding that a favorable conclusion to the negotiations has not resulted from the instructions heretofore sent to Don Luis de Onis, I cannot but remind you that I have not omitted to assure His Majesty's Cabinet, through you, that those instructions would be found to be wholly inadequate to the object. The causes of their failure are so perfectly apparent in the correspondence between the Minister and the Secretary of State of the United States, which, by order of the President, has been laid before Congress, that I may be excused from entering further into the matter.

I receive with pleasure whatever may contribute to the great object in view; and though the convention of 1803 embraces but a portion of the claims of the United States of the same nature, yet, considering it as a preliminary to a similar adjustment of the whole of such claims, as well as of those for French spoliations specially reserved by it, and trusting that it may, as your excellency hopes, lay a foundation for an amicable settlement of the territorial questions now in discussion, I have lost no time in transmitting a copy of your communication to my Government.

I understand, also, with your excellency, that this ratification can be no obstacle to any general transaction on the whole of the matters in dispute which may be hereafter made, and that it is not to interfere with, but to be made wholly subordinate and subservient to, whatever arrangement Mr. Onís may possibly have entered into with my Government, in pursuance of the instructions which you have lately sent to that Minister.

I desire to avail myself of your obliging offer to transmit my despatches for the United States by Don Jose Martinez, and request that you will be pleased to inform me when that gentleman will leave Madrid.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

SACEDON, July 19, 1818.

SIR: In one of our late conferences I had the honor to state to you anew His Majesty's readiness to cede both of the Floridas to the United States, the acquisition of which appeared to be so essential to the growth and prosperity of the American Union, in consideration of a suitable equivalent to be made to His Majesty in a district of territory situated to the westward of the Mississippi. In adverting to the great importance of this cession, I was naturally led to recall to your recollection the contents of different notes addressed by the Minister of the United States, Mr. Charles Pinckney, to His Majesty's Government upon this subject, and particularly of that of the 7th of February, 1803, in which, having earnestly solicited, as he had already done in several preceding notes, the decision of His Majesty to sell to the American Government both Floridas, or at least that part of West Florida lying between the Mississippi and the Mobile, he offered formally, in the name and on the behalf of the United States, not only to pay in money the value of the territory so ceded, but that the United States, in case the said cession should take effect, would further guaranty to the King and his successors his dominions situated beyond the Mississippi. The cession of the two Floridas being one of the objects contemplated in the proposed adjustment, I stated to you that the contingency appeared to have approached, in consideration of which the formal offer had been made to His Majesty, on the part of the United States, of the guaranty of his dominions situated beyond the Mississippi, or otherwise beyond the western boundary line, to be agreed upon in the final adjustment; the guaranty of which, forming a part of the stipulations of that adjustment, would, in my opinion, be a more effectual means of facilitating the final conclusion of the points depending, not only from its essential importance, but as being the most conclusive evidence of a desire on the part of the United States to preserve and perpetuate a good intelligence with the Government of Spain; and the more agreeable to His Majesty, as being a spontaneous offer of the United States, on whose behalf the proposition was formally made without any previous transaction or request on the part of the Spanish Government.

Upon which you were pleased to state to me that you had no previous knowledge of the said offer of a guaranty being made by your predecessor on behalf of the United States, which you attributed to the dispersion and loss of a considerable part of the archives of the American legation at the time of the invasion of the French. I then offered to furnish you with a copy of the proposals made by Mr. Pinckney, and of that part of the note of 7th February, 1803, which enclosed them and specified their object; which copies were sent to you on the 8th instant.

In your answer of the 9th, you were pleased to acknowledge the receipt of those copies, and at the same time you had the goodness to enter into the subject-matter, not only on the particular point of the proffered guaranty, but you also offered other observations connected with the matters depending between the two Governments, the adjustment of which is so interesting to both countries.

In adverting to your observations, you will permit me to remark that I cannot agree with you so far as to persuade myself that the guaranty offered to His Majesty by the United States, on the 7th of February, 1803, in case of his disposition to sell to them the Floridas, or a part of West Florida, was confined to the guaranty of the left bank of the Mississippi, or of Western Louisiana, as you conceive; and that the United States having acquired the whole of Louisiana by the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, and the territory offered to be guaranteed having been severed from His Majesty's dominions, the said offer had been annulled, or become extinct of itself, or by the want of its particular object.

If you will take the trouble to examine attentively that offer and the proposals accompanying it, (for which purpose I think it proper to enclose a copy of the whole note of the 7th of February, 1803,) you will distinctly see that what the United States offered to guaranty to His Majesty was not the right bank of the Mississippi, but his dominions situated beyond the Mississippi—his dominions beyond the Mississippi, as expressed in the said note, or his possessions beyond the Mississippi, as expressed in the proposals. A proof that that offer embraced generally all the dominions of His Majesty in America, or at least on the continent of North America, is the great importance attached in the same note to the offer, which would have been not only unimportant, but delusive and of no value, if applied to the western bank of the Mississippi; which, independent of its being sufficiently guarantied by its local position, had been, as was well known in February, 1803, retroceded to France some three years before, and that Mr. Monroe was at Paris, or on his way thither, to acquire it from France, whose sovereignty was already acknowledged by the United States. It is, therefore, evident that the guaranty offered must have been of the territories on the North American continent belonging to His Majesty, to the westward of the Mississippi, and of Louisiana, which no longer belonged to Spain at the time the said offer was made; and nothing so clearly evinces the understanding of the United States and of Mr. Pinckney as the very expressions employed by him in his note to prove the magnitude of the offer. He says: "The immense importance of this offer to the Crown of Spain merits the serious consideration of His Majesty and his Ministers, when we reflect that no other nation can make an offer so highly advantageous. It is one which the United States would never have decided on making, but from a conviction that the territories they now solicit of Spain are indispensably necessary to them."

You can judge how far these expressions were applicable in February, 1803, to the guaranty of the right bank of the Mississippi, which no longer belonged to His Majesty since 1800, which was retroceded to France, and the acquisition of which by the United States was then negotiating at Paris, by Mr. Monroe; and whether their obvious and literal meaning and the magnitude of the object of the guaranty could be applicable to anything other than that of all the possessions of His Majesty in America, or at least of the dominions of Spain on the continent of North America westward of the Mississippi, in exchange for the advantages which the United States contemplated on deriving by the purchase of the two Floridas, or at least that part of West Florida lying between the Mississippi and the Mobile. You cannot, therefore, be surprised that, as His Majesty is now deliberating on a general adjustment with the American Government, including an article by which it is proposed to cede the two Floridas to the United States for a suitable equivalent to the westward of the Mississippi, he should advert to the formal offer of a guaranty made by the United States, for this special purpose, of his dominions and possessions beyond the Mississippi, (that is, beyond the western line stipulated in the same general adjustment,) as the boundary between the American territories and those of His Majesty on the continent of North America.

In consequence of the abovementioned note of Mr. Pinckney, and the communication made to His Majesty's Government by the Government of the United States on the 7th of February, 1803, I deem it necessary further to remark that, in 1803, nearly three years after His Majesty had ceded back Louisiana to France, and when Mr. Monroe was about concluding the purchase of Louisiana at Paris with the Government of Bonaparte, the American Government admitted, in the most formal manner, that the territory situated between the Mississippi and the Mobile belonged to His Catholic Majesty, and formed a part of West Florida, and not of Louisiana, as it has since been wished to be supposed, His Majesty having been violently deprived of the peaceful possession of the same, during his absence from the kingdom. You will be pleased, sir, to recollect that while Mr. Monroe was negotiating the purchase of Louisiana at Paris, in 1803, Mr. Pinckney at Madrid solemnly offered the King of Spain the guaranty of his dominions beyond the Mississippi, in case His Majesty would agree to sell to the United States at least the territory lying between the Mississippi and the Mobile belonging to His Catholic Majesty—they will purchase the country between the rivers Mississippi and Mobile belonging to His Catholic Majesty. It is impossible more explicitly to acknowledge the sovereignty of His Majesty over that territory, in addition to the acknowledgment implied by the very act of applying to the King for the purchase of it, since no one purchases but of the owner of the object wished to be purchased. If the territory in question had belonged to France as an integral part of Louisiana, would it not have been more natural that Mr. Monroe should have negotiated the purchase of it at Paris, where he then was, than that Mr. Pinckney should have solicited it at Madrid at the same time? His Majesty, therefore, taking into consideration the important fact that his right of sovereignty to the said territory remains unimpaired, notwithstanding his being dispossessed of the same under well-known circumstances, he cannot omit to declare, on all occasions, that it never has been nor will be his intention to relinquish his claim to his rights in that quarter, while he is at the same time willing, by means of a suitable arrangement in the proposed adjustment, or for a satisfactory equivalent, to cede the said territory, together with the rest of the Floridas, to the United States, as well from a desire to meet their wishes, as from a conviction of its importance to the American Government, as was formerly stated in the strongest terms by Mr. Pinckney in his note just referred to.

You are pleased to point out in your note, as a mode for settling the question of boundaries more certain than that of any guaranty, the establishment of a desert of thirty leagues between the frontier of Louisiana and that of the Spanish possessions. Although His Majesty has a due respect for the good faith and strict punctuality of the American Government, yet he does not perceive any security preferable to the guaranty, nor that there would be any difficulty in connecting the one with the other; and, with a view to avoid disagreements on the frontiers, in stipulating the establishment of such a desert, provided both Governments could agree on the requisite measures for preventing this intermediary desert from being converted into a rallying point for adventurers and banditti, where they might exercise their pernicious activity in disturbing the peace of His Majesty's dominions as well as that of the United States. But the principal difficulty still subsists, namely: that although the establishment of this desert might be considered expedient, yet we may not agree on the exact line of division, keeping in view the rights of each party to the territory west of the Mississippi, and to that which ought to afford to His Majesty in that quarter an equivalent for the two Floridas, which are proposed to be ceded to the United States in consideration of such equivalent.

If I rightly comprehend your verbal communications relative to the establishment of this intermediary desert, I persuade myself that the understanding is, that the thirty leagues intended to be comprehended in it will be fixed to the eastward of the bay of St. Bernard; and, under the impression that in your note of the 9th instant you offer to enter into official explanations upon these subjects, I invite you, in the name of union and good understanding, to be pleased to present them to me; since, although I consider the communications which you had the goodness to make to me in your abovementioned note as important, I hitherto conceive them to be only verbal communications resulting from the intimation you were pleased to give me. I therefore hope that you will be so good as to present its contents in a more formal shape, in the expectation that the employment of your talents and good wishes, combined with my earnest endeavors, may finally terminate these painful disputes on principles mutually honorable and satisfactory.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my very distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro, dated

MADRID, July 22, 1818.

The convention had scarcely been ratified, when I was alarmed by information, which I received from a good source, that the King had rescinded the prohibition placed on the late grantees of land in Florida, as communicated to you by my private letter of May 14. On this occasion I wrote a confidential note to Mr. Pizarro, pointing out the evil to result from such a procedure. He replied to me in a way to tranquillize me, and to confirm my opinion of his good faith. Copies of that correspondence are herewith enclosed.

MADRID, July 18, 1818.

Your excellency will recollect that Messrs. Alagon, Punon Rostro, and Vargas, were placed by an office from the Department of Indies under certain prohibitions relative to the land given to them by the King. Those prohibitions were considered by you and by me as annulling the grants; on the importance of this measure we are already agreed. Now I am informed that Mr. Vargas has received another office from the same department, (Indies,) by which office the difficulty with regard to him is removed; that is, he is actually free to sell the lands in question, or to profit of them, (always in conformity to the laws,) as may best suit them. I know not whether Messrs. Alagon and Punon Rostro have received similar offices; it is to be presumed. This news alarms me, because I foresee that this transaction will throw new difficulties in the way of the negotiation at Washington. It is in vain to expect that we shall arrive at a state of harmony without a transaction which shall embrace all the points in discussion. The cession of Florida must make necessarily an article in this transaction; and it is quite certain that the United States in such case cannot receive Florida as indemnity for its reclamations if all the cessions to individuals since the date of the convention (1802) are not annulled. According to a statement which I have just received through an indirect channel from Philadelphia, these reclamations may amount to the enormous sum of twenty-five millions of piastres.

The office written to Mr. Vargas is, I am persuaded, unknown to you, and cannot have resulted from our late accord relative to the convention; but your excellency will instantly perceive that it will take that character or appearance, and do infinite mischief. I have already informed my Government of what has passed between your excellency and me relative to the affair of Messrs. Alagon and others. Ought I at present to think that everything is changed since the ratification? I cannot too much lament the results. I yet hope that I may have been badly informed relative to the fact in question, but I have my information from a person who is interested with Vargas, one to whom he had ceded a portion of his interest in the land, before he received the first office. Be it as it may, knowing your excellency is in good faith, and that the affair is worthy of your attention, I have thought it my duty to expose it to you.

Yours, with much respect and esteem,
GEORGE W. ERVING.

SACEDON, July 19, 1818.

SIR: I have just received your esteemed letter which you addressed to me under yesterday's date, communicating to me your apprehensions respecting the alienation of the lands in Florida granted to several individuals. I repeat to you all that I have said on this subject; consequently, you may be tranquil, and I flatter myself that nothing will happen which can injure the negotiations with the Government of the United States, which ought to have been persuaded, long since, of the sincerity which directs the march and policy of the Spanish Government, and of its earnest desire of a happy termination of all the points in discussion, by means of a friendly arrangement. I renew to you, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

MADRID, July 24, 1818.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your excellency's note of the 19th instant, replying to mine of the 9th instant, which contains some remarks upon the proposals made to the Spanish Government by Mr. Pinckney, on the 7th February, 1803, and transmitted to me by your note of the 8th instant.

I declare to your excellency that, after the best consideration which I was able to give to those proposals, not having the archives of the legation to refer to, and correct my judgment whenever it might err, I was compelled to conclude that Mr. Pinckney was at that time uninformed of the retrocession of Louisiana to France, which had been previously made by Spain. On this hypothesis, I wrote to you on the 9th instant, and it will explain whatever may appear to you incongruous in that note. It was not possible for me otherwise to understand the offer made by Mr. Pinckney, because it was not possible to suppose that he had been authorized by the American Government, or that it had ever entered into his own imagination, to guaranty the possessions of His Majesty to the westward of Louisiana on both American continents, or even as far down as the isthmus of Panama. Besides that, such a guaranty was beyond the power of the United States, and therefore not worth the acceptance of Spain. He meant then what was within the reach and competency of the United States—a guaranty of that part of Louisiana which is on the right bank of the Mississippi. This is made still more evident by the words he used—"beyond the Mississippi;" for in the other supposition, and had he been aware of the transfer of Louisiana to France, he would have said "beyond Louisiana." Again, is it to be supposed that he could be treating for the purchase of territory on the left bank of the Mississippi, within the limits of Louisiana, when he knew that the whole province had passed into the hands of France? For, whatever claims Spain may yet make to that territory, it could not but be known to Mr. Pinckney that it was in fact a part of Louisiana. The conclusion which I have made is still further and more particularly forced upon me by Mr. Pinckney's fourth proposal, which is thus:

4th. "If neither of these propositions can be acceded to, they will then purchase certain tracts of country on the banks of the Mississippi, and the other rivers passing from their territory to that of His Catholic Majesty, for which they will pay," &c.

What certain tracts on the banks of the Mississippi could be purchased by Spain after Louisiana had been transferred to France? What rivers, passing through the territory of the United States, went into those of His Majesty? This part of the argument is confirmed by what your excellency says in your last note, to prove to me that Mr. Pinckney meant to offer a guaranty of all His Majesty's possessions. You observe that he could have meant only those immediately on the west bank of the Mississippi; for that "such an offer had been not only unimportant, but vain and illusory, applied to the west bank; which, besides being sufficiently guarantied by its locality, it was notorious in February, 1803, that it had been for three years then past retroceded to France." I say, then, that if this notoriety had reached Mr. Pinckney, he could not have mentioned the banks of the Mississippi as belonging to His Majesty, or have spoken of that and other rivers from the United States passing through his territory.

The opinion that Mr. Pinckney meant to guaranty all the possessions of Spain, you find to be confirmed by the great importance which he gives to that offer in the words which you quote from his note; but allow me to observe that, though he intended only a guaranty of that part of Louisiana which lies westward of the Mississippi, his proposal merits all the importance which he has given to it. Again; how could he pretend to offer to such a Power as Spain a guaranty of her possessions to the westward of Louisiana, knowing that the territory of such a Power as France interposed between the United States and the possessions to be guarantied? Such a proposal would have been preposterous and offensive.

These observations render it unnecessary for me to reply specially to the inferences which your excellency is pleased to draw in favor of the Spanish pretensions to East Florida from the offers made by Mr. Pinckney; for those offers, even though they had not originated in an acquaintance with, or a misapprehension of, the then state of affairs, cannot now impugn the right or affect the claims of the United States.

The context of Mr. Pinckney's note and proposals shows that he was then under an impression that His Catholic Majesty was yet master of Louisiana and the Floridas. He speaks of the banks of the Mississippi as he speaks of the Floridas, and equally acknowledges the sovereignty of His Majesty in both territories by proposing to purchase in both. But, whatever may have been his impressions, and whatever value might belong to such a kind of acknowledgment whilst Louisiana was in possession of France, these became of no importance after the province was transferred to the United States; for the claims of the United States do not rest upon the opinions of Mr. Pinckney, but on the transfer made by France.

I do but justice, then, to the good faith of the Spanish Government when I suppose that it declined Mr. Pinckney's offer because it had already disposed of the country proposed to be purchased, as well as of that proposed to be guarantied. I should not do justice to its political forecast if I could suppose that, being the sovereign of East Florida, it had declined to sell it for a reasonable equivalent in money, superadded to a guaranty ("inmensely important," as Mr. Pinckney well says) of His Majesty's remaining possessions on that continent. With respect more particularly to the guaranty, whatever might have been the disposition of Mr. Pinckney, or even of the American Government, at the epoch referred to, your excellency must be sensible that the relative state of possessions is at this time so altogether different, that no motive sufficiently powerful can be found to induce the United States to enter into any similar obligation as to any portion of His Majesty's territories west of Louisiana.

Referring to a suggestion made in my last note, as well as in our two previous conferences, respecting a desert of thirty leagues, between the confines of Louisiana and the Spanish possessions, as a better security than a guaranty, your excellency is pleased to inform me that though His Majesty thinks that no security is better than a guaranty, yet he has no objection that the one kind should be added to the other; and, though the principal difficulty remains, that is to say, where this desert shall be established, your excellency invites me to put my suggestion in the shape of a formal proposal. I beg leave to remind your excellency that, in my note of the 9th, I have said that this plan of a desert is the only kind of security which occurs to me. It was not then my intention, nor can it be now, as you will observe by what is above said, to add this to any other kind of security; nor was it my intention to offer this, but upon the supposition that His Majesty's Government should consent to the Colorado as the western limit of Louisiana, not doubting but, that point agreed on, we should be able to arrange all the others with great facility. I have no hesitation in expressing myself to your excellency in writing explicitly and frankly, as I have always done in conversation; and nothing would make me so happy as to unite my most earnest efforts with yours, directed by your conciliatory temper and superior intelligence, to bring to an honorable and harmonious conclusion the differences which unhappily exist between our two countries.

My Government will never consent, upon any consideration whatever, to give any guaranty to His Majesty of any part of his possessions; but I will undertake, on its part, to stipulate that a desert shall be placed between his possessions and those of the United States, if by that means we can arrive at an accord with regard to the western boundary, as well as on all the other existing questions; and, whenever your excellency will inform me that the pretension to receive any other species of security is withdrawn, I will then state where I propose that this desert should be placed.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Don Jose Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

SACEDON, July 26, 1818.

SIR: It is some days since this Government has received intelligence, in an unofficial way, that the American troops under the command of General Jackson had entered His Majesty's territory in the Floridas, and stating that he had demanded the surrender of the Spanish fort of St. Marks, at Appalache, the feeble garrison of which is said to have been surrendered to him as prisoners of war. Notwithstanding the circumstantial details of this intelligence, and the probability attached to them, from the recollection of what took place in 1810, in West Florida, to the westward of the Perdido, and more recently at Amelia Island, His Majesty could not persuade himself, that at the very time when he was so zealously and faithfully promoting, as must be evident to you, the satisfactory termination of the negotiations pending between the two Governments, the generals and officers of the United States would conduct themselves in so hostile a manner, by violating and attacking, in a state of profound peace, the territories and establishments of a friendly Power.

But subsequent confidential advices which have been received of these occurrences not only confirm the truth of former reports, but present circumstances of the most serious character respecting the violation of the Spanish territory, the capture of the fort of St. Marks, and the surrender of the garrison as prisoners of war; on which particular circumstance His Majesty finds himself under the necessity of demanding an immediate explanation of the Government of the United States. Information has also been received of an intimation of a most violent nature, made to the commandant of Pensacola by General Jackson, who seems to have taken an attitude indicating a determination to pursue the course of his unprovoked violence and aggressions.

The contrast presented by the moderate and friendly conduct of the Spanish Government with that of the American generals and officers in that quarter has excited feelings of the most painful kind in the mind of His Majesty; and as a final and solid arrangement can only be produced by the reciprocal combination of conciliatory dispositions on both sides, and as these dispositions do not appear, from a view of the facts and circumstances just alluded to, to be manifested by the United States, I have received His Majesty's commands to make this frank communication to you, in order that your answer may serve for his government upon the matter in question.

The King, nevertheless, entertains the hope that the American Government, actuated by those principles of justice which constitute the only real and solid support of all Governments, will not hesitate to disapprove proceedings which are not only repugnant to the laws of nations, and the principles which regulate the conduct of all civilized Powers, but, by the experience of all ages, not excepting our own, ultimately produce the most serious evils to those which commit them, or tolerate their commission. His Majesty therefore flatters himself that the Government of the United States, anxious to preserve its just reputation for good faith, will, in giving positive orders for the evacuation by the American troops of the fort of St. Marks and the whole Spanish territory, likewise take effectual measures to prevent the recurrence of similar proceedings, which, if authorized and countenanced, must inevitably produce a suspension of all negotiation.

Under this impression, I have to request that, if you are authorized to give any explanation upon these occurrences, you will communicate them to me for His Majesty's information; and, in case you are not, that you will have the goodness to transmit this communication to your Government, in order to obtain an answer which may fix His Majesty's ideas upon a subject of such high importance, and direct his views in relation to the definitive negotiation now carrying on, the prosecution of which must, in one way or other, be decisively influenced by the spirit in which these events are viewed by the American Government.

I reiterate to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro.

MADRID, July 27, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 22d instant, enclosing an entire copy of Mr. Pinckney's letter of February 7, 1803, adverted to, and intended to have been transmitted to me in your note of the 19th instant. On reading that letter, I remain confirmed in the opinion which I expressed to you in my reply of the 24th instant, that Mr. Pinckney could not have been aware, when he wrote it, of the retrocession to France which had been made by Spain. The manner in which he treats of the misconduct of the Intendant at New Orleans, and of the necessity thence arising of the United States acquiring a permanent establishment on the Mississippi, leaves not a possibility of supposing that he was acquainted with the transfer to France. Evidently, according to his understanding, New Orleans belonged to Spain; he of course considered Louisiana as belonging to Spain; hence his proposal to purchase certain tracts of that colony on the east bank of the Mississippi; and if such a virtual recognition of the sovereignty of Spain at that time in East Florida, founded on an unacquaintance with facts, could be worth anything, it were equally good as regards New Orleans, respecting which, indeed, it was more formal, for there he demanded the interposition of the Sovereign's authority to remedy an evil arising out of the misconduct of the Intendant.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro.

MADRID, July 28, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 26th instant, stating the unofficial and confidential information which has been given to this Government respecting the conduct of General Jackson in Florida. Being now for a long time without advices from my Government, I am wholly unable to give the explanation which you require; but shall not fail, in pursuance of your desire, to transmit to the United States, without loss of time, a copy of your communication. In the meanwhile, if your excellency can see any prospect of terminating, by a friendly arrangement, to be made either here or at Washington, the negotiations pending between the two Governments, I trust that these reports can be no obstacle to its success. It ought to be presumed that my Government, whose just sentiments His Majesty is well persuaded of, has acted on sufficient motives; or that, if its officers have transgressed its orders, their conduct will be disapproved of. The outrages and violence practised on the persons and property of American citizens for many years past, by governors and other officers of His Majesty in his American colonies, in contempt of the rights of individuals, of the law of nations, and the existing treaty, have excited the constant reclamations of the American Government, renewed by me in a note to you as late as the twelfth instant. Does your excellency's reply to that note give the satisfaction required? Yet the moderation and conciliatory policy of my Government has never relinquished the hope of obtaining, by conciliatory means, a reparation of the wrongs which it has suffered; and these have never been taken as a ground for suspending negotiation. However, then, the facts now in question may prove to have been, I hope that they will not be made an impediment to such an amicable prompt adjustment of all the points in discussion between the two countries as may remove all possibility of future collision, and lay the foundation of permanent friendship; and the less an impediment, as His Majesty having long since signified his disposition to cede Florida to the United States, the military operations which the United States may be forced to in the war made on them by the savages and others from that territory cannot be considered important as affecting the permanent interests of Spain.

I renew, &c.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

Don Jose Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, August 6, 1818.

SIR: I have received your esteemed note under date of the 28th of the last month, in reply to mine of the 26th of the same month, touching the positive, although as yet unofficial, information which this Government has respecting the entrance of the American army, under the command of General Jackson, into the Spanish territory, and the taking of the fort of St. Mark and its garrison as prisoners of war, with other circumstances as disagreeable as they are contrary to the laws of nations.

You are pleased to make known to me that you want information and instructions from your Government on this affair, and, consequently, that you are not in a situation to give me the explanations which His Majesty might desire;

but I promise myself, from your good faith, that you will not fail, without loss of time, to communicate the contents of my note to your Government, that this new and unexpected obstacle which presents itself to the course of the pending negotiation may be removed. Led, no doubt, by the same desire which animates me, to arrive at the wished-for arrangement, you have believed that there could be no difficulty in the continuation of the pending negotiations, whatever may have been the nature of the occurrences in the Floridas; and in support of this opinion, you are pleased to add, that inasmuch as the negotiation was not interrupted in consequence of any of the acts committed in former times by the Spanish authorities against the property and persons of American citizens, so neither ought it to be suspended in this case on account of the aforesaid events, of whatever nature they may have been. But I ask you to consider what an immense difference there is between the two cases. Partial violence or injustice, if it did take place against one or more individuals and their property, although it may indirectly fall upon and touch the Government to which they belong, and authorize it to set up claims, and even to ask indemnity, is not in any manner equal to the direct offence which is offered to the majesty of a Sovereign, and that of the nation he governs, when his territory is invaded by an armed force, his fortified towns besieged and taken, and their garrisons made prisoners of war. These acts, essentially hostile, do not admit of any other explanation than the disapprobation of the conduct of the military chief who has committed them, and the evacuation of the invaded territory; and unless this is first done, it is incompatible with decorum and the dignity of the offended nation to continue other negotiations; for these are acts of political friendship, which must necessarily, at least, be very much cooled by the aforesaid excesses, until the Governments come to an understanding upon a point which is preliminary to friendship.

If the United States have continued the negotiations, notwithstanding any particular acts of violence which may have occurred, and for which the King has never refused to make satisfaction by legitimate means, Spain has given no less proofs of moderation on her part, by continuing the negotiations notwithstanding the invasion of West Florida in 1810, of the island of Amelia more recently, and the immense damages which the commerce and the subjects of Spain have sustained in consequence of the armaments made in the ports of the United States, in contravention of the laws of nations and the existing treaty. Without renouncing (for His Majesty never can renounce) the just claims and rights which he holds to be manifest on these points, he has continued the negotiation, although prompt justice has not been done to him on them; because the circumstances under which some of them took place may, without committing, in any great degree, the dignity of his august character, give room to hope for the arrangement of the whole of them, in the final decision of pending affairs. It is not so with the recent aggression which took place in the midst of peace and of negotiations; it was unprovoked, and was committed upon a territory to which the United States have never set up the least pretension, well or ill-founded; and was the act of a considerable corps of the army, which, with all the apparatus of war, proceeded to besiege the forts, and to make prisoners of their small garrisons, who, in the confidence of peace, could only have been suspicious of an attack from some party of savage Indians.

The circumstance of His Majesty's having offered to the United States to exchange the Floridas for a reasonable equivalent, far from exculpating the irregular conduct of General Jackson, as you suppose, contributes to aggravate it beyond measure; because it is the height of violence and of insult to seize by force the very thing which, by legal and honorable means, through an exchange mutually beneficial, might have been promptly and easily obtained. His Majesty hopes, then, that the Government of the United States, on seeing the representation made to you by me, and that which will have been likewise made by his Minister at Washington, will disapprove the conduct of General Jackson, and give orders for the evacuation of the Spanish territory; not only because the dignity of the King and the laws of nations require it, but on account of the interest which the American Government must feel in sustaining before the world the opinion of its good faith, by preserving without a stain that reputation which is as essential to Governments as to individuals.

While this hope lasts, I shall have no objection to continue discussions with you upon all or any one of the points of the pending negotiation, as I have indicated in my other note of this date; but if the American Government, on being informed as to the conduct of General Jackson in Florida, should not disapprove it, by causing the territory of His Majesty to be evacuated, I do not see by what mode the prior and preliminary nature of this new occurrence can be conciliated with further discussions and negotiations, until that incident is terminated in a manner proper and corresponding with the character and dignity of both Governments.

I renew to you the assurances, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Don Jose Pizarro to Mr. Erving.

PALACE, August 6, 1818.

SIR: In your two esteemed notes of the 24th and 27th ultimo, you were pleased to reply to mine of the 19th, relative to the guaranty of His Majesty's possessions, formally offered by Mr. Pinckney, Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, and on their behalf, in the event of His Majesty's agreeing to sell or cede in any other manner to the United States the two Floridas, or that part of West Florida lying between the Mississippi and the Mobile.

The said cession being one of the objects of the pending negotiation which His Majesty contemplated making to the United States in consideration of a just equivalent, it was very natural that he should recur to the offer made to him by the American Government in this contingency, the accomplishment of which would tend to remove many difficulties, as affording an unequivocal proof that the United States still preferred those conciliatory dispositions which had produced that spontaneous offer on the part of the United States, and wholly unsolicited by His Majesty.

In replying to your note, it is not my intention to trouble you by engaging in a discussion of the opinion you have advanced, that the guaranty offered applied only to West Louisiana; and I shall merely recall to your attention that, in the year 1803, when more than three years had elapsed since the retrocession of Louisiana to France, this fact was so universally known that no one, either in Europe or America, could be ignorant of it. In addition to the treaty of 1800, a public and solemn act had been issued, under the sign-manual of His Majesty, in 1802, for the delivery of the colony to France; all the acts and publications of the Congress of the United States of the same year, (1802,) and the commencement of 1803, were full of the same subject; and the arrival of Mr. Monroe in Europe, for the purpose of purchasing the colony of the French Government, was matter of notoriety. How, then, could a public character, in the situation of Mr. Pinckney, be ignorant of a fact constantly referred to in the correspondence of his Government, and familiar to every one, even moderately conversant with politics, who would read the gazettes of the day?

It is therefore beyond a doubt that Mr. Pinckney knew that Louisiana belonged to France, and that the guaranty offered by him to His Majesty was that of his possessions on the continent of North America beyond the Mississippi, or to the westward of Louisiana—a guaranty the more interesting at that period, as the establishment on that continent of a great Power, like that of France, was the motive which appeared to give greater importance to the acquisition of the Floridas by the United States, and to the guaranty offered to Spain, as part of their purchase of them.

The contradiction which you conceive exists between this explanation and the terms employed in Mr. Pinckney's offer, is, in my judgment, entirely without foundation. All your difficulty consists in the inquiry, what were the places on the Mississippi that Mr. Pinckney might demand of Spain, which did not form part of Louisiana? or what was pointed out by him in the phrase "certain tracts of country on the banks of the Mississippi?" &c. To which I reply that they were Manchac, Baton Rouge, and the whole left bank of the river from Manchac to the river Iberville, which communicates with the lakes Maurepas, Pontchartrain, and Borgne. You likewise inquire what were the rivers which rise in the United States, and run through the Spanish territory? I reply that Mr. Pinckney pointed out, or, to speak more properly, expressly named, all those between the Mississippi and the Mobile, which rise beyond the thirty-first degree, and empty into the Gulf of Mexico, namely, the Amite, the Pearl, the Pascagoula, and the Mobile itself, together with other smaller intermediary streams. The territory watered by them was that which Mr. Pinckney wished to purchase of Spain at the time that Mr. Monroe was negotiating the purchase of Louisiana at Paris. This was, and is, the territory forming part of West Florida, as admitted by Mr. Pinckney; it is that which is expressly declared by the American geographer, Mr. Ellicott, to belong to His Catholic Majesty after the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States; and it is that which Spain continued in possession of, even after the delivery of Louisiana to France and to the United States, until she was violently dispossessed of it in 1810, during His Majesty's absence.

What is stated in Mr. Pinckney's letter, in relation to the proceedings of the Intendant at New Orleans, by no means proves that that Minister understood that Louisiana was still to continue in the possession of Spain, as it merely referred to a fact connected with the actual possession and exercise of jurisdiction, which Spain still preserved so long as the delivery of the colony to France was not actually carried into execution.

These points being established in relation to the aforementioned guaranty, its objects, and circumstances, His Majesty's attention has necessarily been called to the positive certainty which you appear to lay down in your answer, that the United States will not agree to any kind of guaranty, notwithstanding the offer above referred to; and to the demand you seem to advance, as a preliminary condition of your stating your ideas on the establishment of the intermediary desert or neutral territory between the possessions of the two countries, that His Majesty shall renounce all further pretensions in relation to the said guaranty.

The offer of it, as I have had the honor repeatedly to state, having been voluntarily made on the part of the United States, in contemplation of an event now under consideration, and it being one of the means best calculated to promote a final adjustment, His Majesty has also charged his Minister in the United States to negotiate with their Government upon that point. It therefore appears to be unseasonable to give up this pretension, which you seem to require to enable you to explain yourself upon other points wholly unconnected with it; and, as I have not expressed to you that the said guaranty is to be a condition sine qua non of the definitive arrangement, although your Government objects to it, I do not at present see any inconvenience in your explaining yourself at once upon other points, as I have already invited you to do in my note of the 19th ultimo, without prejudice to what may be agreed upon between Don

Luis de Onís and the American Government, as well in respect to the said guaranty as to the other objects of the negotiation.

I persuade myself that, in the present communication, as well as in those which have preceded it, you will discover fresh proofs of His Majesty's desire to conclude an arrangement upon terms mutually satisfactory; and I seize this opportunity of renewing to you the assurances of my distinguished respect.

I pray God to preserve you many years.

JOSE PIZARRO.

Mr. Erving to Don Jose Pizarro.

MADRID, August 9, 1818.

SIR: On the evening of the 7th, I had the honor to receive your excellency's two notes of the 6th instant.

It is not my intention to call in question the importance of those circumstances which you enumerate as of a nature to have rendered universally notorious, in 1803, the cession of Louisiana to France in 1800; but not having in my hands the correspondence of Mr. Pinckney with the Government of the United States, from which I might be able to ascertain what knowledge he may have had on the subject; to what an extent and at what period he was instructed relative to the proposals which he made to Cevallos, I have been forced to conclude that such notoriety had not reached him, or that he was not aware of the true boundaries of Louisiana. It may have been, also, that notwithstanding the treaty of 1800, and notwithstanding the royal cedula of 1802, that Minister may have doubted in 1803 of the bona fide transfer to France, seeing that the colony then still remained under the Government of Spain. It is only by such suppositions that I can account for his proposing to purchase of Spain territories which had been ceded to France, and to guaranty territories of His Catholic Majesty on the west of the Mississippi, which could be no other than Louisiana; it not being possible for me to imagine that he intended any country beyond Louisiana, much less all the vast colonies of Spain.

I beg your excellency to observe, that it nowhere appears in Mr. Pinckney's communication that the acquisition made by France had given, as you conjecture, importance in the mind of that Minister to the acquisition sought for by the United States: on the contrary, he is very explicit in the motives which he assigns for his offer; these arose out of the misconduct of the Intendant at New Orleans, which had confirmed an opinion previously entertained in the United States, that it was absolutely necessary for them to acquire some permanent establishment on the east-side of the Mississippi, or on the Mobile. To that end Mr. Pinckney asks for the whole of His Majesty's possessions to the eastward of the Mississippi, or for what is "between that river and the Mobile." This proposal includes New Orleans of course. And, again, he speaks of the "indispensable necessity of their (the United States) possessing a suitable establishment on that river," meaning the Mississippi. Here also he alludes to New Orleans, or, if not, to other points within the territory of Louisiana. Now, though it should be allowed that Mr. Pinckney, as well as Mr. Ellicott, had fallen into the error of supposing that, after the cession of Louisiana to France, the whole of West Florida yet belonged to Spain, neither he nor Mr. Ellicott could have supposed that, after such cession, New Orleans belonged to Spain, or, indeed, any other such point on the Mississippi as Mr. Pinckney sought to obtain.

The replies of your excellency to these questions of mine, which you consider as constituting the principal force of my argument, but which offer to you no difficulty, only prove that our opinions, as to what districts are comprised within the limits of Louisiana, are at variance; and since they prove nothing more, I may be excused from now entering into the various reasonings by which either Government has supported its pretensions.

Your excellency supposes that Mr. Pinckney's negotiation was concurrent with that contemplated, and then on the point of being made, with the French Government, for the purchase of Louisiana; that it was therefore he sought to procure "places of deposit on the mouths of navigable rivers" passing through the Floridas. But, Louisiana purchased of France, Mr. Pinckney's great purpose to "secure to the citizens of one-half of the United States the certain means of exporting their products" was obtained. He wanted a "permanent establishment" on the Mississippi; he could not have desired a better than New Orleans. It was not by the acquisition of points of entrepot on such streams as the Amite, the Pearl, and the Pascagoula, and those intermediate, which are too diminutive to find a place on the chart, or a name, that Mr. Pinckney could have thought of effecting his object, "to secure to the citizens of one-half of the United States the certain means of exporting their products;" these were not the "navigable rivers" which he spoke of; he could not be desirous of obtaining these little spots, while Mr. Monroe was purchasing at Paris real entrepôts, rich territories on both the banks of the Mississippi, rivers which come some hundred leagues from the interior, which may carry on their capacious surfaces the products, not of America only, but of the whole world; while the United States were acquiring, in fine, (according to their construction,) the very territory in which the above-mentioned rivulets as well as the more important Mobile run.

But whatever may have been Mr. Pinckney's knowledge of the then state of affairs, whatever were his views or offers, his plan of a guaranty was not reproduced in the negotiation which soon afterwards took place at Aranjuez, by the special mission of which he was a member; the actual negotiations are but a renewal of that which then failed. If the United States then abstained from offering, or refused to give a guaranty, a fortiori, they will do so now. Under no circumstances whatever could the offer made by Mr. Pinckney, not accepted at the time, have been binding upon the United States, or have formed a rule for its conduct in subsequent negotiations; much less can that offer be admitted to consideration at this day, under a total change of circumstances and of relative possession in the territories which were then the subject of negotiation.

Your excellency seems surprised at the confidence with which I assure you that the United States will not give any guaranty of any part of His Majesty's possessions. I beg your excellency to be persuaded that I have not spoken at hazard. I am perfectly certain that no such guaranty will be given, upon any consideration whatever; and, therefore, nothing was more reasonable than that, in treating with you, I should pretend to have it altogether excluded from our view. In the present state of the negotiation, after it has been repeatedly transferred and retransferred from Madrid to Washington, it were, on my part, worse than a waste of time to encourage a discussion on an article which I know to be in any form inadmissible. It would be a procrastination almost criminal in this most pressing and difficult crisis of our affairs; nor would it comport with the sincerity which has marked all my communications with your excellency, since, as no reason for taking the guaranty into consideration in the year 1818 can be derived from what the Minister of the United States proposed in the year 1803, even "voluntarily," in "the most plain terms," or by the express orders of his Government, such a course, far from facilitating a general arrangement, as you have supposed, could not but retard it, and might possibly so retard it as to be fatal to it. Your excellency ought, then, to conclude that the answer which will be given to His Majesty's Minister on this point will, in substance, conform to that which I have given; and since, as you inform me, the guaranty is not made a sine qua non by His Majesty's Government, I trust that it will be altogether put aside.

Your excellency's other note, respecting the conduct of General Jackson, I shall hasten to transmit to my Government, together with your note of 26th July on the same subject. Though I should allow all force to the distinction which your excellency makes between this case and those acts of His Majesty's viceroys, and other officers in America, of which the Government of the United States and its citizens have had such frequent reasons to complain, and though it should not be allowed that an accumulation of such wrongs makes a case as strong as can be stated, yet it would suffice to show that, amongst the acts referred to, could be found at any time pretexts for breaking off negotiation; and this would not be difficult. The moderation and conciliatory policy of the American Government has been put to the severest trials; but, far from desiring to make out such acts a plea for discontinuing negotiation, they seem to me to press upon us the necessity of hastening to its conclusion.

If, then, your excellency is now prepared to make any such proposals for a general arrangement of the points in discussion specified in Mr. Adams's letter to Mr. Onís of January 16th as I am authorized to accept, I shall adopt them without hesitation; but if, from whatever cause, your excellency should not be disposed to offer such proposals, then I entreat you, considering the great importance of the matter, and the delicacy of my situation in regard to it, as explained to you on a similar occasion last year, that you would be pleased to make to me such an explicit communication as will enable me to show to my Government, with as little delay as possible, that it is out of my power to conclude a treaty here.

To give to your excellency the most convincing proof of my earnestness to contribute as far as possible to the desired object, I will accede to your instances by stating, in precise terms, my proposal of the desert which I first suggested to you in our conferences of the 3d and 5th July, after your excellency had assured me of His Majesty's intention to ratify the convention of 1802. That important point being settled, and, at the same time, His Majesty's dispositions to cede his possessions to the east of the Mississippi for a reasonable equivalent being announced, it appeared to me that the remaining reclamations of the United States might easily be adjusted in the "transaction;" and, therefore, that the only real existing difficulty was to establish the boundary on the west, between the possessions of His Majesty and those of the United States; or, in other words, to determine the extent of territory east of the Rio del Norte to be ceded to His Majesty. The line of the Colorado appeared to be objectionable to His Majesty's Government, without a guaranty, such as it is impossible for the United States to give. I proposed to substitute for it what I considered as better for Spain—a barrier between its possessions and those of the United States. I now propose, then, that the desert, which is to form this barrier, be of thirty leagues breadth; that is, fifteen leagues on the right bank, and fifteen leagues on the left bank of the Colorado, and extending in length from the mouth of that river as high up towards its source as the thirty-second degree of latitude. If Spain should not consider it necessary that the desert should be as broad as thirty leagues, she may diminish it on her own side of the river as much as she may judge fit. Within the desert no persons shall be admitted to settle or establish themselves; and each party may establish military posts on its own portion of the desert for the purpose of keeping off intruders or settlers of any kind.

This proposal, which originates in a sincere desire on my part to meet as nearly as possible the views of your excellency, I hope may prove acceptable to His Majesty's Government; but, in making it, I must at the same time beg leave to state, explicitly, that in case it should not be accepted, and become the means, as I trust it will, of enabling us to settle by treaty, to be now made here, all the other points in discussion, then it cannot be recurred to or have any force in future negotiations, either here or at Washington, or be considered at any time hereafter as in anywise binding my Government, either in what relates to the Colorado instead of the Rio del Norte as the boundary of the United States, or in what relates to a desert on that boundary.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my very distinguished consideration,

GEORGE W. ERVING.

PALACE, August 11, 1818.

The letters of Don Luis de Onis, under date of 20th June last, assure us that it was publicly known in the United States, and inserted in the gazettes of that country, that General Jackson, continuing his hostile incursions within the territory of His Majesty in the Floridas, had taken by assault the fortified town (plaza) of Pensacola, whose small garrison, it is said, did its duty and preserved the honor of the King's arms, by forcibly resisting, as far as it was possible for it to do, the unjust and unexpected aggressor.

Although, as yet, no direct information has been received from the Floridas respecting these disagreeable events, no doubt now remains that General Jackson, trampling under foot all laws, has committed in the territory of His Majesty outrages and excesses of which there are few examples in the civilized world. It will one day or other be stated with surprise, that the theatre of such devastation and unprovoked offence, in the midst of peace, was the very same on which Spain, not many years since, shed her blood and poured out her treasures for the United States, in the days of their calamity.

After what I have had the honor of stating to you in my notes of the 26th of last, and 6th of the present month, in consequence of the first hostilities and excesses of General Jackson in the Floridas, I will only now add, that, in consequence of the occurrence at Pensacola, the King has commended me to communicate to his Minister in Washington the most express orders that, at the same time he presents to the Government there the most solemn protest, in the name of His Majesty, against the invasion of the Floridas, and against the taking of the forts of St. Mark and Pensacola by the American troops, he should solicit that the things be placed in the same state and situation in which they were before the invasion; and that the artillery, munitions, and effects which were found in St. Mark's and Pensacola at the time of their surrender, should be delivered to the Spanish governors of that territory; that reparation be made by the American Government for what may have been destroyed in them, and that it be accountable for the damages and injuries occasioned by the said aggressions; and I have likewise, by royal order, apprized the said Don Luis de Onis that he should give advice of the result of these proceedings without delay, that it may be known to His Majesty.

The King persuades himself that the Government of the United States will not refuse an act of justice so becoming its good faith; and I send to you this exposition, to the end that you may transmit it to your Government in connexion with those which preceded it, and with the same object.

I renew to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration, &c.

JOSE PIZARRO.

MADRID, August 14, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of the 11th instant, containing the information which you have received from His Majesty's Minister in the United States, respecting an assault made on the place of Pensacola by General Jackson, and communicating to me the orders which His Majesty has consequently given to that Minister. I shall not lose a moment in transmitting to my Government a copy of your excellency's note, having already despatched your two former communications relative to the anterior proceedings of General Jackson.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my distinguished consideration.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

PALACE, August 29, 1818.

SIR: A continuation of disagreeable intelligence on the nature and circumstances of the late events in the Floridas, and on the hostile proceedings of the American General, Jackson, and the troops under his command, within the limits of those provinces belonging to His Majesty, has been received at this office. In addition to the facts to which I called your attention in my notes of 26th July and 6th and 11th instant, I have now before me a copy of the capitulation which appears to have resulted from the hostilities committed by the General before the place of Pensacola, in consequence of which the Spanish garrison has been sent to Havana.

In my former notes I had the honor to state to you that, notwithstanding the particular character of violence which appears to have marked the operations of General Jackson from his first movements in Florida, His Majesty, willing to attribute those acts to the arbitrary conduct of that officer, was persuaded that the Government of the United States would not hesitate to disapprove, as soon as they should be informed of them, and that, in consequence, suitable orders would be given, not only for the evacuation of the invaded territory, but also for the indemnity of all injuries sustained, and the restoration of the property belonging as well to the Spanish Government as to its subjects, and likewise that of foreigners then under the protection of His Majesty's Government. It was not to be presumed, without offering an insult to the good faith of the American Government, that they would delay to give this satisfaction to a friendly Power, and this testimony to all civilized nations of their respect for the principles of social order.

It is with great regret that His Majesty perceives, by subsequent advices from his Minister at Washington, that the first excesses of General Jackson having received no marks of disapprobation, he had not hesitated to pursue his violence by forcibly taking possession of everything within the Spanish territory, when he met with resistance from the few feeble garrisons, attacked in a state of profound peace by a large force, which their honor rendered an indispensable duty. In fine, His Majesty's territory has been shamefully invaded; his forts and places have been violently seized on; their garrisons made prisoners, and conveyed out of the province in which they were employed in His Majesty's service; and on the Spanish soil sanguinary executions have taken place of the subjects of Powers in amity with the King—an act of barbarity glossed over with the forms of justice, and thereby rendered, on considering the nature of the place and other circumstances, a refinement of cruelty.

It cannot be doubted that these excesses have come to the knowledge of the Government at Washington; but as yet it does not appear that any measures have been taken to restrain them, or give the Spanish Government the only satisfaction admissible. In this state of things, His Majesty has thought it becoming his honor, and that of the nation, to direct me to renew to you, as I now do, the most solemn protest against the whole proceedings of General Jackson from the moment of his entry into the Floridas; and, moreover, to the end that you may in like manner lay the same before your Government, that, in consideration of the nature of the said injuries and acts essentially hostile, the course of the pending negotiations between the two Governments shall be, and accordingly is, suspended and interrupted, until the Government of the United States shall mark the conduct of General Jackson in a manner correspondent with its good faith, which appears to be no other than by disapproving the afore-mentioned excesses, giving orders to reinstate everything as it was previous to the invasion, and inflicting a suitable punishment on the author of such flagrant disorders.

It is a matter of great concern to His Majesty to be under the necessity of making this declaration, which is more the necessary effect of the nature of things than an act of his royal will; it having been his constant wish and endeavor to combine a suitable arrangement of the point in discussion between the two Governments with an activity which is evident; but the partial world cannot fail to admit the impropriety, in the present posture of things, of continuing negotiations which suppose a state of perfect political friendship at the very moment when enormous injuries are committed, equally unprovoked and unprecedented.

The occupation of the greater and the best part of West Florida by the United States in 1810, by which His Majesty was dispossessed, during his captivity, of the peaceful occupation of that territory, under the pretence of claims which, even if well founded, ought never to have been enforced by acts of violence, and the more recent invasion of Amelia Island, were acts of the same nature and tendency with those alluded to; equally unjust in their principles, and in like manner remonstrated and protested against by Spain; but as, from the mode and circumstances attending them, they were less offensive, His Majesty, actuated by sentiments of moderation, thought that he might await the period of the definite arrangement of the pending differences, which was speedily looked for.

But nothing of the same nature has occurred in the present case. No claim to the territory invaded by General Jackson, whether founded or unfounded, has been advanced by the American Government. No revolution of the inhabitants, real or supposed, offered a pretext; no previous aggressions by banditti, as was urged on the occasion of the unjust occupation of Amelia Island. The Spanish flag waved on the fortresses of St. Mark and Pensacola at the time they were attacked; and, to complete the offence, that territory was seized on by violence which His Majesty had offered to cede to the United States, in the pending negotiation, by means of an honorable arrangement: from which it appears that a forcible occupation was preferred to a peaceful acquisition, resulting from the generous friendship of the King.

It is these extraordinary circumstances which have convinced His Majesty that it is incompatible with the honor of his august character to pursue further negotiation, until a suitable termination be put to an incident which, from its nature, is of primary importance, and claims a preference to all other matters now treated of between the two Governments—an incident which, from its transcendent moment, is capable of producing an essential and thorough change in the political relations of the two countries.

At the same time, to evince the moderate and conciliating disposition which characterizes the conduct of the Spanish Government, I have to add that His Majesty, in directing me to communicate to his Minister at Washington this suspension of the negotiation, has likewise charged me to inform him that, in case the Government of the United States should have given, or will give, the only satisfaction which is admissible in the present case, and which His Majesty has a right to expect from the justice and good faith of that Government, he will be at liberty to proceed in the negotiation which has been carried on, without being under the necessity of consulting His Majesty, or of awaiting fresh instructions authorizing him to continue it.

In making this communication to you, sir, I cannot refrain from expressing the deep regret I have felt at the unfortunate occurrence which has thus produced an unexpected interruption, at the moment I flattered myself with the hope of seeing the political relations of the two Governments established on the solid basis of the most perfect harmony and good understanding.

Relations with Spain.

I renew the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and pray God to preserve you many years.

JOSE PIZARRO.

MADRID, August 31, 1818.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your excellency's note of the 30th [29th] instant, and shall not lose a moment in submitting a copy of it to my Government.

I cannot but express to your excellency my sincere regret on seeing the determination taken by His Majesty to suspend the negotiations, in consequence of the military operations of General Jackson in Florida; which regret is augmented by considering that, on the 6th of August, when your excellency, after insisting at large on what you considered to be the violent character and unjustifiable nature of those proceedings, nevertheless, at the same time, invited me to continue the negotiation here, by acquiescing in the desire expressed in your note of July 19th, and stating, in precise terms, my proposal of a barrier on the western frontier of Louisiana—an invitation which, relying on the good faith in which it was made, and having entire confidence in the conciliatory dispositions of your excellency, I had no hesitation to accept. My proposal was formally stated in my note of August 9th, to which your excellency has not seen fit to reply. It only remains, then, for me, in this place, to renew the reserve expressed at the end of that note, and to declare that the said proposal cannot be considered as in any sort binding on my Government in any future negotiation.

I renew to your excellency assurances of my distinguished consideration.

GEORGE W. ERVING.

MADRID, September 20, 1818.

The paper herewith enclosed is a copy of the King of Spain's grant of lands to the Count of Punon Rostro.

THE KING:

My Governor of the Floridas, brigadier the Count de Punon Rostro, submitted to me, on the 3d of November last, what follows:

"Sire: The brigadier Count de Punon Rostro, grandee of Spain of the first class, and your gentleman of the bedchamber in actual attendance, &c., with the most profound respect, submits to your Majesty: That, prompted by the desire of promoting, by all possible means, the improvement of the extensive waste and unsettled land possessed by your Majesty in the Americas, which, by their fertility, offer the greatest advantages, not only to your memorialist, but to the State, provided due effect, as is hoped, be given to the noble project formed by your Majesty's memorialist of converting a small portion of those deserts into the abode of peaceable Christian inhabitants, whose industry will increase the population of your kingdoms, promote agriculture and commerce, and thereby add immensely to your royal revenues. This enterprise should be conducted by a person who, with a knowledge of the country, would combine the intelligence necessary for comparing the progress made by other nations in similar situations, and particularly by the United States, which, within a very recent period, have advanced their power to an extraordinary height, and especially in the instance of the Mobile country, adjoining Florida, which, in the last six years, has received such an influx of emigrants, as to be converted from a desert waste into a rich commercial province, highly improved, and peopled with more than three hundred thousand souls. A similar change would be effected in Florida, within eighteen or twenty years, by the adoption of judicious arrangements, and by those exertions which your Majesty's memorialist proposes to employ for the promotion of his personal interest, and, consequently, that of the State. Relying, then, on the merits of the case, in the lively interest felt by your Majesty in the national prosperity, and on the services and sacrifices of your Majesty's memorialist, he humbly requests your Majesty, that, taking them into consideration, you would be graciously pleased to grant and cede to him, in full right and property, and the mode and manner required by law, all the waste lands not heretofore ceded in Florida, lying between the river Perdido, westward of the Gulf of Mexico, and the rivers Amuraja and St. John, from Popa to the point where it empties into the ocean, for the eastern limit; and for the northern, the boundary line of the United States; and to the south, by the Gulf of Mexico, including the desert islands on the coast. He therefore humbly prays, in consideration of the premises, and the unquestionable advantages to be derived by the nation, that your Majesty will be pleased to grant this his petition, and thereupon direct the necessary orders to be given to the local authorities to afford him all due aid and protection, as well in designating the territory referred to, as in giving full effect to the whole enterprise: all which he hopes from the munificence of your Majesty."

Having taken the premises into consideration, and bearing in mind the distinguished merits of the memorialist, and his signal zeal for my royal service, as well as the benefits to be derived by the State from an increase of population in the countries the cession whereof he has solicited, I have judged fit to grant to him the same, in so far as is conformable to the laws of these my kingdoms, and to make it known to my Council of the Indies, for its due execution, by a royal order of the 17th December, in the year aforementioned; wherefore, I charge and command you, by this my royal cedula, with due observance of the laws to such cases pertaining, to give full and effectual aid to the execution of the said cession, taking all requisite measures for its accomplishment, without injury to any third party, and to the end that the said Count of Punon Rostro may forthwith carry his plans into execution, in conformity with my beneficent desires in favor of the agriculture and commerce of the said territories, which require a population proportioned to the fertility of the soil and the defence and security of the coasts, he giving regular accounts of his proceedings: for such is my will, and that due note be taken of the present cedula in the office of the Accountant General of the Indies.

Done at the Palace, the 6th of February, 1818.

I, THE KING.

By command of our lord the King:

ESTEVAN VAREA.

To the GOVERNOR OF THE FLORIDAS, that he may take the necessary measures to give due effect to the grant in favor of the Count of Punon Rostro of a tract of country situate in West Florida, as above specified.

Duly noted in the office of the Accountant General of North America, Madrid, March 13, 1818.

JOSEF DE TEXADA.

WASHINGTON, October 18, 1818

SIR: Whilst I make known to you that I have received new orders and instructions from my Court to resume the negotiation pending between the Government of the United States and that of Spain, and to agree with you as to everything that may be convenient and proper to give effect, in as short a time as possible, to the desired general and definitive arrangement of all the differences which exist between the two Governments, I ought also to inform you that His Catholic Majesty ratified, on the 9th of July last, the convention signed on the 11th August, 1802, and ratified a year and a half afterwards by the President and Senate of the United States. I have received the ratification by His Majesty, and am ready to proceed with you to the corresponding exchange, if the President deems it proper; but I think I ought, before it is done, to make to you some observations on this point.

The King, my master, agreed to ratify, at the time he did, the convention of 1802, as well in compliance with the verbal intimations given to his Secretary of State by Mr. Erving, Minister Plenipotentiary of this Republic, as from a desire not to omit on his part anything which might be agreeable to your Government. It also occurred to His Majesty that there might be some obstacle or delay in the desired arrangement and definitive agreement respecting the pending differences between the two Governments; and the aforesaid ratification of that convention being represented to him as a conciliatory measure, and very agreeable to the United States, he did not delay an instant in acceding to it. But you know very well that all the points comprehended in that convention form part of the pending negotiation, and that the general and definitive arrangement which I hope soon to conclude with you being intended to embrace all the claims to which either Power has a right against the other, and all the differences which exist or have heretofore existed between them, that convention will necessarily be abrogated, the points to which it is limited being included in the said arrangement and definitive treaty. For these reasons, which are obvious and entirely convincing, I leave it to your consideration whether we should proceed to the exchange of the ratifications of the said convention, or wait until, the first basis being settled and agreed upon by means of propositions I will instantly make to you, we may be able to judge whether the general and definitive treaty, which must put an end in a solid and permanent manner to all these discussions, will be concluded as quickly as we desire.

I await your answer, and in the meantime I renew to you the assurances of my constant desire to serve you.

God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, October 23, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 18th instant, and am directed by the President to assure you of the great satisfaction with which he has learned that you are prepared to exchange the ratifications of the convention of 1802.

Anxiously desirous as he is of seeing brought to a termination mutually satisfactory all the subjects which have been so long in discussion between the two Governments, the President receives this ratification as an earnest on the part of His Catholic Majesty of that conciliatory disposition which he flatters himself cannot fail to extend to a more general and satisfactory adjustment of all the other objects in controversy between us. He directs me, therefore, to accede to your proposal of postponing the exchange of the ratifications, and to assure you that I shall be ready to receive, whenever it may be agreeable to you, the propositions which you inform me you are prepared to make, and which will be considered with the most earnest desire of establishing, by a prompt and honorable agreement, the most perfect good understanding and harmony between our countries.

I tender to you, sir, the renewed assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, October 24, 1818.

SIR: Notwithstanding the unfortunate events which have occurred since April last, I have received from my Court solemn assurances of the sincere desire of His Catholic Majesty to see every ground of complaint and disagreement between the United States and Spain completely removed, and of his earnest wish to strengthen and cement a good understanding and the most cordial friendship between the two nations. Having transmitted to His Majesty's Government the whole correspondence which lately passed between us here, it has been examined with the most profound attention to all the points embraced in it. A multitude of authentic papers and original documents, of the most unexceptionable authority, on each of the several points involved in the controversy between the Government of the United States and that of His Majesty, were examined, offering incontestable evidence of all the rights hitherto sustained by the Crown of Spain, and refuting, with the clearness of truths universally admitted, and by facts and vouchers equally notorious and unquestionable, the reasoning and arguments upon which your Government found their claims.

It was the earnest wish of His Catholic Majesty that the whole dispute should be adjusted by his Secretary of State, Mr. Pizarro, and Mr. Erving, the Minister Plenipotentiary of this Republic, and that they should proceed to a final arrangement of all existing differences by means of a definitive treaty, which should combine, to the satisfaction of both Governments, the inviolable principles of general justice with the equitable views of reciprocal convenience and utility. His Majesty offered, on his part, to do everything that might be possible, or compatible with the rights and dignity of his Royal Crown, liberally to satisfy the desires expressed by the United States. But Mr. Erving has declined acceding to this adjustment, although the correspondence between him and the Secretary of State was still carried on with a view to that result at the departure of the messenger who was despatched to me from Madrid on the 21st of July last. His Majesty, being apprehensive, notwithstanding his wishes, that the amicable termination of these important affairs might suffer delay, has been pleased to give me such instructions and orders as may enable me to adjust with you all pending differences between the two Governments, and effect the desired arrangement by means of a definitive treaty. For this purpose, His Majesty gave orders that the documents and proofs should be transmitted to me, which were necessary to convince the United States of the unquestionable rights of the Crown of Spain to the territories and waters claimed by your Government as forming an integral part of Louisiana. I have received a considerable number of the said documents and proofs, and an examination of many others was taking place in Spain, which are to be sent to me. The result of this inquiry established what I stated to you in my notes during my late abode at Washington, and especially in that which I addressed to you on the 23d March at the same period, in answer to that which I received from you of the 12th of the same month, upon all the points in dispute. It exhibited an incontrovertible series of facts from the earliest periods of discoveries, conquest, or occupation, and the successive establishments of the Crown of Spain, in that part of America, to the present day. It proved that Spain, long prior to any other nation, discovered Florida, that is, all the vast and beautiful country extending from what is now termed East Florida to the Rio Bravo, or Rio Grande del Norte, which was then the boundary of the kingdom of Mexico, of which she was already in peaceable possession. From the period of the discovery of this extensive region by Ponce de Leon, in 1512, and the establishment of the first act of possession in the name of the Crown of Spain, repeated and regular expeditions were formed, composed of troops, artillery, and everything necessary for penetrating through the whole country, examining all its positions from the coast to the interior, and all its rivers, creeks, and bays, reducing the natives, or establishing trade and friendship with them; and for occupying all such places as might appear best calculated to bring and preserve under the dominion of Spain the said country throughout its whole extent. I stated to you in my said notes (and am enabled to prove it by the most ample documents) that this was the object of the expeditions of Vasquez de Ayllon, in 1520, and of Panfilo de Narvaez, in 1528. The latter obtained from Charles I. of Spain and Emperor of Germany a solemn authority to reduce the whole country from the bay of Espiritu Santo, in East Florida, to the river Palmas. He arrived in the said region with a respectable force, and examined it from east to west. In this he had been preceded by Francisco de Garay, who passed through it by land from the bay of Espiritu Santo to Panuco. Hernando de Soto was soon afterwards appointed Governor General of Florida, the name then given to the whole of this vast country. He entered it with a powerful force, and repeated the solemn acts of taking possession of it in behalf of Spain. He afterwards examined its extensive limits, and founded several settlements. He was succeeded in his Government by Moscoso, who continued to explore the country and extend the settlements. These two first Governors General of Florida traversed and examined it, as I have said, from east to west; from the point, or cape of that Florida now called East Florida, to the Rio Bravo, crossing the Mississippi, which was then called the Palisada, and all the others which empty into it, or into the Gulf of Mexico. From that period Spain has uniformly continued in the dominion and possession of all that country, in which she successively founded the province of Cohaguila, the kingdom of New Leon, that of New Mexico, &c.; also the province of Texas, which she has retained until the present time. It is an unquestionable fact, and of universal notoriety, that the whole country I am now speaking of was known from the beginning by the general denomination of Florida, and included all the coast from the point of Florida now called East Florida to the Rio Bravo, and all the country and the waters of the interior; of this a full and uniform proof is afforded by the history and most respectable documents of those times. During the lapse of two centuries the whole of this vast country was known to the nations of Europe under no other name. Not only the Spaniards, but all foreigners, laid it down in their maps and charts under this name, and with the same limits. I might here cite the English traveller, Dampier, and several others, who thus denominate and lay down this beautiful region in their maps and descriptions; but why should I now dwell on what never admitted of a doubt or change until the Frenchman De Lisle, through ignorance, erroneous information, or partial motives, extended in his idea and map the boundaries of French Louisiana to the Rio Bravo? This error or extravagance has ever since been adopted by all those who have had an interest in supporting the illusion, or have carelessly or unguardedly copied the gratuitous suppositions of that geographer. But as this is in direct contradiction to the history of those early times, and the most unquestionable documents which established the contrary, these chimerical and absurd suppositions are entitled to no credit whatever, although they have been advanced with great gravity and ostentation.

It is, moreover, a fact beyond all dispute, that the Crown of Spain was established as the lawful owner and possessor of all the aforesaid region, and that it has uniformly been preserved under her dominion to this day, with the exception of such parts of it as, by treaties, conventions, and other solemn acts, she has transferred to foreign Powers.

As the introduction of the French into part of that region has formed the ground of the claims of your Government, I shall confine my remarks to them. In the course of our late correspondence, I stated to you in my notes the manner in which the French got a footing in that part of the Spanish dominions, and how they proceeded to form the colony to which they gave the name of Louisiana.

But to form a just idea of the establishment of that colony, and of its precise extent and boundaries, it is necessary to take a view of it at three different periods: 1st, under the direction of the Government of France; 2dly, under that of Crozat and the French Western Company; and 3dly, under the Government of the Crown of France.

I do not deem it necessary now to detail minutely the first attempt of the French on the old Florida, in 1562. It is well known that John Ribaut, to whom the conduct of the expedition was committed, through the influence of Admiral Coligny, was completely routed by the Spaniards under General Melendez de Abyles. This General having attacked the French in their fort of Carolina, all those who escaped the assault were made prisoners of war; and, having pursued their vessels, he and stormy weather put an end to the wretched remains of this French expedition. Abyles founded the castle and forts of St. Augustine, which then became the capital of all Florida; established various other posts; and enforced a respect for the dominion of Spain over all the coast and territories of that vast region. The French never again returned there, until the last attempt of the celebrated La Salle, who, towards the close of 1684, sailed from France with an expedition to discover the mouths of the Mississippi. At this period, the French had already established themselves in the lower part of Canada. Fearful of meeting a fate like that of Ribaut, they avoided an interference with the countries belonging to the Crown of Spain, and confined their establishments to the coasts of the Atlantic. The savages, or aborigines of Canada, had a knowledge of other Indian nations inhabiting beyond the Lakes, and of a very remote country watered by a great river, which, as they said, ran neither to the east, to the west, nor to the north, but which might probably run to the south, and empty into the Gulf of Mexico. It was they who, in 1660, gave the French of Canada an idea of this country and river, although very limited, vague, and obscure; and excited in the minds of Joliet, an inhabitant of Quebec, and of the missionary Marquette, the project of crossing the lakes, and penetrating into the said country to explore it and the river. They realized their project, embarked on Lake Michigan, ascended the river Zoras to its source, afterwards travelled by land, and, returning to the entrance of the same river, navigated to the westward, and on the 2d June, 1673, they struck the Mississippi. They then descended this river as low as the Arkansas, in thirty-three degrees north latitude; but, fearful of falling into the hands of the Spaniards, they afterwards retreated to Canada, and on their return passed through the country inhabited by the Illinois, whom they found disposed to trade with the French of that colony.

This excursion produced no result whatever, and would have been wholly forgotten at the death of Marquette, but the famous La Salle, an enterprising and resolute man, who had come to Canada with the design of exploring a passage from thence to Japan, or China, having heard of Joliet's narrative, conceived the project of repeating the same journey. He embarked for France, and on his arrival at Paris proposed his plan to the Prince of Conde. Patronized by him and the Government, he returned to Quebec with a company of thirty associates, and the Chevalier Tonti, a brave and experienced officer. At Quebec he was joined by Father Hennepin, and, at the head of this party, set out on the journey formerly made by Joliet and Marquette. Having encountered extraordinary difficulties, he employed several years in accomplishing it. On the 4th of March, 1681, he arrived at the Arkansas. In April of the following year, he proceeded as low down as the mouth of the Mississippi; and in the Spring of 1683, he returned to France to give an account of his discoveries. With all due ceremony he took possession of the Arkansas and the Mississippi, in the name of the Crown of France, although it was well known that all those countries were under the dominion of Spain. In performing this journey, La Salle did no more than explore distant countries, and that in a clandestine and secret manner, being under the necessity of defending himself both against the Spaniards and the English, who repeatedly fell in with and attacked him.

Relations with Spain.

La Salle, having given an exaggerated account of his discoveries in this part of America, was authorized by his Court to search for the mouths of the Mississippi, and occupy some position on its banks. This was the object of the maritime expedition with which he sailed from France under the command of Beaujeau, for the Gulf of Mexico, which he entered on the 12th of December, 1684. In the notes I lately addressed you at Washington, I stated the result of this expedition, and of the labors of La Salle. Driven on the coast of the province of Texas, it was with difficulty this distinguished adventurer found safety in the bay of St. Bernard. He crossed by the Trinity river, and constructed a redoubt to defend himself against the Indians; but, not being able to defend it, he determined on abandoning the country, and was assassinated by his own party. The Indians attacked the fort or redoubt, in which he had left some of his people, demolished it, and massacred them. Of this unfortunate expedition, seven men only escaped; five of whom succeeded in reaching the Arkansas on the 20th of July, 1687, and returned to Montreal in May following. The others found their way among the Cenis or Asinais Indians.

I presume that I have fully proved to you in my former notes that this shipwreck of La Salle on the coast of Texas, and his entry into the bay of St. Bernard and adjacent country, can give no right to France to that bay and country, they being already under the dominion of the Crown of Spain. In fact, what right could France have to extend herself from her remote colony of Canada to those territories? But France only authorized La Salle to search for the mouths of the Mississippi, doubtless in the belief that this river was not within the Spanish possessions. I also stated to you that the most effectual measures were instantly taken by the Viceroy of Mexico and the Spanish Government to drive the French from any position they might have occupied on the Gulf of Mexico, or in the interior. This was one of the special objects of the successive expeditions of Alonzo de Leon, Domingo Teran, and Gregorio Salinas. I say that this was one of the objects of these expeditions, because they were likewise charged with forming different establishments in the province of Texas, or of the Asinais, and securing the whole coast from any incursion of foreigners. They executed the object of their mission; so that the French made no further attempts from that time to the expedition of Iberville, in 1698, the period when the French first established themselves on the Gulf of Mexico. Iberville, an experienced seaman, who had distinguished himself by his fortunate expedition to Hudson's Bay, in 1697, appeared off Pensacola with his squadron, but, discovering that the Spaniards were occupied in fortifying that place, he shaped his course for the river of Mobile. He entered it on the 2d of February of the same year, and took possession of Massacre Island, which he called Dauphin Island. On the 2d of March, 1699, he entered the Mississippi, and ascended as high as the Bluffs; he there received a letter from the Chevalier Tonti, by which he ascertained that this was really the Mississippi, and that the Indian nations which he had communicated with showed a very favorable disposition to trade with the French. He then returned to Mobile, and, leaving that place in the charge of Sauvole and Bienville, proceeded to France to give an account of his expedition. The Court of Spain, having been already informed of these enterprises, determined to expel the French forever from those positions, and from all the Gulf of Mexico; but this being about to be executed, the death of Charles II. occurred, and the Duke of Anjou succeeded to the Crown under the name of Philip V. Spain being then embarrassed with the war of succession, and united by a close friendship with France, overlooked the establishment at Mobile. In January, 1700, Iberville returned there, but made no progress in his projects, from the want of means and the badness of the climate. This feeble colony continued to languish without any prospect of realizing the extravagant expectations at first formed by the French. Louis XIV., setting little value on it, conferred the entire property of it on Crozat, in 1712. It is unnecessary to point out the errors and absurdities contained in the grant of Louis XIV. to Crozat, as I have already stated them to you in detail; I shall, therefore, only have to speak of the second period, that of the establishment of this colony, and show its progress. La Motte Condillac being appointed Governor, and Ducloux intendant of this famous establishment, they formed with Crozat a supreme tribunal for all civil and criminal cases. It was at that time that the excursion of the Frenchman St. Dennis into the interior of New Spain took place, in which he passed through various Indian nations from the Mississippi to the Rio Grande. In my former communications I stated what appeared to be necessary on the character and movements of this celebrated adventurer. I shall only add here, that although his apparent object was the establishment of a traffic with the people of New Spain, yet it merely served to cover the design of exploring the Spanish territories, and of extending the settlements of his countrymen therein. As soon as his views were discovered, measures were taken in Mexico to counteract them, and rigorous orders issued by the Court for the same purpose. It was this incident which produced the vigorous measures of the Viceroy of Mexico, the Duke of Linares, and the despatch of the troops and missionaries to the province of Texas, forming the fifth expedition of the Spaniards to that province—a fact which serves as a complete refutation of all that has been advanced by Du Pratz and other French writers. Alonzo de Leon informed the Spanish Governor Alarconne, from Texas, on the 21st May, 1717, that he had just founded two establishments there, one of them within ten leagues of the Natchitooch; and that he was about to proceed to the Caudachos in consequence of having received information that the French were endeavoring to make a settlement there, and that there were already ten men of his nation among the Natchitooch. The chief object in forming this Spanish settlement was to observe and check the French; and it was soon after increased by the construction of a fort called San Miguel de los Adaes, which was garrisoned by a competent force.

St. Dennis promoted the settlement of several Frenchmen among the Natchitooch, for the purpose of serving as an intermediary point in his journeys to the Rio Grande. He called this settlement San Miguel, and this gave rise to the error of Champigny, who has confounded this paltry establishment with that of the Adaes. That which was formed by the French cannot be considered of any importance until May, 1717, when the Governor of Mobile first sent a commandant with a party of ten men as a garrison, at which time the Spanish fort of the Adaes was already built. Such was the origin of the French settlement and fort at Natchitooch—the only acquisition made by the colony of Biloxi, or Mobile, in the neighborhood of the Rio Roxo, (Red river,) under Crozat or the Western Company. In 1718, the company laid the foundation of New Orleans, to which the general government of the colony was transferred in 1722, and the settlement at Biloxi abandoned. In June, 1723, Bienville endeavored to take possession of the bay of St. Joseph; but, being opposed by Salinas, the Spanish Governor of Pensacola, he desisted from his attempt. Thus the colony went on without making any progress, until the French company, tired out with the disasters and losses it had suffered in the wars with the neighboring Indians, and convinced of the inutility of that establishment, surrendered their privilege to the Crown in 1730 or 1734, which forms the last period of that colony.

I have made no mention of the French settlements in the Arkansas and the Illinois, as they were formed by people from Canada, and tolerated by Spain merely as places occupied for the purpose of trading with the Indians, because, from the reasons I have touched on, it is evident that France could have no right to occupy them but through the permission or toleration of Spain. Louis XIV. had declared to His Catholic Majesty's Government that he occupied Mobile and other places in that region solely with a view to aid Spain in case of a war with the English; and having requested permission of His Catholic Majesty to keep a force at Mobile for that purpose, it was refused, by the advice of the Council of the Indies. The situation of the French colony did not improve under the immediate administration of the Government; part of it was ceded by His Catholic Majesty to England, in 1763; and the other part, that is, the city and island of New Orleans, was, as you know, ceded and delivered to Spain in 1769. That colony was considerably improved in the hands of Spain, by the establishment of several new settlements. It was retroceded, together with them, to France in 1800, by virtue of a treaty, in which it was stipulated that Spain retroceded it with the same extent it had when in the possession of France, and which it had at the conclusion of that treaty in the hands of His Catholic Majesty. I consider all I have already stated to you on this point as repeated here; and I shall only add, that although the secret convention for the cession of Louisiana to Spain was concluded in 1763, the two high contracting parties reserved to themselves the right of afterwards agreeing on the suitable time for its delivery to Spain; in consequence of which, France continued in possession of it until 1769. As this act is undisputed, and completed and realized the cession, it is clear that it could not comprehend the territories ceded six years before to Great Britain. As a further proof, we have to adduce the royal cedula of His Catholic Majesty, issued at Barcelona, and communicated to the French Government, in which His Catholic Majesty declares that he retroceded Louisiana with the same extent it had when he received it from France; which declaration serves as an addition to the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, and was conformed to by the French Government, who made use of the said royal cedula of His Catholic Majesty in taking possession of the province thus retroceded, without any other claim or demand on their part.

In the simple epitome which I have presented of the principle and progress of the French settlements in this part of the American continent, I have only touched on the capital points, such as are sufficient to remove all grounds of the present dispute. I am ready to prove in the most ample manner all that I have advanced, by a multitude of indisputable documents, which I will produce, if necessary, the moment that it may be agreeable to you; and you will inform me of your wish to confront them with what I have stated. All the errors which have been disseminated in the narratives and maps of the French authors, and other foreigners who have committed such enormous deviations through ignorance, interest, or the influence of national prejudice, will then be corrected, and the fact established beyond all doubt that France never possessed anything to the left of the Mississippi; and that to the right, she held the posts of Natchitooch, Natchez, Arkansas, and the Illinois, solely by the permission or toleration of Spain, as I have before stated. The settlements at Opelousas, Avoyelles, and Attakapas, were not yet formed in 1762, as is admitted and affirmed by M. Bossu, of the French navy, who did not leave Louisiana until that year, and who afterwards published his voyages to the West Indies; nor were there any commandants of those settlements appointed by that Government, except under the dominion of Spain. La Fourche, which is situated much nearer to New Orleans, was only begun to be occupied by the French in 1763. Villemont, a Frenchman, established himself on the river Ouachita, or the Black river, (Rio Negro,) during the second period of Louisiana, by occupying a small valley; but this private settlement was not kept up, but afterwards abandoned. What took place at the Arkansas, Illinois, and the Missouri, could give France no right whatever to the posts which she happened to establish and retain, and which were not claimed by Spain. All the rest could not be considered as an integral part of French Louisiana, until the period of the cession to England, and of the restitution and delivery to Spain. It is, therefore, easy to ascertain and determine what was the extent of Louisiana in the possession of the French, and what were its exact boundaries. Moreover, although the hypothesis be admitted that she had or might have some right to other parts of this vast country, she transferred it to England by the cession she made of it in 1763; and when Spain acquired from England the territory ceded to the latter, she included therein this right, such as it might be. Having retroceded to France in 1800 only what she had received from her, it is evident that she could not restore to her this pretended right. Under whatever aspect, therefore, we view the question, the rights hitherto sustained by the Government of His Catholic Majesty in the present dispute remain unquestionable. I allude to them merely to give you the most satisfactory proofs of this truth, and to establish, in respect to the uti possidetis, or state of possession in 1763 and 1769, the basis which it is indispensable to lay down for the general and definitive settlement of all pending differences between the two Governments. In that basis will likewise be comprehended all the augmentation with which Spain delivered Louisiana to France, and all that by treaties or other lawful acts has been ceded to the United States.

His Majesty, carrying his particular consideration for the United States, and his sincere desire to meet the wishes of your Government, as far as is compatible with the rights and dignity of his Crown, has authorized me to remove the principal difficulties, and to offer the Government of this Republic the liberal proposals which I have the honor to enclose in a separate paper.

If these proposals should, as I hope, appear admissible and satisfactory to your Government, all the rest which it will be requisite to change, or add, to perfect the definitive adjustment between the two Powers, cannot fail to follow of course, and be easy to arrange. Finally, if there should arise any difficulty or doubt in the mind of the President upon any one of them, which I can remove or clear up, I shall be happy to be made acquainted with it, and most cheerfully do for that purpose whatever may be within the limits of my powers and instructions. I conceive that what I now propose is best calculated to conciliate all the different views and claims, and to adjust all pending differences upon just and liberal principles; it being evident, moreover, that the advantages are wholly in favor of the United States.

In concluding this note, I beg leave to repeat that if, before we agree on what is requisite to effect the desired arrangement, and with a view to proceed to it with a more perfect conviction of the unquestionable rights of each one of the two Powers, you should think it advisable that we should modify and correct any points stated in the present note, by the production and examination of the documentary proofs which I have offered, I am ready to submit them the moment I receive such intimation from you.

In the meantime, I repeat the assurances of my respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

1. The United States declare that they deeply regret the violation of the Spanish territory by the troops under the command of General Jackson, and that, it being done without their orders, and, as the General states, with a view of terminating more promptly the war against the Indians, the United States will restore the town of Pensacola, and the forts of Barancas and St. Mark, and the other territory occupied by their troops in the Floridas, to the Spanish officers duly authorized by His Catholic Majesty to take possession of them: the United States being answerable, as is just, for the injuries caused by the incursions of the troops of the Union, as well to the Crown of Spain as to its subjects; upon which point the proper stipulations shall be inserted in the treaty.

2. His Catholic Majesty, to give an eminent proof of his generosity, and of the desire which animates him to strengthen the ties of friendship and of good understanding with the United States, and to put an end to the differences which now exist between the two Governments, cedes to them, in full property and sovereignty, the provinces of East and West Florida, with all their towns and forts, such as they were ceded by Great Britain in 1783, and with the limits which designated them in the treaty of limits and navigation concluded between Spain and the United States on the 27th October, 1795. The donations or sales of lands made by the Government of His Majesty, or by legal authorities, until this time, are, nevertheless, to be recognised as valid.

3. To avoid all cause of dispute in future, the limits of the respective possessions of both Governments to the west of the Mississippi shall be designated by a line, beginning on the Gulf of Mexico, between the rivers Mermento and Calcasia, following the Arroyo Hondo, between the Adaes and Natchitoches, crossing the Rio or Red river at the 32d degree of latitude, and 93d of longitude from London, according to Melish's map, and thence running directly north, crossing the Arkansas, the White, and the Osage rivers, till it strikes the Missouri, and then following the middle of that river to its source, so that the territory on the right bank of the said river will belong to Spain, and that on the left bank to the United States. The navigation, as well of the Missouri as of the Mississippi and Mermento, shall remain free to the subjects of both parties. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings; and the result, agreed upon by them, shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to these persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

4. The two contracting parties, animated by the most sincere desire of conciliation, and with the view of eradicating all the discussions which exist between them, and to hasten the conclusion of a definitive and prompt arrangement, by which the good understanding they desire perpetually to maintain with each other may be strengthened, reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, or their respective subjects or citizens, may have suffered, of whatsoever nature they may be, whether they have or have not been presented or made until this date, so that they are to be considered as entirely cancelled and adjusted, excepting those which are specified in first article.

5. The treaty of limits and of navigation of 1795 remains in force, in all and each one of its articles; but to avoid questions in future as to the meaning of the fifteenth article, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this may be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle; but, if one of the belligerents should not recognise it, the above cited clause of the said fifteenth article shall not remain obligatory on either of the two contracting parties, who may act as they think proper on this point, without giving room for complaints or claims, or being considered as infringing the before-mentioned fifteenth article.

6. Although the two high contracting parties oblige themselves to cause the stipulations contained in this treaty, and in that of limits and navigation of 1795, to be complied with in all their parts, nevertheless, desirous of avoiding all doubt or misinterpretation of their respective clauses, they oblige themselves to make the declarations or laws requisite for the most exact observance of all that is above stipulated, as good faith and the honor of both Governments require, adopting the most efficacious measures to remedy and cut up by the roots the abuses which, contrary to the laws of nations, and contrary to what is expressly stipulated in the treaty of 1795, above cited, daily occur in some parts in this Union, in consequence of the vague and arbitrary interpretation which, it seems, the measures until now adopted are susceptible of, and by which means the law is eluded.

7. In consideration of the sacrifices which His Catholic Majesty makes by depriving himself, in favor of the United States, of the important provinces of the two Floridas, to satisfy and to cancel forever all their claims, the United States will certify, in due form, that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may claim from France the return of this amount.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, October 31, 1818.

SIR: Your letter of the 24th instant, and the proposals contained in it, offered as the basis of a treaty for the adjustment of all the subjects in discussion between the United States and Spain, have been received, and laid before the President of the United States.

I am directed by him to forbear entering into any examination of the historical disquisition concerning the original pretensions of Spain to all the territories bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, and the whole country included in the French colony of Louisiana, which you have thought proper to introduce into your note. The right of the United States to the river Mississippi, and all the waters flowing into it, and to all the territories watered by them, remains as entire and unshaken by anything now adduced by you as by anything which had ever preceded it in the discussions between the two Governments. It is established beyond the power of further controversy; nor could it answer any useful purpose to reproduce proofs which have already more than once been shown, and which, remaining unimpaired, must henceforth be considered by the United States as not susceptible of refutation.

In confining my attention to the propositions which you offer as the basis of a treaty, I have to observe that any further proceedings upon the first of them have been rendered unnecessary by the determination promptly taken by this Government, and communicated to you, to restore the forts of Barancas and St. Mark, together with Pensacola, to any person duly authorized by you, or otherwise by your Government to receive them. You have been informed of the evidence inculcating the Governors of those places, not only as having utterly neglected to carry into effect the stipulation in the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, by force, the Indians within her territories from committing hostilities against the United States or their citizens, but as having deeply participated in the hostilities of those same Indians. You have been informed that these were the real and only causes of the occupation of those places by the commander of the American forces. Under these circumstances, however, the United States may regret the necessity of that occupation, it is for the Spanish officers themselves to answer to their own Sovereign for the consequences of their own conduct; and the forbearance of the United States, as well as their respect for the rights and the honor of Spain, are sufficiently manifested by their readiness to restore the possession, and to consign to oblivion the hostile conduct of those officers of His Catholic Majesty.

The uselessness of any stipulation on the subject of this first proposition is further demonstrated by the nature of the second, in which you announce your authority to cede all the property and sovereignty possessed by Spain in and over the Floridas. The effect of this measure being necessarily to remove all cause of contention between the contracting parties with regard to the possession of these territories, and to everything incidental to them, it would be worse than superfluous to stipulate for restoring them to Spain in the very treaty by which they are to be ceded in full sovereignty and possession to the United States. Neither can the United States recognise as valid all the grants of land until this time, and at the same time renounce all their claims, and those of their citizens, for damages and injuries sustained by them, and for the reparation of which Spain is answerable to them. It is well known to you, sir, that notice has been given by the Minister of the United States in Spain to your Government that all the grants of land lately alleged to have been made by your Government within those territories must be cancelled, unless your Government should provide some other adequate fund, from which the claims above referred to of the United States and their citizens may be satisfied.

From the answers of Don Jose Pizarro to this notice, we have reason to expect that you will be sensible of that necessity, and that some time must be agreed upon subsequent to which no grant of the lands within the territories in question shall be considered as valid.

The boundary line proposed by you, west of the Mississippi, can as little be assented to by the United States. Instead of it, I am authorized to propose to you the following, and to assure you that it is to be considered as the final offer on the part of the United States:

Beginning at the mouth of the river Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico, following the course of said river to the thirty-second degree of latitude; the eastern bank and all the islands in said river to belong to the United States, and the western bank to Spain; thence, due north, to the northernmost part of the thirty-third degree of north latitude, and until it strikes the Rio Roxo, or Red river; thence, following the course of the said river, to its source, touching the chain of the Snow mountains, in latitude thirty-seven degrees twenty-five minutes north, longitude one hundred and six degrees fifteen minutes west, or thereabouts, as marked on Melish's map; thence to the summit of the said mountains, and following the chain of the same to the forty-first parallel of latitude; thence, following the said parallel of latitude forty-one degrees, to the South sea. The northern bank of the said Red river, and all the islands therein, to belong to the United States, and the southern bank of the same to Spain.

It is believed that this line will render the appointment of commissioners for fixing it more precisely unnecessary, unless it be for the purpose of ascertaining the spot where the river Sabine falls upon latitude thirty-two degrees north, and the line thence due north to the Red river, and the point of latitude forty-one degrees north on the ridge of the Snow mountains; to which appointment of commissioners this Government will readily agree.

The United States will agree to the proposal that the contracting parties shall mutually renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they, their citizens, or subjects, have received from each other, until the date of the treaty; it being understood that all grants of lands in any part of the territories to be ceded by Spain to the United States subsequent to the year 1802 are to be held null and void.

This renunciation on the part of the United States will be understood to extend—

1st. To all the cases provided for by the convention of 1802.

2d. To all cases of claims on account of captures by French privateers, and condemnations by French consuls, within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain.

3d. To all claims of indemnities, on account of the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans, in 1802.

4th. And to all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, shall have been, before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, presented either to the Department of State of the United States, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain; but not to claims which the individuals of the United States may have against those of Spain, or against the Spanish Government, on any other account.

The United States will exonerate Spain from all demands in future on account of the above-mentioned claims, and undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars.

To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, a commission, to consist of three commissioners, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which commission shall meet at Washington, and within the space of three years shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims coming within the descriptions above-mentioned. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners.

Your fifth proposition is, that the treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 shall remain in force in all and each of its articles, with the exception of that part of the fifteenth article which stipulates that the flag shall cover the property.

The 2d, 3d, 4th, 21st, and the second clause of the 22d articles of the treaty of 1795, have either received their entire execution, and can no longer be considered as remaining in force, or have been rendered inoperative by subsequent events. Whatever relates in them to limits or to the navigation of the Mississippi, has been extinguished by the cession of Louisiana to France, and by her to the United States; with the exception of the line between the United States and Florida, which will also be annulled by the cession of Florida, which you now propose. I am authorized to agree to the confirmation and recognition of all the remaining articles of that treaty as still in force, and to assent to the exception proposed by you of part of the fifteenth article, to this extent: that if, hereafter, either of the contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments recognise the same principle, and not of others.

Your sixth proposition is inadmissible. The United States do not know that any additional laws or declarations are necessary to secure the fulfilment, on the part of Spain, of her engagements in the treaty of 1795. Numerous and just as their complaints have been of the violations of that treaty, under the authority of Spain, they consider the Spanish Government fully competent to make reparation for them, and to secure the faithful observance of their engagements in future without new laws or declarations. Nor are they aware of any vague or arbitrary interpretation in any of the ports of this Union, by which, contrary to the laws of nations, or to the stipulations of the treaty of 1795, the law is eluded. The interpretation or construction given to the stipulations of the treaty of 1795 within the United States is subject to the decisions of the judicial tribunals of the United States, who are bound to consider all treaties as the supreme law of the land. Their proceedings are all public, and their decisions upon all questions of interpretation are recorded and published. In this there is surely nothing vague or arbitrary; nothing requiring new laws or declarations. Of the many complaints which you have addressed to this Government in relation to alleged transactions in our ports, the deficiency has been, not in the meaning or interpretation of the treaty, but in the proofs of the facts which you have stated, or which have been reported to you, to bring the cases of complaint within the scope of the stipulations of the treaty.

In consideration of the cession of the Floridas by Spain, to redress and cancel the claims of the United States and their citizens upon Spain, and always understood that the late grants of the lands for which the indemnity for those claims is to be sought shall be held null and void, the Government of the United States will certify that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries suffered from French privateers, Consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, and will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their value, that Spain may avail herself of it in such manner as she may deem just and proper. Upon the basis offered by your propositions, modified conformably to the observations now submitted to you, I am authorized to conclude a treaty with you; but, as the session of Congress is at hand, I am directed to request your immediate and frank reply to this communication. The President is deeply penetrated with the conviction that further protracted discussion of the points at issue between our Governments cannot terminate in a manner satisfactory to them. From your answer to this letter, he must conclude whether a final adjustment of all our differences is now to be accomplished, or whether all hope of such a desirable result is, on the part of the United States, to be abandoned.

I pray you to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1818.

SIR: I have attentively perused the note of the 31st of October last, which you addressed to me by order of your Government, in answer to mine of the 24th of the same month, by which I perceive that you have received the President's orders not to take into consideration the legal titles and grounds on which Spain rests her rights and claims to the sovereignty of the territories and waters claimed by your Government as forming an integral part of Louisiana, as it was retroceded by His Catholic Majesty to France in 1800, and sold or ceded by the Government of that nation to the United States in 1803. As these rights and claims rest on a basis as solid and as venerable as that which can be presented by the most equitable Government on earth to demonstrate its legitimate property to the country it possesses, I should be wanting in my duty were I not to maintain the same principles which I advanced in my former notes to you on this head. Being self-evident, they are as incontrovertible and invariable as the fundamental principles of universal justice. It is impossible to reject or impugn them without attacking those original and primitive titles which do, and ever have sanctioned, throughout the whole world, the rights of property and complete sovereignty enjoyed by all independent States and Kingdoms in their respective acquisitions. You assert the indisputable right of the United States to the river Mississippi. I say, and the fact is obvious, that even admitting your assertion in its fullest latitude, notwithstanding no argument has ever been advanced by the United States to establish it, and that it is contradicted by the most unquestionable documents and proof, the pretension to extend your claims beyond the Missouri would always be inconsistent and exorbitant. Even the absurd and extravagant grant of Louis XIV. to Crozat does not point out a greater extent, and respects

Relations with Spain.

the frontiers of New Mexico and other Spanish settlements and possessions, which existed long before the time that grant was made, and before the famous expedition of M. de la Salle. Keeping, therefore, in view the truth of facts, and the immutable principles of things, and endeavoring to reconcile them with the sincere and uniform desire of His Catholic Majesty to remove, on his part, the obstacles that have opposed the amicable adjustment of all existing differences between the two Powers, as far as is consistent with the rights and dignity of his Royal Crown, I will approximate my proposals, as nearly as is possible for me, to those you have made me on the part of your Government.

The first refers to the satisfaction due by the United States to His Catholic Majesty and to his subjects, in consequence of the invasion and capture of Pensacola and other forts and territories in the Floridas. You must be sensible that it is impossible for me to desist from the demand of a just and adequate reparation or indemnity to His Majesty and the inhabitants of both provinces, and particularly those of Pensacola, for all losses and injuries by them sustained from the officers and troops of the United States. No principle can be adduced to support or justify the hostile proceedings of General Jackson in Florida, marked as they are by a series of outrages unprecedented and unknown in history. The American commander, on that occasion, as your Government itself admits, acted contrary to the orders and instructions given to him. Public opinion in the United States has uniformly reprobated these excesses, as well as all the specious pretexts with which he has endeavored to gloss them over. The charges artfully produced against the Spanish commandants and officers are entirely frivolous, and are contradicted by the well-known truth of facts, and the formal declarations and statements of those same Spanish officers; so that, in every view of the case, the United States are in justice bound by the most solemn obligations to make satisfaction to the Crown and subjects of Spain for the said losses and injuries. The Spanish Government are in like manner entitled to the full amount of all revenue collected and received by the United States in the places and territories occupied by them in the said provinces; since, as the sovereignty of Spain is indisputable, she could in no wise be dispossessed of her right to receive her revenues; and this point was from that time reserved as an object of future discussion. I shall be happy to contribute as far as is in my power to this arrangement, and to the stipulation of a fair sum to be paid by the United States for all such damages, that all discussion may thus be speedily and amicably terminated.

My second proposal has been admitted by your Government, with this modification; that all grants and sales of lands made by His Catholic Majesty, or by lawful Spanish authorities in the Floridas, from the year 1802 to the present, shall be null and void. To this modification, in its absolute sense, I cannot assent, inasmuch as it is offensive to the dignity and imprescriptible rights of the Crown of Spain, which, as the legitimate owner of both the Floridas, had a right to dispose of those lands as it pleased; and further, as the said modification would be productive of incalculable injury to the bona fide possessors, who have acquired, settled, and improved these tracts of land.

The extent of what I can agree to is, that the late grants made by His Majesty in the Floridas since the 24th of January last, the date of my first note announcing His Majesty's willingness to cede them to the United States, (the said grants having been made with a view to promote population, cultivation, and industry, and not with that of alienating them,) shall be declared null and void, in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the essential conditions of the cession, as has been the fact.

My third proposal refers to the boundary line to be established between the possessions of the Crown of Spain and those of the United States. Acceding, as far as is possible for me to do, to the modifications proposed by you, and with a view of offering to the United States an additional proof of my wish to remove existing difficulties, I will undertake to admit the river Sabine instead of the Mermento as the boundary between the two Powers, from the Gulf of Mexico, on condition that the same line proposed by you shall run due north from the point where it crosses the Rio Roxo (Red river) until it strikes the Mississippi, and extend thence along the middle of the latter to its source, leaving to Spain the territory lying to the right, and to the United States the territory lying to the left of the same.

What you add respecting the extension of the same line beyond the Missouri along the Spanish possessions to the Pacific ocean exceeds, by its magnitude and its transcendancy, all former demands and pretensions started by the United States. Confining myself, therefore, to the powers granted to me by my Sovereign, I am unable to stipulate anything on this point which may remain open for further negotiation, as I have no doubt of His Majesty's disposition to agree to the appointment of a joint commission to determine and establish the future boundaries from the source of the Mississippi to the north and west, in a manner conformably to the titles and documents of property and possession respectively exhibited. Leaving, therefore, this point unsettled, as I have just observed, I conceive that my proposal for the adjustment of boundaries will not be attended with any difficulty whatever.

My fourth proposal to your Government has for its object the renunciation by both Governments and nations of all claims for spoiliations respectively suffered by either of the two Powers or their subjects until the signing of the treaty. This proposal has been admitted by your Government, with the exception of such claims as American citizens may have on the subjects of His Catholic Majesty or on the Spanish Government, and which have not been laid before the Department of State of the United States, or their

Relations with Spain.

Minister at the Court of Spain. I have no hesitation in assenting to this exception, but it should be made reciprocal for the subjects of the Crown of Spain, who may be entitled to claims on American citizens, or on the Government of the United States, and which have not yet been presented in due form to His Majesty's Secretary of State, or his Minister near the United States. My proposal will thus be free from difficulty, and conform to the modifications you have suggested.

Nor do I find any difficulty in agreeing to the modifications you offer to my fifth proposal, and proceeding to the sixth, the object of which is to remedy the abuses and violations, repeated pernicious examples of which have occurred in different parts of this Republic, through the toleration and countenance given therein to piratical and privateering armaments, against the commerce and navigation of Spain. I observe you state that what I propose is inadmissible; but I have received orders from my Sovereign to insist on this point, and to claim of your Government such measures as are imperiously called for by the very nature of these abuses and violations, as they not only contravene the existing treaty, but are in direct opposition to the most respectable compacts founded on international and public law.

Whatever may be the forecast, wisdom, and justice conspicuous in the laws of the United States, it is universally notorious that a system of pillage and aggression has been organized in several parts of the Union against the vessels and property of the Spanish nation; and it is equally so that all the legal suits hitherto instituted by His Catholic Majesty's Consuls in the courts of their respective districts, for its prevention, or the recovery of the property when brought into this country, have been and still are completely unavailing. The artifices and evasions, by means of which the letter of the law has on these occasions been constantly eluded, are sufficiently known, and even the combination of interest in persons who are well known, among whom are some holding public offices. With a view to afford you and the President more complete demonstration of the abuses, aggressions, and piracies alluded to, I enclose you correct lists, extracted from authentic documents deposited in the archives of this legation, exhibiting the number of privateers or pirates fitted out in the United States against Spain, and of the prizes brought by them into the ports of the Union, as well as of those sent to other ports, together with the result of the claims made by Spanish Consuls in the courts of this country. Among them you will find the case of two armed ships, the Horatio and Curiazo, built at New York, and detained by His Majesty's Consul there, on the ground of their having on board thirty pieces of cannon concealed, with their carriages, and a crew of one hundred and sixty men; on which occasion it was pretended that it could not be proved that these guns were not an article of commerce, and they finally put to sea without them, the extraordinary number of officers and crew passing for passengers. The number of privateers or pirates fitted out and protected in the ports of this Republic, as well as of the Spanish prizes made by them, far exceeds that contained in the within lists; but I only lay before your Government those of which I have certain and satisfactory proofs. The right of Spain to an adequate indemnity for all the spoiliations committed by these privateers or pirates on the Crown and subjects of His Catholic Majesty is undeniable; but I now submit it to your Government only to point out the extreme necessity of putting an end to these continued acts of hostility and depredation, and of cutting short these enormous and flagrant abuses and evils, by the adoption of such effectual precautions and remedies as will put it out of the power of cupidity or iniquity to defeat or elude them. In vain should we endeavor amicably to settle and accommodate all existing differences, and thus establish peace and good understanding between the two nations, if the practice of these abuses, and the course of these hostilities and piracies on the commerce and navigation of Spain should, as heretofore, continue uninterrupted in the United States. From the tenor of the documents now enclosed, and of the reflections suggested by the very nature and state of things, the President cannot hesitate to assent to my proposal on this subject; and as the Congress is now in session, I feel assured that the proper opportunity is afforded for the adoption of the necessary measures I have alluded to, and which I solicit as an essential basis of securing and maintaining a mutual friendship and good understanding between the two nations.

My seventh proposal having likewise been accepted by your Government, I agree to what you propose in answer thereto.

If my proposals, thus modified, should be agreed to by your Government, I am ready to sign them, after they are corrected and reduced to proper form, and augmented by such others, although inferior and of minor importance, as are consequent upon them, and essential in giving due solidity to the inestimable blessings of peace and good understanding between the two Governments, and in avoiding every difficulty and disagreement in future between the individuals and authorities of either nation.

I flatter myself that, by what I have just submitted, I give you and every impartial person a convincing proof of the generosity, frankness, and good faith of His Catholic Majesty's Government in the present negotiation, and of my sincere and uniform desire to terminate it to the satisfaction of both Powers. I shall add that, relying on His Catholic Majesty's wish to see a final arrangement speedily and amicably effected, if it should be proposed only to draw the line from the point mentioned on the Red river (Rio Roxo) somewhat obliquely (con alguna oblicuidad) to the westward of the right line due north, which I offer as the boundary of the two countries, I shall not hesitate to take upon myself the arrangement upon this point; it being always understood that the proposed line shall strike the Missouri.

Relations with Spain.

Having thus approximated my proposals to the modifications offered by you, as closely as my duty and power permit me, I have to hope that they will be accepted by your Government, as they offer great sacrifices on the part of Spain in favor of the United States. But if, unfortunately, they should not, and the President should still insist on those which you communicated to me, as well as on the peremptory declaration that neither they nor the documents which I have offered to produce in support of the sovereignty of the Crown of Spain to all the territory claimed by the United States, can be further discussed, the only discretionary power left to me is to request of the President, in the name of my Sovereign, that the negotiation, in its actual state, may be submitted to the decision of the great monarchs now assembled in Congress at Aix la Chapelle; in either of which cases, I will immediately despatch a courier to my Court with all necessary information for His Catholic Majesty, that His Majesty may decide on the measures most proper to be adopted on the occasion.

I trust that you will communicate to me the decision of the President. In the mean time, I offer you the renewed assurances of my respect and distinguished consideration.

God preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

No. 3.

A summary statement of money and property taken out of Spanish vessels, known to have been brought into the United States in American vessels, and the privateers by which they were plundered; exhibiting the result or present state of the claims to obtain restitution thereof, to wit:

At New Orleans. Restoration of seventy slaves of the cargo of the bark Volador, clandestinely conveyed there by the piratical captors, claimed and obtained by Don Vincente Ordozgoiti, of Pensacola.

At the same place. Certain property found on board a vessel abandoned by the American troops to the Barrataria pirates, claimed by Don Diego Morphy, Vice Consul, ordered to be delivered to him.

At the same place. Restoration of certain Spanish property, brought there in the Petit Milan privateer, claimed and obtained by the same Consul.

At the same place. Restoration of certain property, brought there by the Presidente privateer, claimed and obtained by the same Consul, for account of the lawful owners.

At the same place. Restoration of thirteen casks of clothing, brought there by the American brig Alonzo from Galveston, and two hundred and eighty-five pieces of Madras handkerchiefs, claimed by His Majesty's Consul, Don Felipe Fatio, both still pending.

Claim by the same Consul of thirty boxes of sugar, brought to New Orleans from Galveston; result yet unknown.

Claim by the same of sundry merchandise, brought to New Orleans on board the Mount Vernon; not decided on.

At Charleston. Claim of property saved from the Spanish prize brig Jupiter, lost after capture by pirates at the entrance of that river; order for its restoration yet unknown.

In the year 1812, the Anglo-American privateer Revenge, Captain Butler, after having committed numerous acts of piracy, boarded, under English colors, the Spanish ship Iris, bound from Havana, or Carthagena, in South America, to Spain, with a cargo of fifty-five thousand dollars in specie, of provincial money, silver in bars, and other valuable articles. There exists almost positive proof that the captain of the Revenge, not satisfied with robbing the Spaniards of their property, endeavored to choke the pumps, and sink the ship, with all the crew. The captain and some of the crew were arrested, and confined in jail at Charleston; but, notwithstanding the satisfactory evidence produced by His Majesty's Consul on the trial, he was liberated, and only a thousand and some odd dollars, found on board the privateer, recovered. Don Felipe Aldaytarriaga, agent for the Iris, had recourse afterwards to the courts at Philadelphia, which confirmed the sentence of the court at Charleston, for the liberation of Captain Butler and his crew, freed the owners of the Revenge from all responsibility to the owners of the Iris, and even ordered the money found on board the Revenge to be restored to the crew. An official representation of this transaction was made to the President, but without effect.

Relations with Spain.

Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, Consul at Charleston, and vested with full powers, claimed an obtained an attachment on one hundred and twenty boxes of sugar, fifty-five barrels of coffee, and four packages of white wax, brought there by the Amelia Island pirates, through St. Mary's, in Georgia; which claim is still pending.

Towards the close of the last year, the same Consul, through the medium of an agent despatched to St. Mary's, had an attachment laid on certain Spanish property brought there from Amelia Island, amounting to one hundred thousand dollars, among which was a quantity of snuff and cigars, public property, shipped on board the Spanish ship Union Carmelita, Captain Es. Roura, captured by the insurgents; this case still pending.

At Norfolk. Claim by Don Pablo Chacou, Consul there, of money and property brought there by the privateer Potosi, alias the Spartan, of Baltimore, Captain John Chase, supposed to belong to the Spanish ship "Ciencia," captured by that privateer, on her passage from Havana to Cadiz; failed for want of evidence.

At the same place. Claim by Don Antonio Argote Villalobos, when Consul there, of a large sum of money, and eighty-seven ceroons of cochineal, mostly belonging to the Spanish vessels the Santander and the Santissima Trinidad, alias the Manso, captured by the privateers Independencia del Sud and the Altavella, alias the Romp, Captains Chaytor and Greenolds, on their passage from Vera Cruz to Havana; still pending.

At the same place. Claim by Don Pablo Chacou of the restitution of one hundred and ninety-three ceroons of barks, twenty-eight cases of extract of Brazil, and thirteen bags of cotton, on board the Venezuela privateer the America Libre, alias the Neptuno, Captain Bernard, arrived from Margarita; restitution not obtained, as well from want of proof to identify the property, as the refusal of the authorities at Norfolk to attach it, agreeably to the demand of the Consul.

Don Pablo Chacou claimed and obtained an attachment on forty-seven boxes of white Havana sugar, arrived at Norfolk on board the American schooner Atlantic, Captain Butler, from Port-au-Prince, the said sugar having been taken from on board the Spanish brig San Antonio by the pirate called the Invincible; this suit still pending.

At Baltimore. Claim by Don Pablo Chacou, when Consul there, of the restitution of two cases of silks, declared to have been taken on the high seas, and two boxes of lace, brought in by the piratical schooner Mongore, Captain Barnes; failed for want of proof.

The American schooner Remittance, Captain Rogers, arrived at Baltimore from Port-au-Prince, with the following property, taken by the pirate Potosi, Captain John Chase, from on board the Spanish ship "Ciencia," captured on her voyage from Havana to Cadiz, namely: three cases of wrought plate, one of jewelry thirty-three bundles of cochineal, three of jalap, and various other valuable articles. Claim by Mr. Chacou of the restitution of this property to the lawful owners still pending.

At the same port of Baltimore arrived the brig Hibernia, with several bags of cotton and some coffee on board, taken by the pirate the Patriota, Captain Thomas Taylor, from a Spanish boat going to St. Jago de Cuba. Powers sent by the owners to a merchant at Baltimore, who lodged a claim without delay, but has yet obtained no decision in the case.

Into the same port of Baltimore the following property was brought on board the American schooner the Evening Post, Captain Williams, from Galveston, having been transhipped on board that vessel from the Spanish polacre Santa Maria, Captain Jose Fort y Blanch, captured by the pirate Patriota, Captain Stafford, to wit: one hundred and thirty-eight boxes of lump sugar, eighty-three ditto white, five half boxes of ditto, nine packages of cotton, and one hundred and twenty pieces Campeachy wood. This property was immediately secreted by the consignee, Mr. John Laborde, and escaped the search of the Consul, Don Joaquim Zamorano, who took the necessary steps to have an attachment laid on it.

At the same port there arrived another schooner, the Amatea, Captain Forbes, from Galveston, with fifty-four boxes of white sugar, seventy-three ditto lump, and three hundred and fifty-nine hides, taken from on board the polacre Santa Maria by the pirate Stafford, and consigned to the said John Laborde, who, in consequence of the dilatory proceeding of the marshal of the district, found time to secrete them, and evade the attachment granted at the request of Mr. Consul Zamorano.

The pirate Patriota, Captain Taylor, arrived in the Chesapeake, and privately landed above $22,000 in gold, together with five slaves, taken from on board the Spanish schooner San Miguel, Captain Juan Velasquez, bound from Maracaibo to St. Jago de Cuba; and, notwithstanding every exertion used by Don J. Zamorano to discover the place of deposit of the money and slaves, his search proved fruitless.

The same pirate, the Patriota, commanded by Captain Stafford, attempted, on another occasion of his arriving in the Chesapeake, privately to land five hundred boxes of sugar, taken from on board the polacre Santa Maria, but was able to land only forty-five, which were seized and condemned by the custom-house at Baltimore. The efforts of the Consul to stop the privateer Patriota were rendered abortive by the misconduct of the marshal of the district.

The American schooner Harriet, Captain Southcomb, arrived at Baltimore from Galveston with the following property shipped on board her there, belonging to the aforesaid polacre Santa Maria, to wit: twenty-two boxes of white sugar, ten half boxes ditto, one hundred and nineteen boxes of powdered sugar, thirteen half boxes ditto, thirteen cases of wine, one ton of Campeachy wood, and twenty-five logs of mahogany. The whole claimed by Don Joaquim Zamorano, and still pending.

The privateer St. Martin, Captain John Dieter, brought into Baltimore to the amount of $11,000 in gold and silver, belonging, as has since appeared, to Don Cristoval Cruzat, merchant at Malaga, and taken from on board a polacre, also belonging to him, captured by the said privateer June 12, 1817. The Consul Zamorano having been unable to trace this property, no recovery has been made.

The American schooner Hornet, Captain Ring, arrived at Baltimore from St. Mary's, in Georgia, with the following property, shipped at Amelia Island: one hundred and seventeen boxes of sugar, twenty-four ceroons of indigo, and a parcel of Campeachy wood, consigned to the said John Laborde; attachment on which could not be laid, the marshal's place then being vacant; and, before the aid of the sheriff could be brought in, Laborde found means to remove the whole.

The privateer Rio de la Plata, Captain Davy, landed at the same port the sum of $8,000, the property of which could not be ascertained by Don Joaquim Zamorano.

A vessel found deserted at the entrance of the Delaware, apparently a Spaniard, from her build and some remains of cargo. Claimed by Don Bdne. Renguenet, Consul at Philadelphia, on behalf of her lawful owners; affair still pending.

At Boston, Don Juan Stoughton attached a part of the cargo of the Spanish brig San Jose, captured by the pirate Romp, of Baltimore; and, although he obtained an order for her restitution to her owners, it has not yet been effected, owing to the absence of the district attorney.

The same Consul entered a claim at Boston for a part of the cargo of the brig Nuestra Señora del Buen Suceso, Captain Jose Roldam, captured by the pirate Rio de la Plata, Captain Davy, and carried into Marblehead by a fishing schooner. Claim still pending.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1818.

The Secretary of State to George W. Erving, Esq.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Washington, November 28, 1818.

SIR: Your despatches to No. 92, inclusive, with their enclosures, have been received at this Department. Among these enclosures are the several notes addressed to you by Mr. Pizarro in relation to the transactions during the campaign of General Jackson against the Seminole Indians, and the banditti of negroes combined with them, and particularly to his proceedings in Florida without the boundaries of the United States.

In the fourth and last of these notes of Mr. Pizarro, he has given formal notice that the King, his master, has issued orders for the suspension of the negotiation between the United States and Spain until satisfaction shall have been made by the American Government to him for these proceedings of General Jackson, which he considers as acts of unequivocal hostility against him, and as outrages upon his honor and dignity; the only acceptable atonement for which is stated to consist in a disavowal of the acts of the American General thus complained of, the infliction upon him of suitable punishment for his supposed misconduct, and the restitution of the posts and territories taken by him from the Spanish authorities, with indemnity for all the property taken, and all damages and injuries, public or private, sustained in consequence of it.

Within a very few days after this notification, Mr. Pizarro must have received, with copies of the correspondence between Mr. Onis and this Department, the determination which had been taken by the President to restore the places of Pensacola, with the fort of Barancas, to any person properly authorized on the part of Spain to receive them, and the fort of St. Mark to any Spanish force adequate to its protection against the Indians, by whom its forcible occupation had been threatened for purposes of hostility against the United States. The officer commanding at the post has been directed to consider two hundred and fifty men as such adequate force, and, in case of their appearance with proper authority, to deliver it up to their commander accordingly.

From the last-mentioned correspondence, the Spanish Government must likewise have been satisfied that the occupation of these places in Spanish Florida by the commander of the American forces was not by virtue of any orders received by him from this Government to that effect, nor with any view of wresting the province from the possession of Spain, nor in any spirit of hostility to the Spanish Government; that it arose from incidents which occurred in the prosecution of the war against the Indians, from the imminent danger in which the fort of St. Mark was of being seized by the Indians themselves, and from the manifestations of hostility to the United States by the commandant of St. Mark's and the Governor of Pensacola, the proofs of which were made known to General Jackson, and impelled him, from the necessities of self-defence, to the steps of which the Spanish Government complains.

It might be sufficient to leave the vindication of these measures upon those grounds, and to furnish, in the enclosed copies of General Jackson's letters, and the vouchers by which they are supported, the evidence of that hostile spirit on the part of the Spanish commanders, but for the terms in which Mr. Pizarro speaks of the execution of two British subjects taken, one at the fort of St. Mark, and the other at Suwanee, and the intimation that these transactions may lead to a change in the relations between the two nations, which is doubtless intended to be understood as a menace of war.

It may be, therefore, proper to remind the Government of His Catholic Majesty of the incidents in which this Seminole war originated, as well as of the circumstances connected with it in the relations between Spain and her ally, whom she supposes to have been injured by the proceedings of General Jackson; and to give to the Spanish Cabinet some precise information of the nature of the business, peculiarly interesting to Spain, in which these subjects of her allies, in whose favor she takes this interest, were engaged, when their projects of every kind were terminated in consequence of their falling into the hands of General Jackson.

In the month of August, 1814, while a war existed between the United States and Great Britain, to which Spain had formally declared herself neutral, a British force, not in the fresh pursuit of a defeated and flying enemy, not overstepping an imaginary and equivocal boundary between their own territories and those belonging, in some sort, as much to their enemy as to Spain, but approaching by sea, and by a broad and open invasion of the Spanish province, at a thousand miles or an ocean's distance from any British territory, landed in Florida, took possession of Pensacola and the fort of Barancas, and invited, by public proclamations, (document No. 1.) all the runaway negroes, all the savage Indians, all the pirates, and all the traitors to their country whom they knew or imagined to exist within reach of their summons, to join their standard, and wage an exterminating war against the portion of the United States immediately bordering upon this neutral and thus violated territory of Spain. The land commander of this British force was a certain Colonel Nicholls, who, driven from Pensacola by the approach of General Jackson, actually left to be blown up the Spanish fort of Barancas when he found it could not afford him protection; and, evacuating that part of the province, landed at another, established himself on the Appalachicola river, and there erected a fort from which to sally forth with his motley tribe of black, white, and red combatants against the defenceless borders of the United States in that vicinity. A part of this force consisted of a corps of colonial marines, levied in the British colonies, in which George Woodbine was a captain, and Robert Christie Ambrister was a lieutenant. (Nos. 2 b. 59, 60.)

As between the United States and Great Britain, we should be willing to bury this transaction in the same grave of oblivion with other transactions of that war, had the hostilities of Colonel Nicholls terminated with the war; but he did not consider the peace which ensued between the United States and Great Britain as having put an end, either to his military occupations, or to his negotiations with the Indians against the United States. Several months after the ratification of the Treaty of Ghent, he retained his post, and his party-colored forces in military array. By the ninth article of that treaty (No. 2 b.) the United States had stipulated to put an end, immediately after its ratification, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians with whom they might be at war at the time of the ratification, and to restore to them all the possessions which they had enjoyed in the year 1811. This article had no application to the Creek nation, with whom the United States had already made peace, by a treaty concluded on the 9th day of August, 1814, more than four months before the Treaty of Ghent was signed. Yet Colonel Nicholls not only affected to consider it as applying to the Seminoles of Florida, and the outlawed Red Sticks, whom he had induced to join him there, but actually persuaded them that they were entitled, by virtue of the Treaty of Ghent, to all the lands which had belonged to the Creek nation within the United States in the year 1811, and that the Government of Great Britain would support them in that pretension. He asserted (No. 2. a. c.) also this doctrine in a correspondence with Colonel Hawkins, then the agent of the United States with the Creeks, and gave him notice in their name, with a mockery of solemnity, (No. 9.) that they had concluded a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, and a treaty of navigation and commerce, with Great Britain, of which more was to be heard after it should be ratified in England. Colonel Nicholls then evacuated his fort, which, in some of the enclosed papers, is called the Fort at Prospect Bluff, but which he had denominated the British post on the Appalachicola; took with him the white portion of his force, and embarked for England with several of the wretched savages whom he was thus deluding to their fate, among whom was the prophet Francis or Hillis Hadjo, and left the fort, amply supplied with military stores and ammunitions, to the negro department of his allies. It afterwards was known by the name of the Negro Fort.

Colonel Hawkins immediately communicated to this Government the correspondence between him and Nicholls, here referred to, (copies of which, marked Nos. 1 to 5, are herewith enclosed,) upon which, Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State, addressed a letter (No. 10) to Mr. Baker, the British Chargé d'Affaires at Washington, complaining of Nicholls's conduct, and showing that his pretence that the ninth article of the Treaty of Ghent could have any application to his Indians was utterly destitute of foundation. Copies of the same correspondence were transmitted to the Minister of the United States, then in England, with instructions (No. 11) to remonstrate with the British Government against these proceedings of Nicholls, and to show how incompatible they were with the peace which had been concluded between the two nations. These remonstrances were accordingly made, first in personal interview with Earl Bathurst and Lord Castlereagh, and afterwards in written notes addressed successively to them, (copies of which, [Nos. 12 a. b, 13 a. b.] together with extracts from the despatches of the American Ministers to the Secretary of State, reporting what passed at those interviews, are enclosed.) Lord Bathurst, in the most unequivocal manner, confirmed the facts, and disavowed the misconduct of Nicholls; declared his disapprobation of the pretended treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, which he had made; assured the American Minister that the British Government had refused to ratify that treaty, and would send back the Indians whom Nicholls had brought with him, with advice to make their peace on such terms as they could obtain. Lord Castlereagh confirmed the assurances that the treaty would not be ratified; and if, at the same time that these assurances were given, certain distinctions of public notoriety were shown to the prophet Hillis Hadjo, and he was actually honored with a commission as a British officer, it is to be presumed that these favors were granted him as rewards of past services, and not as an encouragement to expect any support from Great Britain in a continuance of savage hostilities against the United States; all intention of giving any such support having been repeatedly and earnestly disavowed.

The negro fort, however, abandoned by Colonel Nicholls, remained on the Spanish territory, occupied by the banditti to whom he had left it, and held by them as a post from whence to commit depredations, outrages, and murders, and as a receptacle for fugitive slaves and malefactors, (No. 14,) to the great annoyance both of the United States and of Spanish Florida. In April, 1816, General Jackson wrote a letter to the Governor of Pensacola, calling upon him to put down this common nuisance to the peaceable inhabitants of both countries. That letter, together with the answer of the Governor of Pensacola, (No. 15,) has already been communicated to the Spanish Minister here, and by him doubtless to his Government. Copies of them are, nevertheless, now again enclosed; particularly as the letter from the Governor explicitly admits that this fort, constructed by Nicholls in violation both of the territory and neutrality of Spain, was still no less obnoxious to his Government than to the United States; but that he had neither sufficient force nor authority, without orders from the Governor General of Havana, to destroy it. It was afterwards, (No. 23,) on the 27th of July, 1816, destroyed by a cannon shot from a gun vessel of the United States, which, in its passage up the river, was fired upon from it. It was blown up with an English flag still flying as its standard, and immediately after the barbarous murder of a boat's crew belonging to the Navy of the United States, by the banditti left in it by Nicholls.

In the year 1817, Alexander Arbuthnot, of the island of New Providence, a British subject, first appeared as an English trader in Spanish Florida, and as the successor of Colonel Nicholls in the employment of instigating the Seminole and outlawed Red Sticks to Indian hostilities against the United States, by reviving the pretence that they were entitled to all the lands which had been ceded by the Creek nation to the United States in August, 1814. As a mere Indian trader, the intrusion of this man into a Spanish province was contrary to the policy observed by all the European Powers in this hemisphere, and by none more rigorously than by Spain, of excluding all foreigners from intercourse with the Indians within their territories. It must be known to the Spanish Government whether Arbuthnot had a Spanish license for trading with the Indians in Spanish Florida, or not; but they also know that Spain was bound by treaty to restrain by force all hostilities on the part of those Indians against the citizens of the United States; and it is for them to explain how, consistently with those engagements, Spain could, contrary to all the maxims of her ordinary policy, grant such a license to a foreign incendiary, whose principal if not his only object appears to have been to stimulate those hostilities which Spain had expressly stipulated by force to restrain. In his infernal instigations he was but too successful, (No. 49.) No sooner did he make his appearance among the Indians, accompanied by the prophet Hillis Hadjo, returned from his expedition to England, (No. 50,) than the peaceful inhabitants on the borders of the United States were visited with all the horrors of savage war—the robbery of their property, and the barbarous and indiscriminate murder of women, infancy, and age.

After the repeated expostulations, warnings, and offers of peace, through the Summer and Autumn of 1817, on the part of the United States, had been answered only by renewed outrages, and after a detachment of forty men, under Lieutenant Scott, (No. 51 a.) accompanied by seven women, had been waylaid and murdered by the Indians, (No. 61,) orders were given to General Jackson, and an adequate force was placed at his disposal to terminate the war. It was ascertained that the Spanish force in Florida was inadequate for the protection even of the Spanish territory itself against this mingled horde of lawless Indians and negroes; and, although their devastations were committed within the limits of the United States, they immediately sought refuge within the Florida line, and there only were to be overtaken. The necessity of crossing the line was indispensable; for it was from beyond the line that the Indians made their murderous incursions within that of the United States. It was there that they had their abode; and the territory belonged, in fact, to them, although within the borders of the Spanish jurisdiction. There it was that the American commander met the principal resistance from them; there it was that were found (No. 38) the still bleeding scalps of our citizens, freshly butchered by them; there it was that he released the only woman who had been suffered to survive the massacre of the party under Lieutenant Scott. But it was not anticipated by this Government that the commanding officers of Spain in Florida, whose especial duty it was, in conformity to the solemn engagements contracted by their nation, to restrain by force those Indians from hostilities against the United States, would be found encouraging, aiding, and abetting them, and furnishing them supplies for carrying on such hostilities. The officer in command immediately before General Jackson was, therefore, specially instructed to respect, as far as possible, the Spanish authority, wherever it was maintained; and copies of those orders were also furnished to General Jackson, upon his taking the command.

In the course of his pursuit, as he approached St. Marks, he was informed direct from the Governor of Pensacola that a party of the hostile Indians had threatened to seize that fort, and that he apprehended the Spanish garrison there was not in strength sufficient to defend it against them. This information was confirmed from other sources, and, by the evidence produced upon the trial of Ambrister, is proved to have been exactly true. By all the laws of neutrality and of war, as well as of prudence and of humanity, he was warranted in anticipating his enemy by the amicable, and, that being refused, by the forcible occupation of the fort. There will need no citations from printed treatises on international law to prove the correctness of this principle. It is engraved in adamant on the common sense of mankind. No writer upon the laws of nations ever pretended to contradict it. None, of any reputation or authority, ever omitted to assert it.

At Fort St. Mark, Alexander Arbuthnot, the British Indian trader from beyond the seas, the firebrand by whose touch this negro-Indian war against our borders had been rekindled, was found (No. 34) an inmate of the commandant's family; and it was also found that, by the commandant himself, councils of war had been permitted to be held within it by the savage chiefs and warriors; that the Spanish storehouses had been appropriated to their use; that it was an open market for cattle known to have been robbed by them from citizens of the United States, and which had been contracted for and purchased by the officers of the garrison; that information had been afforded from this fort by Arbuthnot to the enemy of the strength and movements of the American army; that the date of departure of express had been noted by the Spanish commissary; and ammunition, munitions of war, and all necessary supplies furnished to the Indians.

The conduct of the Governor of Pensacola was not less marked by a disposition of enmity to the United States, and by an utter disregard to the obligations of the treaty, by which he was bound to restrain, by force, the Indians from hostilities against them. When called upon to vindicate the territorial rights and authority of Spain, by the destruction of the negro fort, his predecessor had declared it to be not less annoying and pernicious to the Spanish subjects in Florida than to the United States, but had pleaded his inability to subdue it. He himself had expressed his apprehensions that Fort St. Mark would be forcibly taken by the savages from its Spanish garrison; yet, at the same time, he had refused the passage up the Escambia river, unless upon the payment of excessive duties, to provisions destined as supplies for the American army, which, by the detention of them, was subjected to the most distressing privations. He had permitted free ingress and egress at Pensacola to the avowed savage enemies of the United States. Supplies of ammunition, munitions of war, and provisions, had been received by them from thence. They had been received and sheltered there from the pursuit of the American forces, and suffered again to sally thence, to enter upon the American territory, and commit new murders. Finally, on the approach of General Jackson to Pensacola, the Governor sent him a letter (No. 33) denouncing his entry upon the territory of Florida as a violent outrage upon the rights of Spain, commanding him to depart and withdraw from the same, and threatening, in case of his non-compliance, to employ force to expel him.

It became, therefore, in the opinion of General Jackson, (No. 54,) indispensably necessary to take from the Governor of Pensacola the means of carrying his threat into execution. Before the forces under his command, the savage enemies of his country had disappeared. But he knew that the moment those forces should be disbanded, if sheltered by Spanish fortresses, if furnished with ammunition and supplies by Spanish officers, and if aided and supported by the instigation of Spanish encouragement, as he had every reason to expect they would be, they would reappear, and, fired, in addition to their ordinary ferociousness, with revenge for the chastisement they had so recently received, would again rush with the war-hatchet and the scalping-knife into the borders of the United States, and mark every footstep with the blood of their defenceless citizens. So far as all the native resources of the savage extended, the war was at an end; and General Jackson was about to restore to their families and their homes the brave volunteers who had followed his standard, and who had constituted the principal part of his force. This could be done with safety, leaving the regular portion of his troops to garrison his line of forts, and two small detachments of volunteer cavalry to scour the country round Pensacola, and sweep off the lurking remnant of savages who had been scattered and dispersed before him. This was sufficient to keep in check the remnant of the banditti against whom he had marched, so long as they should be destitute of other aid and support. It was, in his judgment, not sufficient, if they should be suffered to rally their numbers under the protection of Spanish forts, and to derive new strength from the impotence or the ill-will against the United States of the Spanish authorities.

He took possession, therefore, of Pensacola and of the fort of Barancas, as he had done of St. Mark, not in a spirit of hostility to Spain, but as a necessary measure of self-defence; giving notice that they should be restored whenever Spain should place commanders and a force there able and willing to fulfil the engagements of Spain towards the United States, or of restraining by force the Florida Indians from hostilities against their citizens. The President of the United States, to give a signal manifestation of his confidence in the disposition of the King of Spain to perform with good faith this indispensable engagement, and to demonstrate to the world that neither the desire of conquest, nor hostility to Spain, had any influence in the councils of the United States, has directed the unconditional restoration, to any Spanish officer duly authorized to receive them, of Pensacola and the Barancas, and that of St. Mark's, to any Spanish force adequate to its defence against the attack of the savages. But the President will neither inflict punishment, nor pass a censure upon General Jackson, for that conduct, the motives for which were founded in the purest patriotism; of the necessity for which he had the most immediate and effectual means of forming a judgment; and the vindication of which is written in every page of the law of nations, as well as in the first law of nature—self-defence. He thinks it, on the contrary, due to the justice which the United States have a right to claim from Spain, and you are accordingly instructed to demand of the Spanish Government that inquiry shall be instituted into the conduct of Don Jose Mazot, Governor of Pensacola, and of Don Francisco C. Luengo, commandant of St. Mark's, and a suitable punishment inflicted upon them, for having, in defiance and violation of the engagements of Spain with the United States, aided and assisted these hordes of savages in those very hostilities against the United States which it was their official duty to restrain. This inquiry is due to the character of those officers themselves, and to the honor of the Spanish Government. The obligation of Spain to restrain, by force, the Indians of Florida from hostilities against the United States and their citizens, is explicit, is positive, is unqualified. The fact that, for a series of years, they have received shelter, assistance, supplies, and protection, in the practice of such hostilities, from the Spanish commanders in Florida, is clear and unequivocal. If, as the commanders both at Pensacola and St. Marks have alleged, (Nos. 32, 42,) this has been the result of their weakness rather than of their will; if they have assisted the Indians against the United States to avert their hostilities from the province which they had not sufficient force to defend against them, it may serve in some measure to exculpate, individually, those officers; but it must carry demonstration irresistible to the Spanish Government, that the right of the United States can as little compound with impotence as with perfidy, and that Spain must immediately make her election, either to place a force in Florida adequate at once to the protection of her territory, and to the fulfilment of her engagements, or cede to the United States a province, of which she retains nothing but the nominal possession, but which is, in fact, a derelict, open to the occupancy of every enemy, civilized or savage, of the United States, and serving no other earthly purpose than as a post of annoyance to them.

That the purposes, as well of the negro-Indian banditti, with whom we have been contending, as of the British invaders of Florida, who first assembled and employed them, and of the British intruding and pretended traders, since the peace, who have instigated and betrayed them to destruction, have been not less hostile to Spain than to the United States, the proofs contained in the documents herewith enclosed are conclusive. Mr. Pizarro's note of 29th August speaks of His Catholic Majesty's profound indignation at the "sanguinary executions on the Spanish soil of the subjects of Powers in amity with the King;" meaning Arbuthnot and Ambrister. Let Mr. Pizarro's successor take the trouble of reading the enclosed documents, (Nos. 49, 58,) and he will discover who Arbuthnot and Ambrister were, and what were their purposes; that Arbuthnot was only the successor of Nicholls, and Ambrister the agent of Woodbine, and the subaltern of McGregor. Mr. Pizarro qualifies General Jackson's necessary pursuit of a defeated savage enemy beyond the Spanish Florida line as a shameful invasion of His Majesty's territory. Yet that territory was the territory also of the savage enemy, and Spain was bound to restrain them by force from hostilities against the United States; and it was the failure of Spain to fulfil this engagement which had made it necessary for General Jackson to pursue the savage across the line. What, then, was the character of Nicholls's invasion of His Majesty's territory? And where was His Majesty's profound indignation at that? Mr. Pizarro says, His Majesty's forts and places have been violently seized on by General Jackson. Had they not been seized on, nay, had not the principal of his forts been blown up by Nicholls, and a British fort on the same Spanish territory been erected during the war, and left standing as a negro fort, in defiance of Spanish authority, after the peace? Where was His Majesty's profound indignation at that? Has His Majesty suspended formally all negotiation with the Sovereign of Colonel Nicholls for this shameful invasion of his territory, without color of provocation, without pretence of necessity, without shadow or even avowal of a pretext? Has His Majesty given solemn warning to the British Government that these were incidents "of transcendent moment, capable of producing an essential and thorough change in the political relations of the two countries?" Nicholls and Woodbine, in their invitations and promises to the slaves to run away from their masters and join them, did not confine themselves to the slaves of the United States. They received with as hearty a welcome, and employed with equal readiness, the fugitives from their masters in Florida as those from Georgia. Against this special injury the Governor of Pensacola did earnestly remonstrate with the British admiral, Cockburn. (See document marked No. 25.) But against the shameful invasion of the territory; against the violent seizure of the forts and places; against the blowing up of the Barancas, and the erection and maintenance, under British banners, of the negro fort on Spanish soil; against the negotiation by a British officer, in the midst of peace, of pretended treaties, offensive and defensive, and of navigation and commerce, upon Spanish territory, between Great Britain and Spanish Indians, whom Spain was bound to control and restrain—if a whisper of expostulation was ever wafted from Madrid to London, it was not loud enough to be heard across the Atlantic, nor energetic enough to transpire beyond the walls of the palaces from which it issued, and to which it was borne.

The connexion between Arbuthnot and Nicholls, and between Ambrister, Woodbine, and McGregor, is established beyond all question, by the evidence produced at the trials before the court-martial. I have already remarked to you on the very extraordinary circumstance that a British trader from beyond the sea should be permitted by the Spanish authorities to trade with the Indians of Florida. From his letter to Hambly, dated 3d May, 1817, (see the document marked G, in the proceedings of the court-martial,) it appears that his trading was but a pretence, and that his principal purpose was to act as the agent of the Indians of Florida, and outlaws from the Creeks, to obtain the aid of the British Government in their hostilities against the United States. He expressly tells Hambly there that the chief of those outlaws was the principal cause of his (Arbuthnot's) being in the country, and that he had come with an answer from Earl Bathurst, delivered to him by Governor Cameron, of New Providence, to certain Indian talks, in which the aid of the British Government had been solicited.

Hambly himself had been left by Nicholls as the agent between the Indians and the British Government; but having found that Nicholls had failed in his attempt to prevail upon the British Government to pursue this clandestine war in the midst of peace, and that they were not prepared to support his pretence that half a dozen outlawed fugitives from the Creeks were the Creek nation; when Arbuthnot, the incendiary, came, and was instigating them, by promises of support from Great Britain, to commence their murderous incursions into the United States, Hambly, at the request of the chiefs of the Creeks themselves, wrote to him, (Nos. 47, 6,) warning him to withdraw from among that band of outlaws, and giving him a solemn foreboding of the doom that awaited him from the hand of justice if he persevered in the course that he pursued. Arbuthnot nevertheless persisted; and while he was deluding the wretched Indians with the promise of support from England, he was writing letters for them (No. 49 B C D E F) to the British Minister in the United States, to Governor Cameron, of New Providence, to Colonel Nicholls, to be laid before the British Government, and even to the Spanish Governor of St. Augustine, and the Governor General of the Havana, (H n. 2.) soliciting, in all quarters, aid and support, arms and ammunition, for the Indians against the United States, bewailing the destruction of the negro fort, and charging the British Government with having drawn the Indians into war with the United States, and deserting them after the peace.

You will remark among the papers produced on his trial, a power of attorney (No. 49 n. 1) dated June 17, 1817, given him by twelve Indians, partly of Florida, and partly of the fugitive outlaws from the United States. He states that his power and his instructions were to memorialize the British Government and the Governor General of the Havana. These papers are not only substantially proved as of his handwriting on the trial, but, in the daily newspapers of London of the 24th and 25th of August last, his letter to Nicholls (compare Nos. 47 a. and 49 F.) is published, (somewhat curiously garbled,) with a copy (No. 47 b.) of Hambly's above-mentioned letter to him, and a reference to this Indian power of attorney to him, (compare Nos. 47 c. and 49 n. 1,) approved by the commandant of St. Mark's, F. C. Luengo. Another of the papers is a letter written in the name of the same chiefs, by Arbuthnot, to the Governor General of the Havana, (No. 49 H.) asking of him permission for Arbuthnot to establish a warehouse on the Appalachian, bitterly and falsely complaining that the Americans had made settlements on their lands within the Spanish lines, and calling upon the Governor General to give orders to displace them, and send them back to their own country. In this letter, they assign as a reason for asking the license for Arbuthnot, their want of a person to put in writing for them their talks of grievances against the Americans, and they add: "The commander of the fort of St. Mark has heard of all our talks and complaints. He approves of what we have done and what we are doing, and it is by his recommendation we have thus presumed to address your excellency." You will find these papers in the printed newspapers enclosed, and in the proceedings of the court-martial, and will point them out to the Spanish Government, not only as decisive proofs of the unexampled compliances of the Spanish officers in Florida to foreign intrusive agents and instigators of Indian hostilities against the United States, but as placing beyond a doubt that participation of this hostile spirit in the commandant of St. Mark's which General Jackson so justly complains of, and of which we have so well-founded a right to demand the punishment. Here is the commandant of a Spanish fort, bound by the sacred engagement of a treaty to restrain by force the Indians within his command from committing hostilities against the United States, conspiring with those same Indians, and deliberately giving his written approbation to their appointment of a foreigner, a British subject, as their agent to solicit assistance and supplies from the Governor General of the Havana, and from the British, for carrying on those same hostilities.

Let us come to the case of Ambrister. He was taken in arms, leading and commanding the Indians in the war against the American troops; and to that charge, upon his trial, pleaded guilty. But the primary object of his coming there was still more hostile to Spain than to the United States. You find (No. 58) that he told three of the witnesses who testified at his trial that he had come to this country upon Mr. Woodbine's business at Tampa bay, to see the negroes righted; and one of them, that he had a commission in the patriot army under McGregor, and that he had expected a captaincy. And what was the intended business of McGregor and Woodbine at Tampa bay? It was the conquest of Florida from Spain, by the use of those very Indians and negroes whom the commandant of St. Mark's was so ready to aid and support in war against the United States. The chain of proof that establishes this fact is contained in the documents communicated by the President to Congress at their last session, relating to the occupation of Amelia Island by McGregor. From these documents you will find (Nos. 56, 57 a.) that while McGregor was there, Woodbine went from New Providence in a schooner of his own to join him; that he arrived at Amelia Island just as McGregor, abandoning the companions of his achievement there, was leaving it; that McGregor, quitting the vessel in which he had embarked at Amelia, went on board that of Woodbine, and returned with him to New Providence; that Woodbine had persuaded him they could yet accomplish the conquest of Florida with soldiers to be recruited at Nassau from the corps of colonial marines which had served under Nicholls during the late war with the United States, which corps had been lately disbanded, and with negroes to be found at Tampa bay, and 1,500 Indians already then engaged to Woodbine, who pretended that they had made a grant of all their lands there to him. Among the papers, the originals of which are in our possession, are, in McGregor's own handwriting, instructions (No. 57 b.) for sailing into Tampa bay, with the assertion that he calculated to be there by the last of April or first of May of the present year; a letter (c) dated 27th December last, to one of his acquaintances in this country, disclosing the same intention; and the extract of a proclamation (d.) which was to have been issued at Tampa bay, to the inhabitants of Florida, by the person charged with making the settlement there before his arrival, announcing his approach for the purpose of liberating them from the despotism of Spain, and of enabling them to form a Government for themselves. He had persuaded those who would listen to him here that his ultimate object was to sell the Floridas to the United States. There is some reason to suppose that he had made indirect overtures of a similar nature to the British Government. This was Ambrister's business in Florida. He arrived there in March, the precursor of McGregor and Woodbine; and immediately upon his arrival he is found (No. 49) seizing upon Arbuthnot's goods, and distributing them among the negroes and Indians; seizing upon his vessel, and compelling its master to pilot him, with a body of armed negroes, towards the fort of St. Mark, with the declared purpose of taking it by surprise in the night; writing letters to Governor Cameron, of New Providence, urgently calling for supplies of munitions of war and of cannon for the war against the Americans, and letters to Colonel Nicholls, renewing the same demands of supplies, informing him that he is with 300 negroes, "a few of our Bluff people," who had stuck to the cause, and were relying upon the faith of Nicholls's promises. "Our Bluff people" were the people of the negro fort, collected by Nicholls and Woodbine's proclamations during the American and English war; and "the cause" to which they stuck was the savage, servile, exterminating war against the United States.

Among the agents and actors of such virtuous enterprises as are here unveiled, it was hardly to be expected that there would be found remarkable evidences of their respect, confidence, and good faith towards one another. Accordingly, besides the violent seizure and distribution by Ambrister of Arbuthnot's property, his letters to Cameron and to Nicholls are filled with the distrust and suspicions of the Indians that they were deceived and betrayed by Arbuthnot; while, in Arbuthnot's letters to the same Nicholls, (No. 49 F) he accuses Woodbine of having taken charge of poor Francis the prophet, or Hillis Hadjo, upon his return from England to New Providence, and, under pretence of taking care of him and his affairs, of having defrauded him of a large portion of the presents which had been delivered out from the King's stores to him for Francis's use. This is one of the passages of Arbuthnot's letter (No. 47 a.) to Nicholls, omitted in the publication of it last August in the London newspapers.

Is this narrative of dark and complicated depravity; this creeping and insidious war, both against Spain and the United States; this mockery of patriotism; these political filters to fugitive slaves and Indian outlaws; these perfidies and treacheries of villains incapable of keeping their faith even to each other; all in the name of South American liberty, of the rights of runaway negroes, and the wrongs of savage murderers—all combined and projected to plunder Spain of her province, and to spread massacre and devastation along the borders of the United States—is all this sufficient to cool the sympathies of His Catholic Majesty's Government, excited by the execution of these two "subjects of a Power in amity with the King!" The Spanish Government is not at this day to be informed that, cruel as war in its mildest forms must be, it is, and necessarily must be, doubly cruel when waged with savages; that savages make no prisoners but to torture them; that they give no quarters; that they put to death, without discrimination of age or sex. That these ordinary characteristics of Indian warfare have been applicable, in their most heart-sickening horrors to that war left us by Nicholls as his legacy, rekindled by Woodbine, Arbuthnot, and Ambrister, and stimulated by the approbation, encouragement, and aid of the Spanish commandant at St. Marks, is proof required? Entreat the Spanish Minister of State for a moment to overcome the feelings which details like these must excite; and to reflect, if possible, with composure, upon the facts stated in the following extracts from the documents enclosed:

Letter from sailingmaster Jairus Loomis to Commodore Daniel T. Patterson, 13th August, 1816, reporting the destruction of the negro fort. (No. 23.)

"On examining the prisoners, they stated that Edward Daniels, ordinary seaman, who was made prisoner in the boat on the 17th July, was tarred and burnt alive."

Letter from Archibald Clarke to Gen. Gaines, 26th February, 1817. (Message from the President of the United States to Congress, 25th March, 1818.)

"On the 24th instant the house of Mr. Garret, residing in the upper part of this county, near the boundary of Wayne county, (Georgia,) was attacked, during his absence, near the middle of the day, by this party, (of Indians,) consisting of about fifteen, who shot Mrs. Garret in two places, and then despatched her by stabbing and scalping. Her two children, one about three years, the other two months, were also murdered, and the eldest scalped; the house was then plundered of every article of value, and set on fire."

Letter from Peter B. Cook (Arbuthnot's clerk) to Eliz. A. Carney, at Nassau, dated Suwanee, 19th January, 1818, giving an account of their operations with the Indians against the Americans, and their massacre of Lieutenant Scott and his party, (No. 61.)

"There was a boat that was taken by the Indians, that had in it thirty men, seven women, and four small children. There were six of the men got clear, and one woman saved, and all the rest of them got killed. The children were taken by the leg, and their brains dashed out against the boat."

If the bare recital of scenes like these cannot be perused without shuddering, what must be the agonized feelings of those whose wives and children are from day to day, and from night to night, exposed to be the victims of the same barbarity? Has mercy a voice to plead for the perpetrators and instigators of deeds like these? Should inquiry hereafter be made why, within three months after this event, the savage Hamathli-Meico, upon being taken by the American troops, was by order of their commander immediately hung, let it be told that that savage was the commander of the party by whom those women were butchered, and those helpless infants were thus dashed against the boat. Contending with such enemies, although humanity revolts at entire retaliation upon them, and spares the lives of their feeble and defenceless women and children, yet mercy herself surrenders to retributive justice the lives of their leading warriors taken in arms, and, still more, the lives of the foreign white incendiaries!

who, disowned by their own Governments, and disowning their own natures, degrade themselves beneath the savage character by voluntarily descending to its level. Is not this the dictate of common sense? Is it not the usage of legitimate warfare? Is it not consonant to the soundest authorities of national law? "When at war, (says Vattel) with a ferocious nation which observes no rules, and grants no quarter, they may be chastised in the persons of those of them who may be taken; they are of the number of the guilty; and by this rigor the attempt may be made of bringing them to a sense of the laws of humanity." And again: "As a General has the right of sacrificing the lives of his enemies to his own safety, or that of his people, if he has to contend with an inhuman enemy, often guilty of such excesses, he may take the lives of some of his prisoners, and treat them as his own people have been treated." The justification of these principles is found in their salutary efficacy for terror and for example.

It is thus only that the barbarities of Indians can be successfully encountered. It is thus only that the worse than Indian barbarities of European impostors, pretending authority from their Governments, but always disavowed, can be punished and arrested. Great Britain yet engages the alliance and co-operation of savages in war; but her Government has invariably disclaimed all countenance or authorization to her subjects to instigate them against us in time of peace. Yet, so it has happened, that, from the period of our established independence to this day, all the Indian wars with which we have been afflicted have been distinctly traceable to the instigation of English traders or agents. Always disavowed, yet always felt; more than once detected, but never before punished; two of them, offenders of the deepest dye, after solemn warning to their Government, and individually to one of them, have fallen, flagrante delicto, into the hands of an American General; and the punishment inflicted upon them has fixed them on high, as an example awful in its exhibition, but, we trust, auspicious in its results, of that which awaits unauthorized pretenders of European agency to stimulate and interpose in wars between the United States and the Indians within their control.

This exposition of the origin, the causes, and the character of the war with the Seminole Indians and part of the Creeks, combined with McGregor's mock patriots and Nicholls's negroes, which necessarily led our troops into Florida, and gave rise to all those incidents of which Mr. Pizarro so vehemently complains, will, it is hoped, enable you to present other and sounder views of the subject to his Catholic Majesty's Government.

It will enable you to show that the occupation of Pensacola and St. Marks was occasioned neither by a spirit of hostility to Spain, nor with a view to extort prematurely the province from her possession; that it was rendered necessary by the neglect of Spain to perform her engagements of restraining the Indians from hostilities against the United States, and by the culpable countenance, encouragement, and assistance given to those Indians, in their hostilities, by the Spanish governor and commandant at those places; that the United States have a right to demand, as the President does demand, of Spain the punishment of those officers for this misconduct; and he further demands of Spain a just and reasonable indemnity to the United States for the heavy and necessary expenses which they have been compelled to incur by the failure of Spain to perform her engagements to restrain the Indians, aggravated by this demonstrated complicity of her commanding officers with them in their hostilities against the United States; that the two Englishmen executed by order of General Jackson were not only identified with the savages, with whom they were carrying on the war against the United States, but that one of them was the mover and fomentor of the war, which, without his interference, and false promises to the Indians of support from the British Government, never would have happened; that the other was the instrument of war against Spain as well as the United States, commissioned by McGregor, and expedited by Woodbine, upon their project of conquering Florida with these Indians and negroes; that, as accomplices of the savages, and sinning against their better knowledge, worse than savages, General Jackson, possessed of their persons and of the proofs of their guilt, might, by the lawful and ordinary usages of war, have hung them both without the formality of a trial; that, to allow them every possible opportunity of refuting the proofs, or of showing any circumstance in extenuation of their crimes, he gave them the benefit of trial by a court martial of highly respectable officers; that the defence of one consisted solely and exclusively of technical cavils at the nature of part of the evidence against him, and the other confessed his guilt; finally, that, in restoring Pensacola and St. Marks to Spain, the President gives the most signal proof of his confidence that, hereafter, her engagement to restrain by force the Indians of Florida from all hostilities against the United States will be effectually fulfilled; that there will be no more murders, no more robberies, within our borders, by savages prowling along the Spanish line, and seeking shelter within it, to display in their villages the scalps of our women and children, their victims, and to sell, with shameless effrontery, the plunder from our citizens in Spanish forts and cities; that we shall hear no more apologies from Spanish governors and commandants of their inability to perform the duties of their office and the solemn contracts of their country—no more excuses for compliances to the savage enemies of the United States, from the dread of their attacks upon themselves—no more harboring of foreign impostors upon compulsion; that a strength sufficient will be kept in the province to restrain the Indians by force, and officers empowered and instructed to employ it effectually to maintain the good faith of the nation by the effective fulfilment of the treaty. The duty of this Government to protect the persons and property of our fellow-citizens on the borders of the United States is imperative—it must be discharged. And if, after all the warnings that Spain has had; if, after the prostration of all her territorial rights and neutral obligations by Nicholls and his banditti during war, and of all her treaty stipulations by Arbuthnot and Ambrister, abetted by her own commanding officers, during peace, to the cruel annoyance of the United States; if the necessities of self-defence should again compel the United States to take possession of the Spanish forts and places in Florida, declare, with the frankness and candor that become us, that another unconditional restoration of them must not be expected; that even the President's confidence in the good faith and ultimate justice of the Spanish Government will yield to the painful experience of continual disappointment; and that, after unwearied and almost unnumbered appeals to them for the performance of their stipulated duties in vain, the United States will be reluctantly compelled to rely for the protection of their borders upon themselves alone.

You are authorized to communicate the whole of this letter, and the accompanying documents, to the Spanish Government.

I have the honor, &c.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

G. W. ERVING, Minister to Spain.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis De Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 30, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your letter of the 16th instant, and am directed by the President to inform you that, in making to you the proposal contained in my letter of the 31st of last month, with regard to the western boundary between the United States and the bordering territory of Spain, it was with the view, by the magnitude of the sacrifice which it involved on the part of the United States, to manifest the deep solicitude which he felt in terminating, by a general adjustment of all the differences which have been so long in discussion between the two nations, a state of things so unpropitious to the good understanding between them, and so much to be regretted by both.

As it was believed this article could alone present an ultimate obstacle to the agreement thus earnestly desired, I was directed frankly to present you at once the utmost extent to which the Government of the United States felt itself warranted, consistently with its duties to the rights and interests of the nation, to concede, of those unquestionable rights, to accommodate the wishes and to quiet the pretensions of your Sovereign; but, in yielding thus much, you were explicitly notified that the proposition was final, and that upon your acceptance of it depended the only remaining hope, in the mind of the President, of a termination to this negotiation satisfactory to both parties.

As you have now declared that you are not authorized to agree, either to the course of the Red river (Rio Roxo) for the boundary, or to the forty-first parallel of latitude, from the Snow mountains to the Pacific ocean, the President deems it useless to pursue any further the attempt at an adjustment of this object by the present negotiation. I am therefore directed to state to you that the offer of a line for the western boundary, made to you in my last letter, is no longer obligatory upon this Government.

Reserving, then, all the rights of the United States to the ancient western boundary of the colony of Louisiana by the course of the Rio Bravo del Norte, I am yet authorized to conclude a convention or treaty with you upon the other subjects of existing difference. But it is proper, in the first instance, and in reference to the first of the propositions made by you on the 24th of last month, to correct an erroneous impression which you entertain, and which is certainly not warranted by any communication which you have received from this Government. You have been informed that the contingencies upon which General Jackson adopted those measures, which you represent as hostilities and outrages, not having been anticipated, had been provided for in his instructions; that they were unforeseen emergencies upon which, judging measures of energy necessary he had resorted to them upon his own responsibility, and upon motives which he had himself explained; that these measures were dictated by the hostile spirit, not of the American commander against Spain, but of the Spanish commanders against the United States. I informed you that the President of the United States had directed that the proofs of this hostility to the United States of these Spanish officers, furnished by General Jackson, should be embodied and presented to the Government of His Catholic Majesty, with a demand that the misconduct of those officers should be suitably punished. I have now the honor of stating to you that it has accordingly been done; that the proofs collected by General Jackson, together with other accumulating demonstration of the justice of his charges against Don Jose Mazot, Governor of Pensacola, and Don Francisco C. Luengo, Commandant of St. Mark's, have been forwarded to the Minister of the United States in Spain, with instructions to lay them before your Government, and to call for their just animadversion upon the violation, by those officers, of the solemn engagements of their country to the United States.

After a full and deliberate examination of these proofs, the President deems them irresistibly conclusive that the horrible combination of robbery, murder, and war, with which the frontier of the United States bordering upon Florida has for several years past been visited, is ascribable altogether to the total and lamentable failure of Spain to fulfil the fifth article of the treaty of 1795, by which she stipulated to restrain, by force, her Indians from hostilities against the citizens of the United States. Without adverting to the transactions of the late war between the United States and Great Britain, who can mistake the character of the fact that a fort on Spanish soil was garrisoned by hundreds of negroes and Indians, with an English banner flying upon its wall, for the desolation of the American border; and that, sixteen months after the peace of America and of England, the Governor of Pensacola, called upon by General Jackson to break up this lair of human tigers, pleaded his inability, and want of orders from his Governor General, to comply with the request? Who can mistake the character of the fact, that, six months after the stronghold of these savage banditti had been blown up by a shot from an American gun-vessel, a pretended Indian trader, foreigner both to Florida and to Spain, was permitted to come into a Spanish province, there to bribe the savages by presents, and to stimulate them by the grossest falsehoods and absurdest misrepresentations to war against the Americans? Do the Governors of Florida, the instant they learn the appearance of this intruding incendiary within their jurisdiction, seize and imprison him? Do they even command him to depart from the province? Nay, do they so much as require him to obey the laws and respect the engagements of their nation, and the duties of their stations? Far from it. Alexander Arbuthnot, a British subject from the island of New Providence, lands in the Spanish province of Florida, and there opens a warehouse for traffic with the Indians; by whose license or permission? It has not been the custom of Spain to allow the subjects of foreign Powers to intrude upon her colonial possessions; and more than one American citizen is, at this moment, pining, in the dungeons of Spain for having set his foot upon her soil; by whose permission, then, was Arbuthnot allowed to intermeddle in the province of Florida, even had it been only for the purpose of innocent trade with the Indians? Had he a license, or had, he not? If he had, it is for the governors of Florida to explain by whom and upon what motive it was granted. If he had not, it is for them to show why he was suffered, within their jurisdiction, to trample upon the laws of Spain with impunity. But innocent traffic was not the real purpose of Arbuthnot. He was there to stimulate as well the Indians of Florida as the fugitive outlaws from the Creek nation among them to war against the United States. He was goading them by the absurd pretence that the United States were bound by the Treaty of Ghent to give up to them the lands within the borders of the United States which had been ceded by the Creek nation to the United States six months before the Treaty of Ghent was signed. With the profoundest treachery to those Indians themselves, he was promising them that the British Government would support them in this pretence, and was writing letters to the Governor of New Providence, to the British Minister here, and through Colonel Nicholls, in England, to the British Government, soliciting arms and ammunition for war against the United States. Nor was this all. He obtained from a number of Indian chiefs a power of attorney authorizing him to write letters and deliver talks in their name and behalf; and to the copy of that power, transmitted by him to England to be laid before the British Government, were affixed the signature and approbation of F. C. Luengo, commandant of St. Marks. By virtue of the same power, he wrote, in the name of those Indians, a letter to the Governor General of the Havana, falsely pretending that the Americans were settling upon their lands, within the Spanish territory, and calling upon him for force to drive them out. This letter, too, asserts that its contents were sanctioned by the approbation of the commandant of St. Marks.

Arbuthnot was taken by General Jackson at St. Marks, and was then an inmate of the family of the commandant. Among his papers was found a letter from the commandant, written shortly before, styling him his friend, giving him notice of the approach of the American force, and advising him to come and provide for the safety of his little affairs, and hold consultation with him upon subjects which could not with prudence be committed to writing. What consciousness of participation in the abominable purposes of Arbuthnot is betrayed in those few words! What were those common concerns of an English Indian trader and of the Spanish commandant of a fort, which required so thick a veil of mystery to conceal them from detection that this officer should be afraid to expose them to the possibility of discovery by committing them to paper? They were, that St. Marks was the centre of Arbuthnot's intrigues with the Indians against the United States; that councils of the hostile Indians were held at the commandant's quarters, at which he personally attended; that white men, Spanish subjects, inhabitants of Florida, had been taken prisoners by the Indians, under the influence and by the direction of Arbuthnot; reserved by the Indians for torture; delivered as prisoners to the custody of the commandant of St. Marks; received by him as prisoners, and held as such until delivered by General Jackson's approach to that place. They were, in fine, that St. Marks had, in substance, become an Indian fort under a Spanish standard; and to such an extent did the commandant countenance the savages in their depredations upon the borders of the United States, that he actually contracted with some of them to purchase cattle to be robbed by them from the citizens of Georgia, actually purchased them after they had been robbed, and actually sold them as his private property to the purveying officers of General Jackson's army after he took possession of the fort.

It is to the artifices and instigations of Arbuthnot, thus, to say the least, tolerated by the Governor of Pensacola, and thus aided and abetted by the commandant of St. Marks, that this war with the Seminole Indians has been due. But for them it would undoubtedly never have happened. If no direct proof has appeared that the Governor of Pensacola was implicated in the criminal proceedings of Arbuthnot as the commandant of St. Marks, ample evidence has been produced of his having aided, assisted, and sheltered the Indians; of his having, as long as he dared, furnished them with supplies, including munitions of war. And his hostility to the United States has been sufficiently manifested by his exposing their army to the danger of famine, from the impediments opposed by his orders to the passage up the Escambia river of their supplies. That he harbored one Indian chief hostile to the United States, and not even belonging to Florida, is apparent by the article of capitulation which he obtained in his favor. That he suffered another, George Perryman, to escape from Pensacola upon General Jackson's approach, and go to England, there to renew, if possible, the negotiations of the prophet Francis, is announced as a late article of news in the English journals. That a number of other Indians were enabled, by the assistance of officers under his command, to escape from Pensacola on the very day that it was taken by General Jackson, is proved by the certificates of several witnesses. And, lastly, he did not hesitate to write a letter to that commander, before he took Pensacola, threatening, in the event of his not withdrawing immediately from Florida, to resist what he termed his aggressions by force.

It is therefore to the conduct of her own commanding officers that Spain must impute the necessity under which General Jackson found himself of occupying the places of their command. Had the engagements of Spain been fulfilled, the United States would have had no Seminole war. Far, then, from being under obligation to indemnify the Crown of Spain for any losses which it may have sustained in consequence of this necessity, the United States are entitled to demand, and the Minister of the United States at Madrid has been instructed accordingly, that the Crown of Spain should indemnify them for the extraordinary and indispensable expenses which they have been compelled to incur by the prosecution of this war, which Spain was bound to prevent. The revenue collected in the places occupied is very far from being adequate to that object. As to the losses or injuries to the inhabitants, as private property, both at St. Mark's and Pensacola, has been inviolably respected, no injury can have happened to them for which the United States should be responsible.

With respect to the other articles suggested in your propositions of 24th October, and your observations upon the modifications to them, proposed by me, as well as to other objects of minor concernment, to which your last note alludes, I am not aware of any insuperable obstacle to our coming to an agreement upon them. Should your instructions authorize you to waive the further consideration of the two articles upon which I have now communicated to you the final determination of the President, and to proceed in the discussion of the rest, I shall be happy to confer with you verbally concerning them as soon as may suit your convenience. After the explicit answer given you in my note of the 12th March last to your proposal of referring the differences between our Governments to the mediation of Great Britain, and the reasons there assigned for declining that overture, the offer which you make of referring them to the allied monarchs, whom you state to be now assembled at Aix-la-Chapelle, was not to be expected. As you have, however, thought proper to make it, I refer you to my above-mentioned note for the grounds upon which it is declined. If you do not feel yourself at liberty to proceed in the negotiation on the terms herein proposed, postponing the articles relative to the Western boundary, and the late transactions in Florida, I shall be ready, at your convenience, to exchange with you the ratifications of the convention of 1802.

I embrace with pleasure the occasion of renewing to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to Mr. Erving, dated

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1818.

On the 27th March last, the Spanish Minister here, Mr. Onis, addressed a letter to this Department, for the professed purpose of vindicating the character and conduct of the Spanish commanding officers in Florida, and of proving that they had invariably discharged their duties of friendly proceeding towards the United States, and the obligations of the treaty of 1795, by which Spain was bound to restrain, by force, the hostilities of her Indians in Florida against the United States. To this letter are annexed fourteen documents, the greater part of which consist of remonstrances, addressed during the late war between the United States and Great Britain to British officers, against their continual violations of the neutrality of the Spanish territory. It is not, however, to those documents, but to the two (numbered 13 and 14) as annexed to that letter, (Nos. 66, 67,) that I wish to invite your attention. No. 13 is the translation of a letter purporting to be from Bowlegs, one of the Seminole Indian chiefs, most inveterately hostile to the United States, to Don Jose Coppinger, Governor of St. Augustine. A translation! you will say. Why a translation; and from what language? Neither Governor Coppinger nor Mr. Onis has furnished the means of answering that question. They are furnished, however, by the papers of Arbuthnot, which fell into General Jackson's hands. The language was English, and the original was written by Arbuthnot. The draught was found among his papers, and was produced to the court martial upon his trial, (No. 49—No. 2.) We naturally suppose that Governor Coppinger, upon receiving a letter in English from a Seminole Indian chief, must have been surprised, unless he knew from whom and whence it came. The substance of his answer shows that he did know both whence it came and the character of him by whom it was written. By the copies of the two letters, which are enclosed, you will see in that of Bowlegs a part of the systematic intrigues of Arbuthnot to instigate as well the Spanish commanders in Florida as the savages against the United States; and, in that of Governor Coppinger, a direct declaration to the Indians that all his supposed cause of alarm and complaint proceed "from the information of persons in whom he ought not to place the smallest confidence, it being their principle to employ such opportunities for the purpose of seducing him and his people from their daily labor." After offering his own friendly advice, the Governor adds: "I am fearful, however, that the sentiments of those who come into the territory under the appearance of friendship, but with bad intentions, may influence your minds and obtain your confidence by their flattering representations." And, finally, he complains that two persons had lately presented themselves as commissioners of the English nation, and carried off several runaway negroes belonging to inhabitants of the province. It is apparent, from this letter, that Governor Coppinger was well informed of the operations of Arbuthnot and Woodbine, and that he saw them in their true colors. How, then, does it happen that, a year afterwards, the Spanish commandant at St. Mark's is found so entirely leagued with Arbuthnot as to sign his name to the approbation of a power of attorney, given to him by the hostile chiefs, to write letters and deliver talks in their names; to hold councils of war with them at his quarters; to hold as prisoners white persons, inhabitants of the province, taken by them; and to write a letter to Arbuthnot, asking him to come and confer with him upon subjects which could not be committed to paper? The original of that letter, which is in bad French, and in the handwriting of the commandant of St. Mark's, signed by him, is in our possession, (No. 48.) A copy of it is among the papers enclosed. We cannot doubt that the Spanish Government will consider it as a proof of the conspiracy of the commandant of St. Mark's, with Arbuthnot and the Indians, against the United States. Should he be put upon his trial, as you are instructed to demand, the original letter itself will be transmitted to be exhibited to the court.

It is to be observed that the original draught in Arbuthnot's handwriting of the letter from Bowlegs to Governor Coppinger differs in several paragraphs from the translation communicated by Mr. Onis as received by him from Governor Coppinger. The following passage particularly, which appears in the draught produced before the court-martial, is not in the translation furnished by Governor Coppinger: "The Spanish subjects in the Floridas are too much in the interests of the Americans to be our friends. For the governors I shall always entertain the greatest regard; but for the people, they do not act so as to merit my esteem and protection." The remainder of the letter is nearly the same. We do not suppose that the omission was made by the Governor; but rather that Arbuthnot, yet uncertain how such a reflection would be received, omitted it from the letter itself which was transmitted to the Governor.

The papers marked Nos. 62, 63, 64, and 68, are copies of originals, in the handwriting of Arbuthnot, taken with the rest of his papers, but not exhibited before the court-martial. The sheet of his journal is of some importance, as establishing his connexion and dissatisfaction with Woodbine. No. 65 is a letter from him, said to be to an officer of rank in England, (no doubt Nicholls,) dated January 30, 1818, only three months before he was taken.

The sheet of the journal shows that Arbuthnot arrived with Woodbine from New Providence at Suwanee about the last of October, 1816, and that they immediately commenced their operations with the Indians against the United States. Bowlegs's letter to Governor Coppinger is dated November 18 of that year, and apologizes for his not having sooner answered a letter of September, from the Governor, by the impossibility he had been under of finding a person to write the answer for him. Among other complaints against Woodbine in this journal, there is one, distinctly, that he had promised the savages assistance from the British Government, without authority, and by direct falsehood; and he expresses an apprehension that when the Indians find out that none of those promises are realized, their fury will fall upon himself.

Nicholls's Letter and Proclamation.

HEADQUARTERS, PENSACOLA,
August 31, 1814.

SIR: I have arrived in the Floridas for the purpose of annoying the only enemy Great Britain has in the world. As France and England are now friends, I call on you, with your brave followers, to enter into the service of Great Britain, in which you shall have the rank of captain. Lands will be given to you all, in proportion to your respective ranks, on a peace taking place; and I invite you out on the following terms: your property shall be guaranteed to you, and your persons protected. In return for which, I ask you to cease all hostilities against Spain or the allies of Great Britain. Your ships and vessels to be placed under the orders of the commanding officer on the station until the commander-in-chief's pleasure is known; but I guaranty their fair value at all events.

I herewith enclose you a copy of my proclamation to the inhabitants of Louisiana, which will, I trust, point out to you the honorable intentions of my Government. You may be a useful assistant to me in forwarding them; therefore, if you determine, lose no time. The bearer of this, Captain McWilliams, will satisfy you on any other points you may be anxious to learn, as will Captain Lockyer, of the Sophia, who carries him to you. We have a powerful reinforcement on the way here, and I hope to cut out some other work for the Americans than oppressing the inhabitants of Louisiana. Be expeditious on your resolves, and rely upon the veracity of your humble servant,

EDWARD NICHOLLS,
Lieut. Col. Com'g H. B. M.'s forces.

To Monsieur LAFFITE, or the Commandant at Barrataria.

By Lieutenant Colonel Edward Nicholls, commanding
His Britannic Majesty's forces in the Floridas.

Natives of Louisiana, on you the first call is made to assist in liberating from a faithless and imbecile Government your paternal soil. Spaniards, Frenchmen, Italians, and British, whether settled or residing for a time in Louisiana, on you I also call to aid me in the just cause. The American usurpation in this country must be abolished, and the lawful owners of the soil put in possession. I am at the head of a large body of Indians, well armed, disciplined, and commanded by British officers; a good train of artillery, with every requisite, seconded by the powerful aid of a numerous British and Spanish squadron of ships and vessels of war. Be not alarmed, inhabitants of the country, at our approach; the same good faith and disinterestedness which have distinguished the conduct of Britons in Europe accompany them here. You will have no fear of litigious taxes imposed on you for the purpose of carrying on an unnatural and unjust war; your property, your laws, the peace and tranquility of your country, will be guaranteed to you by men who will suffer no infringement of theirs; rest assured that these brave men only burn with an ardent desire of satisfaction for the wrongs they have suffered from the Americans to join you in liberating these Southern frontiers from their yoke, and drive them into the limits formerly prescribed by my Sovereign. The Indians have pledged themselves in the most solemn manner not to injure in the slightest degree the persons or properties of any but enemies to their Spanish or English fathers. A flag over every door, whether Spanish, French, or British, will be a sure protection. Nor dare any Indian put his foot on the threshold thereof, under penalty of death from his own countrymen. Not even an enemy will an Indian put to death, except resisting in arms; and as for injuring helpless women and children, the red men, by their good conduct and treatment to them, will, if it be possible, make the Americans blush for their more than inhuman conduct lately on the Escambia, and within a neutral territory.

Inhabitants of Kentucky, you have too long borne with grievous impositions. The whole brunt of the war has fallen on your brave sons; be imposed on no more; but either range yourselves under the standard of your forefathers, or observe a strict neutrality. If you comply with either of these offers, whatever provisions you send down will be paid for in dollars, and the safety of the persons bringing it, as well as the free navigation of the Mississippi, guaranteed to you. Men of Kentucky, let me call to your view, and, I trust, to your abhorrence, the conduct of those factions which hurried you into this cruel, unjust, and unnatural war. At a time when Great Britain was straining every nerve in the defence of her own, and the liberties of the world; when the bravest of her sons were fighting and bleeding in so sacred a cause; when she was spending millions of her treasure in endeavoring to pull down one of the most formidable and dangerous tyrants that ever disgraced the form of man; when groaning Europe was almost in her last gasp; when Britain alone showed an undaunted front, basely did these assassins endeavor to stab her from the rear. She has turned on them, renovated from the bloody but successful struggle. Europe is happy and free, and she now hastens justly to avenge unprovoked insults. Show them that you are not collectively unjust; leave that contemptible few to shift for themselves; let those slaves of the tyrant send an embassy to Elba, and implore his aid; but let every honest, upright American spurn them with merited contempt. After the experience of twenty-one years, can you any longer support those brawlers for liberty, who call it freedom, and know not when themselves are free? Be no longer their dupes; accept of my offer; everything I have promised in this paper I guaranty to you on the sacred honor of a British officer.

Given under my hand, at my headquarters,
Pensacola, the 29th of August, 1814.

EDWARD NICHOLLS.

APPALACHICOLA, April 28, 1815.

Being absent from this post when your letter of the 19th ultimo arrived, I take this opportunity to answer it. On the subject of the negroes lately owned by the citizens of the United States, or Indians in hostility to the British forces, I have to acquaint you that, according to orders, I have sent them to the British colonies, where they are received as free settlers, and lands given to them. The newspaper you sent me is, I rather think, incorrect; at all events, an American newspaper cannot be authority for a British officer. I herewith enclose you a copy of a part of the ninth article of the treaty of peace relative to the Indians in alliance with us; they have signed and accepted it as an independent people, solemnly protesting to suspend all hostilities against the people of the United States. Within these few days I have had a complaint from the Seminoles' chief, Bowlegs. He states that a party of American horse have made an incursion into the town, killed one man, wounded another, and stolen some of his cattle; also, that they have plundered some of his people on their peaceable way from St. Augustine. May I request of you to inquire into this affair, and cause justice to be done to the murderer, and have the cattle restored? I strictly promise you that, for any mischief done by the Creeks under me, I shall do all in my power to punish the delinquents, and have the property restored.

Relations with Spain.

The chiefs here have requested me further to declare to you that, in order to prevent any disagreeable circumstances from happening in future, they have come to a determination not to permit the least intercourse between their people and those of the United States. They have, in consequence, ordered them to cease all communication, directly or indirectly, with the territory or citizens of the United States; and they do take this public mode of warning the citizens of the United States from entering their territory, or communicating directly or indirectly with the Creek people. They also request that you will understand their territories to be as they stood in the year 1811. In my absence, I have directed First Lieutenant William Hambly, the head interpreter, to communicate with you on any point relative to the Creeks; and I have given him my most positive orders that he shall at all times do his best to keep peace and good neighborhood between the Creeks and your citizens.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,
EDWARD NICHOLLS,
Com'g British forces in Florida.

[Paper enclosed in the above letter.]

Part of the ninth article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States, relative to the Indians who have been in alliance with Great Britain, and in hostility with the U. States.

The United States of America engage to put an end, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians with whom they may be at war at the time of such ratification, and forthwith to restore such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights, and privileges which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to in 1811, previous to such hostilities: Provided always, That such tribes or nations shall agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States of America, their citizens and subjects, upon the ratification of the present treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and shall so desist accordingly.

We, the undersigned, chiefs of the Muscogee nation, declared by His Britannic Majesty to be a free and independent people, do, in the name of the said nation, agree to the ninth article of the treaty of peace between His Britannic Majesty and the United States; and we do further declare that we have given most strict and positive orders to all our people that they desist from hostilities of every kind against the citizens or subjects of the United States.

No. 3.

Colonel Nicholls to Colonel Hawkins.
BRITISH POST, APPALACHICOLA RIVER.
May 12, 1815.

In my letter to you of the 28th ultimo, I requested you would be so good as to make inquiry into the murder and robberies committed on the Seminoles belonging to the chief called Bowlegs; at the same time declaring my determination of punishing, with the utmost rigor of the law, any one of our side who broke it. Of this a melancholy proof has been given, in the execution of an Indian of the Ataphalga town, by Hothly Poya Tustunnuggee, chief of Ockmulgees, who found him driving off a gang of cattle belonging to your citizens; and for which act of justice I have given him double presents, and a chief's gun, in the open square before the whole of the chiefs, and highly extolled him. These, sir, are the steps I am daily taking to keep the peace with sincerity; but I am sorry to say the same line is not taken on your side, nor have you written to say what steps you are taking, or intend to take, to secure this mutual good. Since the last complaint from Bowlegs, I have had another from him, to say your citizens have again attacked and murdered two of his people; that they had stolen a gang of his cattle, but that he had succeeded in regaining them.

I asked him what proof they had of their being killed. They said they had found their bloody clothes in the American camp, which was hastily evacuated on their approach. Now, sir, if these enormities are suffered to be carried on in a Christian country, what are you to expect by showing such an example to the uncultivated native of the woods? (for savage I will not call them—their conduct entitles them to a better epithet.) I have, however, ordered them to stand on the defensive, and have sent them a large supply of arms and ammunition, and told them to put to death without mercy, any one molesting them; but at all times to be careful and not put a foot over the American line; in the mean time, that I should complain to you, that I was convinced you would do your best to curb such infamous conduct; also, that those people who did such deeds would, I was convinced, be disowned by the Government of the United States, and severely punished. They have given their consent to await your answer before they take revenge; but, sir, they are impatient for it, and, well armed as the whole nation now is, and stored with ammunition and provisions, having a stronghold to retire upon in case of a superior force appearing, picture to yourself, sir, the miseries that may be suffered by good and innocent citizens on your frontiers, and I am sure you will lend me your best aid in keeping the bad spirits in subjection. bly of the chiefs, I got them to pass a law for four resolute chiefs to be appointed in different parts of the nation, something in the character of our sheriffs, for the purpose of inflicting condign punishment on such people as broke the law; and I will say this much for them, that I never saw men execute laws better than they do. I am also desired to say to you, by the chiefs, that they do not find that your citizens are evacuating their lands, according to the ninth article of the treaty of peace, but that they were fresh provisioning the forts. This point, sir, I beg of you to look into. They also request me to inform you that they have signed a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain, as well as one of commerce and navigation, which, as soon as it is ratified at home, you shall be made more fully acquainted with.

CREEK AGENCY, May 24, 1815.

On the 18th I had the pleasure to receive your communication of the 28th ultimo. I expected, from the tenor of your orders, which I conveyed to you from Admirals Cochrane and Cockburn, on the 19th of March, that you had left the Floridas ere this with the British troops under your command, and that Spain and the United States would have no more of British interference in the management of their Indian affairs. The newspaper I sent you was one in which the official acts of our Government are published. There could be no motive for falsification; your deeming it incorrect must have proceeded from a knowledge that your conduct, in relation to the negroes, was at variance with it. It would have been acceptable in the communication relative to the disposition of "the negroes taken from the citizens of the United States, or Indians in hostility to the British," to have received the number, particularly belonging to the latter. As peace is restored between Great Britain and the United States, I feel a reluctance to put on paper anything that may have the tendency to tarnish the British character, or that of any officer of its Government; but I owe it to the occasion to state the declaration of Captain Henry, that "the English are sent out by their great father and King to restore his Indian people to their lands, and we are desired by him not to take away their negroes, unless they freely give them to us, or sell them for money," is violated. It is proper, also, to add, I did not enrol any Indians into the service of the United States until after the negroes of Marshall, Stedham, and Kinnard, three half-breeds, were taken from them, by force or stratagem, by British officers. Your restriction, of the Captain's declaration, to negroes belonging to Indians friendly to Great Britain, if by that is meant Indians hostile to the United States, is an erroneous one, as there is not one Creek who has negroes so situated.

The Creek chiefs (to use a courtly phrase) have just cause, at least, to say this is an "unjustifiable aggression." You having acted by orders, and it being now beyond your control, a remedy must and will be sought for elsewhere.

The documents you enclose, signed by three chiefs, purporting to be the agreement of the Muscogee nation to the ninth article of the treaty of peace, I shall lay before the chiefs of the nation, at a convention soon to be held at Coweta, and send you the result of their deliberations on it. The result of my reflections, with due deference, I give you, as on the envelope it purports to be on his Britannic Majesty's service. It is within my knowledge that one of the chiefs is a Seminole of East Florida, and has never resided in the United States; and that neither of the three has ever attended the national councils of the Creeks, or is in any way a part of their executive government. If the four witnesses had signed it as principals, and the three chiefs as witnesses, it would have been entitled to equal respect from me.* Could you be serious in communicating such a nullity with their mock determination not to permit the least intercourse between their people (meaning the Creek nation) and those of the United States? &c. As to the territory of the Seminoles, it being out of the United States, it is an affair between them and the Government of Spain; and that of the Creeks is as fixed and guaranteed in their treaty stipulations with the States. I do not know that any occurrences can happen which will render it necessary for me to communicate with Lieutenant William Hambly. If by doing so I can render acts of kindness to Indians or others, it would afford me pleasure; but, under present impressions, the fifth article of the treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation between the United States and the King of Spain will govern me in all cases respecting the Indians in the two Floridas.

I am, with due regard, sir, your ob'dt servant,
BENJAMIN HAWKINS.

Colonel Hawkins to Colonel Nicholls.
CREEK AGENCY, May 28, 1815.

On the 24th I wrote to you in reply to yours of the 28th ultimo, and since have had the pleasure to receive yours of the 12th. I had received from Bowlegs, direct, a complaint of an outrage committed "by the people of Georgia, who had gone into East Florida, driven off his cattle, and destroyed his property." I have sent this complaint to the Governor of Georgia, who will readily cooperate with the officers of the General Government to cause justice to be done to the injured, if the complaint is true. The laws of the United States provide completely for the protection of the Indian rights, and those intrusted with their execution have the power of doing it. All that is wanted is a proof against the transgressors.

The witnesses, we believe, were Colonel Nicholls, Captain Woodbine, Lieutenant Hambly, and Captain Henry.

The Indians of Aulotchwau, who, without provocation, murdered and plundered a number of the subjects of Spain on St. John's, have engendered such a deadly feud between the parties that it will be long before the descendants of the injured can forget and forgive. Spain, from her internal commotions, has not found it convenient to settle a peace between them; and these people, it is probable, are taken for Georgians. The Indians of this agency, as well as those in the Floridas, have long known they have to apply through their chiefs to me for a redress of their grievances. The government of the Creeks is not an ephemeral one. Its last modification is of more than ten years standing. It was the work and choice of the nation, and has a check on the conduct of the Seminoles.

In 1799 a gentleman arrived where you are from England, who had been an officer on half pay. He came in the Fox sloop-of-war, furnished by the Admiral on the Jamaica station, by order of the Admiralty, "to facilitate to him a passage to his nation, (the Creeks.)" This gentleman, after attempting in various ways with the Seminoles to usurp the government of the Creeks without success, created himself director general of Muscogee, declared war against Spain, murdered some of his subjects, and took St. Mark's. He ordered me, with my assistants in the plan of civilization, out of the Creek nation.

I communicated his proceedings to the national councils, who had been previously acquainted with him, and who replied to him that he "had a title among them, which he well merited, Capetum-nee-lox-au, (the Prince of Liars,) and no other." This director general of Muscogee, after playing a farce for two years, experienced a tragic scene, which deprived him of his liberty. He was put in irons by order of the council whose government he attempted to usurp, and sent to the Governor General of Louisiana, to answer for crimes. His Seminole chiefs were glad to retire with impunity. After this, it was unanimously determined, in a national council of distinguished chiefs from every town and a deputation of Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees, that the warriors should be classed, and held in readiness to execute the orders of the executive council, and that the agent for Indian affairs should have the power of executing the treaty stipulations of the Creeks with their white neighbors. Tookaubatche and Coweta, alternately, as the occasion required, were appointed the permanent seat of the national councils, where national affairs alone could be transacted. They have now two speakers. When the council meets at Coweta, Tustunnuggee Hopole, as speaker for the Lower Creeks, is speaker for the nation; and when they meet at Tookaubatche, Tustunnuggee Thlucco, of the Upper Creeks, is speaker for the nation. Coweta is headquarters for the present. The agent for Indian affairs can convene the council.

To this council I communicated, in your own words, the pretensions of your three chiefs. They answer, "We have had Colonel Nicholls's communication before us, that Hapoith Micco, and Caupachau Micco, and Hopoie Micco are the sovereigns of this nation. We know nothing about them as such. We have often invited them to attend our talks. They never would come forward, and Hapoith Micco is a hostile Indian. They have nothing to do with our affairs. They reside in the Spanish territory."

After mentioning a solitary effort of yours "to keep the peace," you say "I am very sorry to say the same line is not taken on your side, nor have you written to me to say what steps you are taking, or intend to take, to secure this mutual good." You could not have expected I should communicate with you, when, from your orders, you were so soon to leave the country. I have communicated to the national council several outrages committed by banditti from the Seminoles and other parts, upon the post road and frontiers, of Georgia, repeatedly. They have in two instances had the guilty shot, and sent armed parties after others. As late as the 17th of April one man was killed and four wounded on the post road; our wagons twice attacked, and one wagoner killed, several horses taken and carried, as reported, to your depot, at the very time the wagons were carrying seed corn for the Indians, and flour for the support of nearly five thousand totally destitute of food.

The measure in operation here to preserve peace is with an efficient force, red and white troops, to pursue, apprehend, and punish all violators of the public peace. The executive council of the Creeks are continually at Coweta, with an assistant agent to take orders with the warriors when the necessity is apparent, and to call on me when the aid of regular troops is necessary. We do not rely on the exertions of any one but ourselves to preserve peace among the Creeks, and between them and their neighbors of the United States and the Floridas. We examine fairly, spare the innocent, and punish the guilty, and in no case suffer revenge to carve for itself.

On an ex parte hearing, you have "armed the Seminoles, and given orders to put to death, without mercy, any one molesting them." This is cruelty without example—scalping men, women, and children, for troubling or vexing only, and the executioners the judges! To gratify their revenge, the good and innocent citizens on the frontiers are to be the victims of such barbarity. Suppose a banditti were to commit a violent outrage, such as that of the 17th April; are we to charge it on the unoffending people of the frontiers, and kill them without mercy, if we could not find out the guilty? You have issued the order, provided and issued munitions of war for its execution, prepared and provisioned a stronghold to retire upon, in case of superior force appearing, to protect them in this mode of gratifying their revenge. You will be held responsible, and your strongholds will certainly not avail. If you are really on the service of His

Relations with Spain.

Britannic Majesty, it is an act of hostility which will require to be speedily met, and speedily crushed. But, sir, I am satisfied you are acting for yourself, on some speculative project of your own. The Sovereign of Great Britain could not, from his love of justice in time of peace, his systematic perseverance in support of legitimate Sovereigns, almost to the impoverishing of his own nation, suffer any of his officers to go into a neutral country to disturb its peace.

If the Seminole Indians have complaints to make, if they will do it through the chiefs of the Creek nations, or direct to me, or through an officer of His Catholic Majesty, as heretofore, I will cause justice to be done. In cases of murder, the guilty, if practicable, shall be punished; in case of theft, restitution shall be made.

The treaties you have made for the Creek nation, with the authority created by yourself for the purpose, must be a novelty. It would surprise me much to see your Sovereign ratify such as you have described them to be, with a people such as I know them to be, in the territories of His Catholic Majesty. I shall communicate what has passed on the subject between us to the officers of Spain in my neighborhood, that they may be apprized of what you are doing.

As you may not have recent news from Europe, I send you some newspapers detailing important events there on the 4th of April.

General Gaines to the Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT STODDERT,
Mississippi Territory, May 14, 1815.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith the deposition of Samuel Jervais, which, taken in connexion with other accounts recently received from Appalachicola, and a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Saffold, of the Territorial militia, a copy of which is also enclosed, leave little doubt that these deluded savages meditate a renewal of the war upon our frontier inhabitants.

I shall visit Forts Montgomery and Claiborne, and endeavor to ascertain, without loss of time, the real designs of the Indians; and, should they be for war, shall assemble a force to meet them.

The remains of the second and third regiments of infantry are at the Pass Christian, and may be brought to this frontier in a few days, and, added to the remains of the twenty-fourth and thirtieth, now at Fort Montgomery, will give us a force of near one thousand men. With this force I shall be able to keep the Indians in check; and with another thousand, to consist of Choctaws and volunteers, I should feel sufficiently strong to make a decisive stroke upon the depots at Appalachicola, which I persuade myself the Government may be at liberty to sanction; for, until these depots (if they really exist) are destroyed, our frontier cannot but continue extremely insecure.

I am unable to say how far the statement of Jervais is entitled to credit; but I have examined him attentively, and am under a strong impression that he has stated the truth, and that the supplies mentioned in his deposition are not mistaken for those delivered last Fall, but have really been delivered since the ratification of the treaty had been officially announced to the British troops at Appalachicola. These supplies were, however, brought to Appalachicola previous to the ratification of the treaty.

I have ordered the commanding officers of corps and posts to hold their commands ready for active service, and have taken measures to prepare a small train of light artillery, with a proper supply of fixed ammunition, tools, camp equipage, &c., for an Indian campaign. Whilst Spain permits our enemy to assemble forces, and make military depots for our annoyance within her territory, surely she can make no reasonable objection to our visiting those depots. Besides, Spain is expressly bound by treaty "to restrain by force all hostilities on the part of the Indian nations living within her boundary." If she does not restrain them, we may conclude that she has endeavored to do so, but is unable. Can she blame us, then, for restraining them ourselves?

I have the honor to be, with the greatest respect and esteem, sir, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major General by brevet.

P. S. I have written to Major General Jackson upon the same subject; but as he is probably on his way to Washington, I have thought proper to address you direct. E. P. G.

Deposition of Samuel Jervais, enclosed in the above letter.

Samuel Jervais, being duly sworn, states: That he has been a sergeant of marines in the British service for thirteen years past; that about a month ago he left Appalachicola, where he had been stationed for several months; that the English colonel (Nicholls) had promised the hostile Indians at that place a supply of arms and ammunition, a large quantity of which had been delivered to them a few days before his departure, and after the news of a peace between England and the United States being confirmed had reached Appalachicola; that, among the articles delivered, were, of cannon, four twelve-pounders, one howitzer, and two cohorts; about three thousand stands of small arms, and near three thousand barrels of powder and ball; that the British left with the Indians between three and four hundred negroes, taken from the United States, principally from Louisiana; that the arms and ammunition were for the use of the Indians and negroes, for the purposes, as it was understood, of war with the United States; that the Indians were assured by the British commander that, according to the Treaty of Ghent, all the lands ceded by the Creeks, in treaty with General Jackson, were to be restored; otherwise, the Indians must fight for those lands, and that the British would in a short time assist them.

General Gaines to A. J. Dallas, Acting Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT STODDERT, M. T.,
May 22, 1815.

SIR: I returned last night from Fort Montgomery, where, though unable to obtain satisfactory information as to the hostile intentions of the Creek Indians, I learned that two of the party mentioned in my last had been killed, and some others wounded; and that the Indians had afterwards killed two of our citizens, a Mr. West, and another whose name my informant (Colonel Files, from the settlement of Alabama, near where the act was perpetrated) had forgotten.

Some negro men belonging to Don McGill, of Mobile, taken some months ago to Appalachicola by the British, voluntarily returned a few days past. Their statement of the supplies and negroes left by the British corresponds with that contained in the deposition of Jervais, enclosed in the letter which I had the honor to address to you on the 14th instant. The negroes add that there are at Appalachicola nearly eight hundred Indian warriors, and that the negroes were permitted to remain with the Indians as freemen, or to return to their masters, as they should elect, and that but few had agreed to return.

I feel convinced that the Indians are generally under the impression that the lands ceded to the United States by the treaty with General Jackson must be restored, or that a war must ensue; and that their friends, the British, will re-establish them in the possession of these lands.

So industriously have these impressions been circulated by the British and Spanish agents among the Indians, that, so far as I can learn, not only the chiefs, but the common warriors, are in the habit of saying that the British treaty with the Americans gives the Indians their lands taken by the treaty with General Jackson.

Since writing the above, I have been furnished with the enclosed deposition of S. Dale, who is a major of militia.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major General by brevet.

P. S.—Since closing my letter, I learn that Nicholls, said to be a colonel in the British service, is still at Appalachicola, and that he has nine hundred Indians and four hundred and fifty negroes under arms. This account is brought by a very intelligent negro man belonging to D. Kennedy, at Mobile. I think it goes to strengthen the accounts heretofore given in my letter of the 14th instant.

Memorandum of a gentleman of respectability at Bermuda.

ST. GEORGE, BERMUDA, May 21, 1815.

Captain Rawlins, of His Majesty's ship Borer, has stated to me in the course of various conversations, that, at the time of his departure from Appalachicola, (which appears to have been about the 20th to the 28th April,) the British had collected upwards of three hundred persons at or near Prospect Bluff, partly deserters from the United States, and partly from the Spanish provinces of East and West Florida. These people had been received and protected by Colonel Nicholls, of the royal marines, who was stationed at that place, and who appears to have been under the impression (at least he said so) that the British authorities had no right to the country in that vicinity.

Admiral Cochrane, however, appears to have disapproved of Nicholls's conduct in affording protection to the Spanish slaves, and had sent the Hon. Captain Spencer to Pensacola for the purpose of making arrangements for their restoration; who accordingly proceeded to Appalachicola, with Captain Pentado, named commissioner on the part of the Spaniards.

It does not appear that these gentlemen were successful in their mission, as it was understood that the refugees were not to be coerced, but merely such facilities afforded to those who voluntarily agreed to return, as might be found necessary.

Much altercation has arisen out of this commission, in consequence of many officers having espoused the cause of the slaves; and at one time the life of Captain Spencer had been threatened by the negroes. Captain Rawlins adds that much ammunition, and a good many stands of arms, with some pieces of artillery, had been left with them; and that the fort constructed by Colonel Nicholls "would not be destroyed."

I have since learned that the Carron, which must have sailed from Appalachicola previous to the Borer, is arrived at Nassau, on her way to Bermuda, with one hundred and seventy-six slaves of all ages. As she is daily expected, and as Captain Spencer is now on his way here, it might be as well to wait their arrival before you make any official communication to your Government on the subject. It is however obvious, that were you in possession of the whole facts, no time ought to be lost in recommending the adoption of speedy, energetic measures, for the destruction of a thing held so likely to become dangerous to the State of Georgia. The Spaniards are not in a situation to do it, but I dare say would co-operate. I have learned that the whole of the slaves brought from the United States have been sent to Nova Scotia, with the exception of a few that were lately shipped to the island of Trinidad, in His Majesty's ship the Levant, and such as have enlisted in the colonial marines were in these islands. A few stragglers have contrived to get on shore in the Bermudas, and by the connivance of their colonized friends to remain, very contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, who are in general desirous of getting rid of them.

It has been whispered (I know not with what truth) that the people expected in the Carron, who are from Louisiana and West Florida, are also to be sent to Trinidad.

The Carron is arrived; and this morning I understood from Messrs. James and Michael Carron, the agents of Sir Alexander Cochrane, the Carron was going to some port of the West Indies—unquestionably to Trinidad.

Address to the King of England from the Indians, published in the English newspapers of the 15th of August, 1818.

We, the chiefs of the Muscogee nation, in full council assembled, on behalf of ourselves and our people, do make the following requests of our good father, King George, and declare to him certain resolutions we have come to, with our reasons for so doing.

We conceive it to be indispensably necessary for our good, as well as to make us useful allies of Great Britain, that officers should be constantly kept among us; and we request that our good father will grant us this favor. Since Colonel Brown left us, we have been a prey to civil dissensions, fomented and kept up by our inveterate and never-to-be-satisfied foe, the Americans; by their bad advice has brother been in the act of shedding the blood of brother; and when the land becomes thus desolated, they possess themselves of it, so that we shall soon be driven to the desert sands of the sea from the fertile fields of our forefathers; and we are told that the Spaniards will not let us trade with the British from the mouths of our rivers; we, therefore, further request that our good father will secure for us the mouths of the rivers Appalachicola, Alabama, and St. Mary's; for, if our communication is once more cut off from his children, we shall be totally ruined. We have fought and bled for him against the Americans, by which we have made them our more bitter enemies; and, as he has stood the friend of the oppressed nations beyond the great waters, he will surely not forget the sufferings of his once happy children here. We therefore rely on his future protection and fatherly kindness; we will truly keep the talks which his chief has given us, if he is graciously pleased to continue his protection. Famine is now devouring up ourselves and our children, by reason of our Upper Town brethren being driven down upon us in the time the corn was green; and now their miseries and necessities cause them to root up the seeds of our future crop, so that what we sow in the day we are obliged to watch at night. Were it not for the powder we get from your chief, the whole of the nation would be in dust. The Red Sticks have shot and eaten up almost the whole of our cattle, for they have seen their children digging in the woods for want; and who can blame them, when they are pressed by such cruel necessity? Thus we are situated, and we are only looking to the departure or the stay of your children as the signal of our destruction or prosperity. In former times, after the British left us, to show our love and regard for their nation, we made a grant of our lands to the house of Panton, Leslie, & Co., and latterly to the house of John Forbes & Co., on certain terms—that they were to settle the lands with British men, and keep up a sufficient and good assortment of all sorts of merchandise suitable to our wants; but, instead of their doing this, they have attempted to settle our lands with Americans, and have refused to supply us with powder when we were attacked by our enemies, and have urged us to declare for the Americans against the British, and have offered rewards to us for that purpose; and they have actually written to their agents who reside among us, desiring them to obstruct the British officers all in their power from assisting us, and to represent to them, also, how impossible it would be for them to succeed against the Americans; and we, having intercepted their letters, did deliver them to Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls, who is our witness; and the said letters were delivered by an Indian to John Forbes, at St. Augustine, to be forwarded by him as aforesaid; and, as it does stand thus, on unquestionable proof, that the said house of Forbes & Co. have shamefully broken their contracts with us, we do, in this our full assembly, declare all their property in our nation to be confiscated to the nation; and we further annul and declare void our grant or grants of lands accordingly, warning them, and all belonging to them, never to appear again in the nation. And the United States, or some part thereof, have thought proper to run a line or wagon road through the Indian nation, from Hartford, in Georgia, to Mobile, in West Florida, without our consent, and to our great hurt and annoyance.

We implore our good father that he will cause them to disuse the said road, and to cease all communication between them and us, as we are determined to cease having any communication with them; and we warn all Americans to keep out of this nation. And whereas that a young chief, called McIntosh, was sent with a message of remonstrance against the abovementioned road being run, and of several other encroachments on the Tombigbee, Coosa, and Alabama rivers, instead of his making such remonstrance, he suffered himself to be tricked by our enemy, and unlawfully sold to them large tracts of land on and about the rivers Oconee and Ockmulgee, which tracts of land we implore our good father to use his endeavor in getting restored, and that the Americans may be obliged to withdraw from them. The abovementioned McIntosh holds a commission as Major in the American army, and of the Creek regiment; he has caused much blood to be spilt, for which we denounce him to the whole nation, and will give the usual reward of the brave to any one who may kill him, he having, on a recent occasion, killed and scalped a brother, who was on an errand of peace to our Cherokee brethren, for no other reason alleged against him than his having British arms about him; and in this, we are told, he has been encouraged by Colonel Hawkins, although long after peace was declared, and all hostility ordered to cease. We further request Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls will return our grateful thanks to our good father and his chiefs, by sea and land, for the useful and good presents he has sent to us by them; and also that the Lieutenant Colonel, and the officers with him in this nation, will receive our thanks for their brotherly conduct to us. And whereas our good father having made a peace with the United States of America, and, according to his true talk, he has not forgotten the interests of us his children, but has caused to be respected our lands, and guaranteed the integrity of them to us, we do declare them or him to be traitors to this nation who shall, without his aid and our consent, sell or make over to any foreign Power any part thereof; and we do further declare whosoever shall endeavor, directly or indirectly, to separate us from him or his children, to be the enemy of us and our children, and that we will not trade or barter with any other than the British nation if the above requests be complied with; and we do promise to give grants of land to all such British men as our good father shall give permission to stay amongst us, and that we will do our best to protect and defend them in their laws and property; and we send as our representative our brave brother Hillis Hadjo (Francis) to our father, who is authorized to ratify this treaty.

JULY 10, 1815.

The conduct of Colonel Nicholls, who has taken a position on the Appalachicola, within the Spanish territory, is, on the same principle, entitled to particular attention. I transmit to you a copy of a correspondence between him and Colonel Hawkins, agent of the United States with the Creeks, and also an extract of a letter from Major General Gaines, with the affidavit of Samuel Jervais, which show the nature and effect of his extraordinary and unjustifiable interference with that nation. It appears, by Colonel Nicholls's letter, that he considers our treaty with the Creeks, though made several months before the treaty with Great Britain, as rendered void by the latter, and that he is endeavoring to impress that opinion on them, and to excite them to hostility in support of it; that he has supplied them with arms and munitions of war, and had actually formed a treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, with certain Indians, whom he calls the Creek nation, which he has sent to his Government for ratification; that, in short, he had made Appalachicola a military station, at which he had collected a large body of Indians and fugitive slaves from the United States, evidently for hostile purposes against the United States. The conduct of this officer is of too marked a character to require any comment. His proceedings are utterly and evidently incompatible with the late treaty with Great Britain, and with the amicable relations established by it between our countries.

In calling your attention to these proceedings, it is not my object to dwell on each particular act of which I complain. I shall remark, generally, that, as the treaty with the Creeks was concluded before the treaty of peace with Great Britain, the ninth article of that treaty has no bearing with that nation; and that any interference of Nicholls, or other British agent, with the Creeks, however slight, is improper and unjustifiable.

The President cannot doubt that the conduct of Colonel Nicholls and of the other British agents, as stated in the correspondence which is communicated, is unauthorized by your Government, and that they will be justly censured and punished by it. In the meantime, as you were particularly empowered to act in all circumstances, connected with the execution of the late treaty of peace, I am persuaded that you will readily interpose your authority to put an end to proceedings of a nature so unwarrantable, and which have already produced such injurious effects.

The conduct of Colonel Nicholls to the south is still more extraordinary. Having noticed it in sufficient detail in my letter to Mr. Baker, I refer you to that paper for the necessary information respecting it.

It may be fairly presumed that these acts were not authorized by the British Government; that they are imputable only to Indian agents, and those under whom they act in this country. They nevertheless deserve reprehension, which it is expected that the British Government will not hesitate to inflict.

Extracts of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, stating the substance of a conversation with Earl Bathurst, dated

LONDON, Sept. 19, 1815.

I said that the American Government had been peculiarly concerned at the proceedings of Colonel Nicholls, because they appeared to be marked with unequivocal and extraordinary marks of hostility. "Why," said Lord Bathurst, "to tell you the truth, Colonel Nicholls is, I believe, a man of activity and spirit, but a very wild fellow. He did make and send over to me a treaty, offensive and defensive, with some Indians; and he is now come over here, and has brought over some of those Indians. I sent for answer that he had no authority whatever to make a treaty, offensive and defensive, with Indians, and that this Government would make no such treaty. I have sent him word that I could not see him upon any such project. The Indians are here in distress, indeed; but we shall only furnish them with the means of returning home, and advise them to make their terms with the United States as well as they can." Perceiving that I had particularly noticed his declaration that he had declined seeing Colonel Nicholls, he said that he should perhaps see him upon the general subject of his transactions, but that he declined seeing him in regard to his treaty with the Indians.

In this conversation Lord Bathurst's manner, like that of Lord Liverpool, in the conference which I had about a month before with him, was altogether good humored and conciliatory. The conduct of all the officers and persons complained of was explicitly disavowed; and I understood, at first, the observation of Lord Bathurst, that he had declined seeing Colonel Nicholls, as an intimation that it was intended to exhibit towards that officer unequivocal marks of displeasure. But the subsequent explanation left me to conclude that, although the disapprobation of his proceedings was strongly expressed to me, the utmost extent of it that would be shown to him would be the refusal to ratify his treaty, offensive and defensive, with the Indians.

LONDON, Sept. 25, 1815.

In the conference with your Lordship with which I was honored on the 14th instant, I represented to you, conformably to the instructions which I had received from the Government of the United States, the proceedings of several British officers in America, and upon the American coast, marked with characters incompatible, not only with those amicable relations which it is the earnest desire of the American Government to restore and to cultivate, but even with the condition of peace which had been restored between the two countries by the Treaty of Ghent.

It was with the highest satisfaction that I understood your Lordship, in the name of the British Government to disavow the proceedings of all those officers, of which it had been my duty to complain; and that I received from you the assurance that orders had long since been given for the restoration of the post of Michilimackinac to the United States; that instructions had been given to promote, by all suitable means, the restoration of peace between the Indians and the United States; and, particularly, that Colonel Nicholls, in pretending to conclude a treaty, offensive and defensive, with certain Indians belonging within the jurisdiction of the United States, had not only acted without authority, but incurred the disapprobation of His Majesty's Government.

No. 13 a.

Extract of a letter from Mr. Adams to the Secretary of State, containing the substance of a conversation with Lord Castlereagh, dated LONDON, Feb. 8, 1816.

I next observed that, at the other extremity of the United States, the Indians again appeared in the shape of disturbers of the peace between our countries. I recapitulated your remonstrances to Mr. Baker, and mine, by your order, to Lord Bathurst, against the conduct of Colonel Nicholls; that officer's pretended treaties of alliance, offensive and defensive, and commerce and navigation, with certain runaway Indians, whom he had seen fit to style the Creek nation; and the very exceptionable manner in which he had notified his transactions to the agent of the United States with the Creeks, with an intimation that we were to hear more about the treaties when they should be ratified in England. I mentioned that Lord Bathurst had, in the most candid and explicit manner verbally disavowed to me these proceedings of Colonel Nicholls; had told me that the pretended treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, had been indeed transmitted by the Colonel for ratification; but this Government had refused to ratify it, and informed Colonel Nicholls that they would agree to no such treaty; that the Colonel had even brought over some of his Indians here, who would be sent back, with advice to make their terms with the United States as they could. These verbal assurances I had reported to my Government, and presumed they had been received with much satisfaction. Whether they had been repeated in a more formal manner, and in any written communication, I had not been informed. I had noticed the conduct of Colonel Nicholls in one of my notes to

Relations with Spain.

Lord Bathurst, and to that part of the note had received no answer. As the complaint had also been made through Mr. Baker, a written answer might, perhaps, have been returned through that channel. My motive for referring to the subject now was, that, by the President's Message to Congress at the opening of the session, I perceived that the conduct of the Indians in that part of the United States still threatened hostilities, and because there, as in the more northern parts, the Indians would certainly be disposed to tranquillity and peace with the United States, unless they should have encouragement to rely upon the support of Great Britain. Lord Castlereagh said, with a smile, that he had a good many treaties to lay before Parliament, but none such as those I described were among them.

No. 13 b.

LONDON, March 21, 1816.

It has been more than once a painful part of the duty of the undersigned to represent to His Majesty's Government the unfriendly dispositions manifested by British military officers in America towards the United States since the peace between the two countries; and to point out specific and unequivocal facts, by which those officers, far from exerting themselves to carry into effect the avowed object of their own Government, of securing to the Indians who had followed the British standard during the war the blessings of the pacification, have labored with an activity as restless, and a zeal as ardent, as they could have done in the heat of war, to instigate Indians belonging within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States to continued or renewed hostility against them. When, in the course of last Summer, the undersigned had the honor of exposing to Earl Bathurst the transactions deeply marked with this character of Colonel Nicholls, he was happy to receive from his Lordship, verbally, at once the confirmation of the facts, and the disavowal of the measures. Colonel Nicholls, after the conclusion of the peace between his Sovereign and the United States, not only used every effort in his power to urge to war against the United States tribes of Indians with whom they were then at peace, and who were far remote from any British possession whatever, but actually concluded a pretended treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between some of them and Great Britain against the United States. Of this treaty, Earl Bathurst, in a conference with the undersigned, expressed himself in terms of unqualified disapprobation; adding that it had not been ratified or approved, and that no such treaty would be made or agreed to by Great Britain. In the pursuit of his projects, Colonel Nicholls brought over some of these Indians to England; but as Lord Bathurst, in the most explicit manner, assured the undersigned that no use of them hostile to the United States would be made by Great Britain, the undersigned is persuaded that that determination has not been departed from by His Majesty's Government.

How far the threat of Indian vengeance is becoming to the humanity of British officers, or the dignity of their Government, in a correspondence with the officers of a civilized nation, and in a time of peace, the undersigned leaves to His Majesty's Government to decide. Neither Colonel Nicholls nor Colonel James was ashamed to use it; and it would be treated by the undersigned as it was by the officers of the United States to whom it was addressed, were it not his duty to remark that, in condescending to be the heralds of this menace, those officers sufficiently indicated that they understood its being carried into execution or not depended upon them; that they viewed themselves as the regulators to restrain or to license Indian barbarity at their discretion; that they (British military officers) called upon the civil authority of the United States to satisfy the revenge of Indian savages belonging within the American jurisdiction, for acts committed upon the American territory; threatening, as the alternative, to let loose those savages to wreak their own vengeance, in all its fury, upon American women and children.

Independently of the very serious character of these transactions in themselves, the undersigned entreats the attention of the British Government to the spirit by which they were dictated. This excessive earnestness of British authorities, military and civil, to hold themselves forth as the protectors, through right and through wrong, of Indians not belonging to British territories, however politic it may be deemed to imbricate enmities and to provoke hostilities between the Indians and the Americans, cannot but excite animosities far more formidable between the British and American nations. If persevered in, it must eventually prove most pernicious and fatal to the Indians themselves. The occasion will justify the expression of the hope that orders and instructions will be issued to the local authorities of the British colonies in North America, which will leave no doubt on the minds of those invested with them that the real intention of Great Britain towards the United States is peace.

General Jackson to the Governor of Pensacola.

HEADQ'RS DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Washington, M. T., April 23, 1816.

SIR: I am charged by my Government to make known to you that a negro fort, erected during our late war with Great Britain, at or near the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, has been strengthened since that period, and is now occupied by upwards of two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom have been enticed away from the service of their masters, citizens of the United States; all of whom are well clothed and disciplined. Secret practices to inveigle negroes from the citizens of Georgia, as well as from the Cherokee and Creek nations of Indians, are still continued by this banditti and the hostile Creeks.

Relations with Spain.

This is a state of things which cannot fail to produce much injury to the neighboring settlements, and excite irritations which eventually may endanger the peace of the nation, and interrupt that good understanding which so happily exists between our Governments.

The principles of good faith, which always insure good neighborhood between nations, require the immediate and prompt interference of the Spanish authority to destroy or remove from our frontier this banditti, put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, and return to our citizens and friendly Indians inhabiting our territory those negroes now in said fort, and which have been stolen and enticed from them. I cannot permit myself to indulge a belief that the Governor of Pensacola, or the military commander at that place, will hesitate a moment in giving orders for this banditti to be dispersed, and the property of the citizens of the United States forthwith restored to them and our friendly Indians; particularly when I reflect that the conduct of this banditti is such as will not be tolerated by our Government, and, if not put down by Spanish authority, will compel us, in self-defence, to destroy them. This communication is intrusted to Captain Amelung, of the first regiment of the United States infantry, who is charged to bring back such answer as you may be pleased to make to this letter. In your answer you will be pleased to state whether that fort has been built by the Government of Spain, and whether those negroes who garrison it are considered as the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if not by His Catholic Majesty, by whom, and under whose orders, it has been erected.

PENSACOLA, March 26, 1816.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 24th of the present month, Captain Amelung, of the 1st United States regiment, put into my hands your excellency's letter, dated at Washington, Mississippi Territory, on the 23d of April last, in which, after apprising me that your Government had given it in charge to you to inform me that the fort of the negroes, erected during the late war with Great Britain, near the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, had been reinforced, and was now occupied by more than two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom were seduced from the service of their masters, (who are citizens of the United States,) and that all of them are well armed, provisioned, and disciplined, you make many wise reflections with respect to the serious injuries which may result from tolerating such an establishment, not only to those in the immediate neighborhood of it, by disturbing the peace of the nation, but likewise to the good understanding which happily exists between our respective Governments; you enter into an investigation to show what the Spanish authorities ought to do to put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, in the mode prescribed by those principles of good faith which are the foundation of friendly neighborhood among nations; you distinctly state what this Government ought immediately to do, in failure of which your Government will be obliged to do it, to insure the safety of the inhabitants of the United States; and you conclude by requesting me to state, in my answer to your letter, whether the said fort has been constructed by the Spanish Government, and whether the negroes who compose its garrison are deemed subjects of His Catholic Majesty, and, if the fort was not built by Spanish authority, to state by what authority, and by whose order, it was built.

In answer to your excellency, I will state, with the veracity which comports with the character of an honorable officer, in which class I rank myself that, having arrived at this place nearly at the close of the month of March preceding, and being informed of what your excellency has communicated to me, (with this difference, that the fort, instead of being where you place it, is to be found on the eastern bank of the Appalachicola, at about fifteen miles from its mouth or entrance into the sea,) I lost no time in proposing to my Captain General the measures which appeared to me proper, as well for securing the inhabitants of the country under my command from the damages, losses, and injuries which they have suffered, and still suffer, from this establishment, as to prevent the American citizens and the friendly Indians of the neighborhood from continuing to experience them. I have hitherto received no answer, and consequently your excellency (who knows how limited are the powers of a subordinate officer) cannot be surprised that I should make known to you that, although my mode of thinking exactly corresponds with yours as to dislodging the negroes from the fort, the occupying it with Spanish troops, or destroying it, and delivering the negroes who may be collected to their lawful owners, I shall not be able to act until I receive the orders of my Captain General, and the assistance necessary to enable me to undertake the enterprise with a moral certainty of accomplishing the end. I am persuaded that the determination of the said chief cannot be long delayed; and, should it authorize me to act, your excellency may rest assured and persuaded that I will not lose an instant in adopting, on my part, the most efficacious measures for cutting up by the root an evil which is felt to the full extent stated in your letter by the inhabitants of this province, who are the subjects of my Sovereign, and whose prosperity and tranquillity it is my duty to preserve and protect.

With this explanation, your before-named letter may be considered as fully answered, as it gives me pleasure to understand that, thinking as your excellency thinks with respect to the necessity of destroying the negroes, the fort at Appalachicola occupied by them was not constructed by orders of the Spanish Government; and that the negroes, although in part belonging to inhabitants of this province, and as rational beings, may be the subjects of the King, my master, are deemed by me insurgents or rebels against the authority, not only of His Catholic Majesty, but also of the proprietors from whose service they have withdrawn themselves; some seduced by the English Colonel Nicholls, Major Woodbine, and their agents, and others from their inclination to run off. But as your excellency manifests a particular desire that, in case the fort was not erected by Spanish authority, I should state by what authority and by whose orders it was erected, I have no difficulty in satisfying your curiosity, by informing you that I have understood, ever since my arrival at this place, that the said fort, and another near the confluence of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers (which it appears no longer exists,) were built by the order of the before-named Colonel Nicholls. I will not assure you that he did it under authority from his Government; but I can say that he proceeded to place artillery, munitions, and provisions in it, by the arrangement of Vice Admiral Malcolm; and that when Colonel Nicholls and the troops of his detachment, after the conclusion of the expedition against Louisiana, withdrew from that point, he left orders with the negroes, totally contrary to the incontestable right of sovereignty which the King, my master, exercises from the line of the thirty-first degree of north latitude to the South. My predecessors in this Government have given an account of all these actions to the authorities on whom they depended, that the satisfaction which the violation required might be demanded by those on whom this duty devolves. I think I have answered your excellency's letter satisfactorily, and in terms which cannot leave a doubt of the sincerity of my intentions in favor of the common cause of the American and Spanish inhabitants; and that my present inaction does not proceed from a want of inclination. I likewise flatter myself that, until my Captain General decides, no steps will be taken by the Government of the United States, or by your excellency, which may be prejudicial to the sovereignty of the King, my master, or the district of Appalachicola, which is a dependency of this Government. And, finally, I conclude by assuring your excellency that it will afford me particular satisfaction to have opportunities of evincing my desire, not only to contribute, so far as depends on me, to the cementing of the good understanding which subsists between our respective Governments, but also to prove to your excellency the high opinion I entertain of your virtues and military talents. God preserve your excellency many years.

NEW ORLEANS, June 4, 1816.

SIR: In obedience to your order, received on the 6th of May last, I proceeded the next day for Pensacola; but owing to adverse winds, (having to wait twelve days at the bay of St. Louis,) I only arrived at that place on the 24th May. I was received and treated with great attention by the Governor and his officers, and, after receiving his answer to your letter, I left there on the 27th, and arrived here on the 2d instant.

I have the honor to transmit herewith the answer of the Governor, which, I think, embraces all the points touched upon in your letter; and also take the liberty to subjoin a translation thereof, as it might happen that no person is near you understanding the Spanish language. I am firmly of opinion that the Governor asserts the truth in his communication; and am convinced that the inhabitants of Pensacola have suffered, and do now suffer, more than our citizens, from the existence of the fort and its garrison.

I also take the liberty of communicating such intelligence as I have been able to collect from good authority, and which might perhaps be of some use.

The fort in question is situated at Bonavista, on the eastern branch of the Appalachicola river, 15 miles above its mouth, and 120 miles east of Pensacola. The river discharges itself into St. George's Sound, and vessels drawing not more than ten feet water may come in between St. George's and St. Vincent's islands; the bar, however, is dangerous, and requires skilful pilots.

The fort was constructed by Nicholls and Woodbine, and the British occasionally resorted thither; but, on their final evacuation of this country, left it in the possession of a garrison composed of negroes and Indians, with four pieces of heavy ordnance, and 10,000 pounds of powder, &c. About twenty Choctaws, a number of Seminoles, and a great number of runaway negroes are supposed to have been there some time ago, but a great part of these brigands have abandoned the fort on account of scarcity of provisions, and have gone to Savannah (alias St. Joseph's) river, in East Florida, whither they will, no doubt, all retire, in case of an attack by land, as they have a schooner and several large boats to make good their retreat by sea, if not interrupted.

From this spot they can easily annoy our settlements on Flint river, and the whole Georgia frontier, and are in a country where they can procure subsistence with facility.

Pensacola itself is, I can assure you, entirely defenceless. The garrison consists of from 80 to 100 effective men, exclusive of a battalion of colored troops, say about 150 men, of whom the inhabitants themselves stand in constant dread. They have about 150 serviceable muskets, about 500 musket cartridges, and not enough gunpowder to fire a salute; one gun was mounting at Barancas on the day I left there. To this is to be added the dissatisfaction of the inhabitants, and even of a number of the officers of Government, and the desire of a majority to see a change effected. I must not forget to present to you, on the part of the Governor, the thanks of the inhabitants of Pensacola for the exemplary and humane conduct of the army under your command at Pensacola, and I verily believe their professions to be sincere.

The Governor also, on my mentioning in conversation that I was persuaded you would willingly assist in destroying the fort, said, if the object was of sufficient importance to require the presence of General Jackson, he would be proud to be commanded by you; and that, if the Captain General of Cuba could not furnish him with the necessary means, he might perhaps apply to you for assistance.

Having nothing further to add, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, June 15, 1816.

SIR: I have this moment received the answer of the commanding officer and Governor of Pensacola to mine of the 23d of April, which I hasten to forward for your information, as well as the copy of the report of Captain Amelung, of the 1st infantry, who was the bearer of my letter. I send you the original, retaining a copy in English forwarded to me by Captain Amelung.

The answer bears the marks of candor and breathes the spirit of friendship; and as those marauders on our frontier are acknowledged officially as rebels against the Government of Spain, there can be no fear of disturbing the good understanding that exists between us and Spain, by destroying the negro fort, and restoring to the owners the negroes that may be captured.

The 4th and 7th infantry will be sufficient to destroy it. A few troops from the 1st infantry, with a small naval force, will prevent their escape, and capture those vessels named by Captain Amelung in his report. I shall await your order on this subject, which shall be promptly obeyed and executed.

I am, respectfully, &c.

CAMP NEAR FORT JACKSON,
April 30, 1816.

SIR: I have just now received a letter from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, dated near the mouth of Summochichoba, the 26th instant, enclosing a communication from the Little Prince, a copy of which I enclose herewith.

This chief is on a tour down the river to visit the Seminole chiefs near the Appalachicola.

The ostensible object of the visit was to adopt measures to take the negro fort; and as Colonel Hawkins had confidence in the promises of the Indians to effect this object, I sanctioned a requisition for supplying them with three hundred bushels of corn, to serve as rations. That I have little faith in their promises, I will not deny; but it seemed to me proper to encourage them in the prosecution of a measure which I felt persuaded would, if successful, be attended with great benefit to our southern frontier inhabitants, as well as the Indians themselves.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Talk from the Little Prince, Tustenuggee Hopoy, to the Commander of the United States forces in the Indian nation.

SIR: Jackson and Hawkins spoke to us, and told us we were their children. At the Tuskegee meeting you told us you would have the land as far down as the Summochichoba; but we chiefs did not agree to it. You did not tell us then you would build forts along the river bank down to the fork; but we heard, since, you issued orders to that effect. We do not think it friendly for one friend to take anything from another forcibly. The Commander and Hawkins did not tell us anything about building of these forts. Did you know these things, and keep them hidden from me? We told our friend Hawkins we would hold a meeting at this place on our way down. We were [told] at the fort at Summochichoba, built by the commanding officer, that he had orders to build three forts. Our friend Hawkins told us to go down to the fort of the blacks, and take them out of it, and give them to their masters; which we are at this present, when we have heard of Jackson's orders about building these forts. We hear of your meeting at Tuskegee. We hope you will detain the forces at the places they are at at present, and wait on the Indians, as I am sure they will be able to settle everything; but all the chiefs are not yet met. You know that we are slow in our movements. I spoke to the commanding officer at Summochichoba. He will read this, and write it off on a clean sheet, and send it on to the Commander-in-chief and Colonel Hawkins. I beg you will send me back an answer, and a sheet of paper, and a little ink, in order to enable me to write you again, if it should be necessary. I remain your friend,

TUSTENNUGGEE HOPOY.

No. 19.

General Gaines to Colonel Clinch.

HEADQ'RS, FORT MONTGOMERY,
Mississippi Territory, May 23, 1816.

SIR: Your letters up to the 9th instant have been received. The British agent, Hambly, and the Little Prince and others, are acting a part which I have been at a loss for some time past to understand. Are they not endeavoring to amuse and divert us from our main object? Their tricks, if they be so, have assumed a serious aspect, and may lead to their destruction; but we have little to apprehend from them. They must be watched with an eye of vigilance. The post near the junction of the rivers, to which I called your attention in the last month, must be established speedily, even if we have to fight our way to it through the ranks of the whole nation.

The surveyors have commenced laying off the land to be sold and settled, and they must be protected. The force of the whole nation cannot arrest your movement down the river on board the boats, if secured up the sides with two-inch plank, and covered over with clapboards; nor could all the nation prevent your landing and constructing a stockade work, sufficient to secure you, unless they should previously know the spot at which you intended to land, and had actually assembled at that place previous to or within four hours of your landing; but your force is not sufficient to warrant your march to the different villages, as suggested, by land. The whole of your force (except about forty men, or one company, for the defence of Fort Gaines) should be kept near your boats and supplies until the new post shall be established. You may then strike at any hostile party near you, with all your disposable force; but even then you should not go more than one or two day's march from your fort.

If your supplies of provisions and ammunition have reached you, let your detachment move as directed in my letter of the 28th of last month. You can venture to move with twenty-five days' rations; but you should order a supply to the agency, or Fort Gaines, where a boat should be built, and held in readiness to send down, in case any accident should prevent or delay the arrival of a supply which I have ordered from New Orleans.

I enclose you an extract of a letter containing an arrangement for the supply by water, and have to direct that you* will provide a boat, and despatch it with an officer and fifty men to meet the vessels from New Orleans, as soon as you are advised of their being on the river. One of your large boats will answer the purpose, provided you have no barge or keel-boat. Should the boats meet with opposition at what is called the Negro fort, arrangements will immediately be made for its destruction; and for that purpose you will be supplied with two eighteen-pounders and one howitzer, with fixed ammunition, and implements complete, to be sent in a vessel to accompany the provisions. I have, likewise, ordered fifty thousand musket cartridges, some rifles, swords, &c. Should you be compelled to go against the Negro fort, you will land at a convenient point above it, and force a communication with the commanding officer of the vessels below, and arrange with him your plan of attack. Upon this subject you shall hear from me again, as soon as I am notified of the time at which the vessels will sail from New Orleans.

With great respect and esteem, &c.

General Gaines to Commodore Patterson.

FORT MONTGOMERY, May 22, 1816.

SIR: By a letter I have received from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, commanding a battalion of the 4th regiment of infantry on the Chatahoochee, I learn that, in the early part of the present month, a party of Indians surprised and took from the immediate vicinity of his camp two privates sent out to guard a drove of beef cattle purchased for the subsistence of the troops. The cattle, amounting to thirty head, were also taken. The Indians were pursued forty-five miles, on a path leading to St. Mark's, but, being mounted, and having travelled all night, escaped with their prisoners and booty.

This outrage, preceded by the murder of two of our citizens, Johnson and McGaskey, by Indians below the lines, and followed by certain indications of general hostility, such as the war dance, and drinking war physic, leaves no doubt that we shall be compelled to destroy the hostile towns.

The detached situation of the post which I have ordered Lieutenant Colonel Clinch to establish near the Appalachicola will expose us to great inconvenience and hazard in obtaining supplies by land, particularly in the event of war, as the road will be bad, and the distance from the settlement of Georgia near one hundred and fifty miles.

Having advised with the Commander-in-Chief of the division upon this subject, I have determined upon an experiment by water, and for this purpose have to request your co-operation; should you feel authorized to detach a small gun-vessel or two as a convoy to the boats charged with our supplies up the Appalachicola, I am persuaded that, in doing so, you will contribute much to the benefit of the service, and accommodation of my immediate command in this quarter. The transports will be under the direction of the officer of the gun-vessel, and the whole should be provided against an attack by small arms from shore. To guard against accidents, I will direct Lieutenant Colonel Clinch to have in readiness a boat sufficient to carry fifty men, to meet the vessels on the river and assist them up.

Should you find it convenient to send a convoy, I will thank you to inform me of the date of its departure, and the time which, in your judgment, it will take to arrive at the mouth of the river, (Appalachicola.)

Enclosed you will receive the best account I can give you, from the information I have received of the negro fort upon the Appalachicola. Should we meet with opposition from that fort, it shall be destroyed; and, for this purpose, the commanding officer above will be ordered to prepare all his disposable force to meet the boats at or just below the fort, and he will confer with the commanding officer of the gun-vessels upon the plan of attack.

I am, with great consideration and esteem, your obedient servant,

Commodore Patterson to Lieutenant Commandant Crawley.

NEW ORLEANS, June 19, 1816.

SIR: The enclosed copy of a letter from Major General Gaines, commanding the United States military forces in the Creek nation, fully informs you of his situation, and his expectation of immediate commencement of hostilities on the part of those Indians.

In consequence of the information contained in that letter, I have promised the convoy therein requested; you will therefore take under your command gun-boat No. 149, and, with that letter for your guide, convoy the transports with ordnance, provisions, &c., up the Appalachicola and Chatahoochee, to such point or points as may be required, if practicable. Should you meet with opposition from the negro fort, situated, as stated in the letter, on the former river, the military commanding officer will have orders to destroy it, in which you will co-operate; the plan of attack to be concerted between yourself and him: the transports will be under your direction entirely.

In the event of hostilities between the Indians and the United States, you will, if practicable, afford any aid with your vessels in your power to the army. Remain in that river, and co-operate with them, until it shall be necessary to return here for provisions; but, if you cannot aid them in their operations, you will then return immediately, bringing with you the transports.

The transports will rendezvous at the Pass

Christian, and consist of the following vessels: schooner Semilante, laden with ordnance; schooner General Pike, laden with provisions.

By late information, the negro fort mounts only six pieces of cannon, with about one hundred men in and about it planting corn, and I apprehend no opposition from them whatever; in the event of your remaining to act with the army, you will communicate with me by mail through General Gaines. Should the boat, mentioned in General Gaines's letter, not meet you prior to your arrival at or near the negro fort, and you have cause to expect opposition, you will wait her arrival before you attempt to pass it.

Very respectfully, &c.

NEW ORLEANS, June 19, 1816.

SIR: The enclosed despatch for Lieutenant Commandant Crawley is transmitted under cover to you, lest he might not arrive at the Pass Christian by the time the transports laden with ordnance, provisions, &c., mentioned to you verbally when here, shall arrive, and be ready to proceed to their place of destination; in which case, you will consider them as addressed to you, and act accordingly; in that event, you will take under your command gunboat No. 154, together with the transports, and proceed in execution of these instructions.

In the performance of the duties therein pointed out, it will be necessary to act with vigor and judgment; and you will refrain from any act of hostilities against the Spanish force, or violation of their rights and laws. You will make no delay in your departure from the Pass Christian, after the arrival there of No. 154 and the transports. Very respectfully, &c.

UNITED STATES GUN-VESSEL, No. 149, Bay St. Louis, August 13, 1816.

SIR: In conformity with your orders of the 24th of June, I have the honor to report that, with this vessel and No. 154, Sailingmaster James Bassett, I took under convoy the schooners General Pike and Semilante, laden with provisions and military stores, and proceeded for Appalachicola river; off the mouth of which we arrived on the 10th July. At this place I received despatches from Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, commanding the fourth regiment United States infantry, on the Chatahoochee river, borne by an Indian, requesting me to remain off the mouth of the river until he could arrive with a party of men to assist in getting up the transports; desiring me, also, to detain all vessels and boats that might attempt to descend the river.

On the 15th, I discovered a boat pulling out of the river, and, being anxious to ascertain whether we should be permitted peaceably to pass the fort above us, I despatched a boat with an officer to gain the necessary information; on nearing her, she fired a volley of musketry into my boat, and immediately pulled in for the river; I immediately opened a fire on them from the gun-vessels, but with no effect.

On the 17th, at 5 A. M. I manned and armed a boat with a swivel and musketry and four men, and gave her in charge of Midshipman Luffborough, for the purpose of procuring fresh water, having run short of that article. At 11 A. M. Sailingmaster Bassett, who had been on a similar expedition, came alongside with the body of John Burgess, ordinary seaman, who had been sent in the boat with Midshipman Luffborough; his body was found near the mouth of the river, shot through the heart. At 4 P. M. discovered a man at the mouth of the river on a sand bar, sent a boat and brought him on board; he proved to be John Lopaz, ordinary seaman, the only survivor of the boat's crew sent with Midshipman Luffborough. He reports that, on entering the river, they discovered a negro on the beach near a plantation; that Mr. Luffborough ordered the boat to be pulled directly for him; that on touching the shore he spoke to the negro, and directly received a volley of musketry from two divisions of negroes and Indians, who lay concealed in the bushes on the margin of the river; Mr. Luffborough, Robert Maitland, and John Burgess were killed on the spot; Lopaz made his escape by swimming, and states that he saw the other seaman, Edward Daniels, made prisoner. Lopaz supposed there must have been forty negroes and Indians concerned in the capture of the boat.

On the 20th of July, I received, by a canoe with five Indians, despatches from Colonel Clinch, advising that he had arrived with a party of troops and Indians at a position about a mile above the negro fort, requesting that I would ascend the river and join him with the gun-vessels.

He further informed me that he had taken a negro bearing the scalp of one of my unfortunate crew to one of the unfriendly Indian chiefs. On the 22d, there was a heavy canonading in the direction of the fort. On the 23d, I received a verbal message from Colonel Clinch, by a white man and two Indians, who stated that Colonel Clinch wished me to ascend the river to a certain bluff, and wait there until I saw him. Considering that, by so doing, a narrow and crooked river, from both sides of which my decks could be commanded, and exposed to the fire of musketry, without enabling me to act in my own defence, and also that something like treachery might be on foot, from the nature of the message, I declined acting, retained the white man and one of the Indians as hostages, and despatched the other, with my reasons for so doing, to Col. Clinch, stating that his views and communications to me in future must be made in writing, and by an officer of the army.

Lieutenant Wilson and thirteen men joined me on the 24th, to assist in getting up with the transports; he likewise informed me that Col. Clinch had sent the canoe the day before.

On the 25th, I arrived with the convoy at Duelling bluff, about four miles below the fort, where I was met by Colonel Clinch; he informed me that, in attempting to pass within gunshot of the fortifications, he had been fired upon by the negroes, and that he had also been fired upon for the last four or five days, whenever any of his troops appeared in view. We immediately reconnoitred the fort, and determined on a site to erect a small battery of two eighteen pounders to assist the gun-vessels to force the navigation of the river, as it was evident from their hostility we should be obliged to do.

On the 26th the Colonel began to clear away the brushwood for the erection of the battery; he, however, stated to me that he was not acquainted with artillery, but that he thought the distance was too great to do execution. On this subject we unfortunately differed totally in opinion, as we were within point-blank range; he, however, ordered his men to desist from further operations; I then told him that the gun vessels would attempt the passage of the fort in the morning, without his aid. At 4 a. m., on the morning of the 27th, we began warping the gun vessels to a proper position; at 5, getting within gunshot, the fort opened upon us, which we returned, and, after ascertaining our real distance with cold shot, we commenced with hot, (having cleared away our coppers for that purpose,) the first one of which, entering their magazine, blew up and completely destroyed the fort. The negroes fought under the English jack, accompanied with the red or bloody flag.

This was a regularly constructed fortification, built under the immediate eye and direction of Colonel Nicholls, of the British army; there were mounted on the walls, and in a complete state of equipment for service, four long twenty-four-pounder cannon; four long six-pounder cannon; one four-pounder field-piece, and a five and a half inch brass howitzer, with three hundred negroes, men, women, and children, and about twenty Indian warriors of the renegade Choctaws; of these, two hundred and seventy were killed, and the greater part of the rest mortally wounded, but three escaped unhurt; among the prisoners were the two chiefs of the negroes and Indians. On examining the prisoners, they stated that Edward Daniels, ordinary seaman, who was made prisoner in the boat on the 17th July, was tarred and burnt alive. In consequence of this savage act, both the chiefs were executed on the spot by the friendly Indians.

From the best information we could ascertain, there were 2,500 stands of musketry, with accoutrements complete; 500 carbines; 500 steel scabbard swords; 4 cases, containing two hundred pairs pistols; 300 quarter casks rifle powder; 762 barrels of cannon powder, besides a large quantity of military stores and clothing that I was not able to collect any account of, owing to an engagement made by Colonel Clinch with the Indians, in which he promised them all the property captured, except the cannon and shot.

The property captured on the 27th July, according to the best information we could obtain, and at the lowest calculation, could not have been less than $200,000 in value; the remnant of the property, that the Indians did not take, was transported to Fort Crawford and to this place, an inventory of which I have the honor to transmit for your further information.

On sounding the river, I found it impassable for vessels drawing more than four and a half feet water; consequently, Colonel Clinch took the provisions from the General Pike into flats, and lightened the Semillante, so as to enable her to ascend the river as high as Fort Crawford. On the 3d August, after setting fire to the remaining parts of the fort and village, I left the river and arrived at this anchorage on the 12th current.

I cannot close this letter without expressing to you my entire approbation of the conduct of Sailingmaster James Bassett, commanding gun vessel No. 154, for his cool, deliberate, and masterly conduct, and the support I received from him in all cases of difficulty and danger. In fact, sir, every man and officer did his duty.

Very respectfully, &c.

J. LOOMIS.

No. 24.

Commodore Patterson to the Secretary of the Navy
NEW ORLEANS, August 15, 1916.

SIR: It is with great satisfaction I do myself the honor to transmit herewith a copy of the report of operations of two gun-vessels, under the command of Sailingmaster Jairus Loomis, despatched at the request of Major General Gaines, commanding the United States army in the Creek nation, to convoy two transports, laden with ordnance stores and provisions, up the rivers Appalachicola and Chatahooche, to Fort Crawford, for the use of the army; as also copies of the Major General's letter to me, and of my instructions to Mr. Loomis.

You will perceive by Mr. Loomis's statement that the unprovoked and wanton aggression committed by a party of negroes on his boats, as also their hostile disposition and conduct to the army and the gun-vessels, and their approaching the fort, evinced in the strongest manner their intention to dispute his passage past their fort, and rendered it necessary to silence their fire and capture the fort. The very able manner and short time in which this was so effectually accomplished, with a force so very inferior, reflects the greatest credit upon Mr. Loomis and the officers and men under his command, the ninth shot and first hot one producing the explosion; and unless the fort had surrendered or been destroyed, it would have been impossible for the army to have received those supplies, of which they stood so much in need, and without which their operations against the hostile Indians must necessarily have been materially retarded, if not totally suspended; and it was from the very great importance, as detailed by General Gaines, that those stores and provisions should reach the army in safety, that I felt it a duty incumbent upon me, when thus called upon, to afford the requisite convoy for their protection.

The service rendered by the destruction of this fort, and the band of negroes who held it, and the country in its vicinity, is of great and manifest importance to the United States, and particularly those States bordering on the Creek nation, as it had become the general rendezvous for runaway slaves and disaffected Indians; an asylum where they were assured of being received; a stronghold where they found arms and ammunition to protect themselves against their owners and the Government. This hold being destroyed, they have no longer a place to fly to, and will not be so liable to abscond. The able manner in which this enterprise was conducted cannot but impress the hostile Indians also with a dread of our arms, and increase the confidence of those who are friendly; add to which, that the force of the negroes was daily increasing; and they felt themselves so strong and secure that they had commenced several plantations on the fertile banks of the Appalachicola, which would have yielded them every article of sustenance, and which would, consequently, in a short time have rendered their establishment quite formidable and highly injurious to the neighboring States.

The English union jack and red or bloody flags, under which they committed their unprovoked hostilities against the American flag, are in my possession, and I shall have the satisfaction of forwarding them to the Department by the first safe conveyance. It appears very extraordinary, and remains with the English Government to explain the authority for their flag being thus hoisted by a band of outlaws, as also their officer, Colonel Nicholls, having placed so strong a work, and with so large a supply of arms, (most of which were perfectly new and in their cases,) ammunition, and every other implement requisite to enable the negroes and Indians to prosecute offensive operations against the United States—in possession of negroes, too, known to be runaways from the United States; and that, too, some time after peace had taken place.

Herewith is transmitted a copy of the inventory of the articles saved from the explosion, designating those furnished the army for public use, and those brought off and deposited here.

I regret extremely the loss of Mr. Luffborough, killed in the service, who, though much indisposed, and having sent in his resignation to the Department, very handsomely volunteered his services and accompanied the expedition. Mr.

Relations with Spain.

Loomis reports his conduct in the highest terms of approbation.

I avail myself of this occasion, with great satisfaction, to recommend to the particular notice of the Department Sailingmaster Jairus Loomis and James Bassett, commanding the gunboats on this expedition, as highly meritorious officers.

I cannot but lament exceedingly the great loss of lives occasioned by the destruction of the fort, though caused by their opposition to a passage of the river, and hostilities most wickedly commenced upon a friendly flag, under which not the slightest aggression would have been offered them.

The course pursued in this service, and the result, will, I trust, meet the approbation of the President of the United States.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ST. AUGUSTINE, EAST FLORIDA,
February 18, 1815.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The support and protection which the subaltern officers of the troops under my command now on Cumberland Island afford to the runaway slaves of this province under my charge, inviting them to desert their masters and enlist as soldiers, with the tempting promise of the liberty which they will enjoy when once they are transported to His Britannic Majesty's colonies, have filled with consternation the peaceable inhabitants, subjects of His Catholic Majesty; to which may be added the aggravation offered them by the manner in which the restoration has been eluded, as to answer the claim which their masters make personally, by saying that they might take those that would accompany them voluntarily, is the same thing as to refuse their restoration; for where is the slave that will voluntarily return to slavery if left to his election? For my part, even if there did not exist that good understanding, concord, and friendship between our respective nations, I should feel very averse to suppose that the British Government, generous England, would tolerate in its subjects the spoliation of this property belonging to the pacific, industrious, and defenceless planter, not only of a friendly Power, but (excepting in certain cases) I conceive they would not permit it towards an enemy. I pronounce it as undeniable that this laudable maxim has ever been so religiously observed by civilized and enlightened people, that until now it has always been considered as an inviolable principle of the laws of nations.

This abuse or disorder, most excellent sir, from its important nature, demands from your Excellency the most prompt and efficacious remedy in your power, in order to do away those appearances of hostility which such unusual proceedings manifest, as well as to avoid the consequences which must result from them, and which, for my part, I shall endeavor to obviate by every means in my power; requesting your excellency again to order the restoration, without restriction, of the aforesaid Spanish property, which I now demand of you, officially, for the second time.

Permit me to offer to your excellency, personally, my sentiments of high consideration, whose life I pray God to preserve many years.

SIR: I have ordered a supply of provisions to be sent from New Orleans, via Pensacola, to Fort Crawford, on the Conecub. This route has been adopted as the most speedy one of provisioning one of my garrisons, which must be maintained during the present contest against our mutual enemies, the Seminole Indians; and I cannot but express a hope that no attempt will be made to interrupt the free passage of my transports to that post. I am not disposed to enter into any controversy with you on the right which our Government may claim to the free navigation of such watercourses as head within her limits, but flow through the territory of His Catholic Majesty; preferring to leave these subjects to be settled by those legally authorized. But as it is necessary for me to make use of the Escambia river in passing up provisions to the garrison at Fort Crawford, I wish to be distinctly understood that any attempt to interrupt the passage of my transports cannot be received in any other light than as a hostile act on your part. I will not permit myself for a moment to believe that you would commit an act so contrary to the interests of the King, your master. His Catholic Majesty, as well as the United States, are alike interested in chastising a savage foe, who have too long warred with impunity against his subjects as well as the citizens of this Republic; and I feel persuaded that every aid which you can give to promote this object will be cheerfully tendered.

I am, with sentiments of respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

PENSACOLA, April 15, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 25th of last month has been delivered to me; also that of the 16th, in answer to mine of the 16th of February preceding. I now have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of both, and to reply to the former.

Relations with Spain.

In the month of May last, yielding to a spirit of conciliation, I gave permission to the schooner Victory, from New Orleans, to pass up the Escambia to the American fort with a cargo of provisions; prompted by the same sentiment, I gave a similar permission in January last to Captain Call, of the schooner Italiana, to proceed to the same place; and subsequently, pursuing the same friendly and conciliatory feeling, I allowed Lieutenant Eddy, belonging to the garrison of the fort above alluded to, who had been commissioned for that purpose by Major Youngs, the commandant, to supply himself here with sixty barrels of provisions. The cargo of the schooner Italiana being still deposited here, I conceive that the introduction of the further supply requested by your excellency is not necessary at present. Notwithstanding this, as I infer from your excellency's letter that the said provisions are now on the way, and am disposed to grant the same indulgence as heretofore, while it is not less my duty to enforce the established regulations and restrictions, which require that the supplies should be consigned to a Spanish trading-house, which will undertake to forward them and secure the payment of the royal import and export duties, I will give permission for them to pass in like manner as the first; it being, however well understood that, neither now nor hereafter, the United States can pretend to or acquire any right in consequence of these indulgences, which are perfectly gratuitous, and granted solely in consequence of existing circumstances, which, as your excellency states to me, prevent the arrival of supplies to the said Fort Crawford, through any other channel. In addition, you are pleased to remark that you are not disposed to enter into any discussion with me on the subject of the right which may be claimed by the United States to the free navigation of the Escambia.

To a discussion of this nature I am no less averse than your excellency; because it is one not within my province, and because it is my duty, as a subordinate officer, to conform to the orders of my superior; therefore, until I receive orders to the contrary, I am bound, in reference to this point, strictly to adhere to the existing treaties between the United States and Spain. On referring to the last treaty of amity, limits, and navigation, I perceive nothing that stipulates the free navigation of the river alluded to; but, on the contrary, that the sovereignty of the King, my master, in and over all the territories, coasts, rivers, ports, and bays, situate to the south of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, is solemnly and explicitly acknowledged by the United States; and if, in consideration of the present extraordinary circumstances, further momentary concessions are required, I request your excellency to have the goodness to apply for that purpose, in future, to the authority on whom they may depend, as I am wholly unauthorized in this matter.

God preserve you many years.

No. 30.

General Jackson to Governor Mazot.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
St. Marks April 27, 1818.

SIR: After I left this post for St. Juan, to disperse and destroy the mutual enemy of Spain and the United States, a small schooner with men and supplies arrived from Pensacola, and was taken possession of and detained by my officer left in command. This vessel has been liberated, with all her effects, excepting some clothing of the United States, (unaccompanied with any invoice,) and which has been detained as supposed to be a part of that taken in the boat, within the territory of this Republic, in which Lieutenant Scott, of the United States Army, with his command, was so inhumanly massacred.

I regret being compelled to state to you that from the papers and other proofs taken at San Juan, the quantity of American cattle found at St. Marks, and purchased by me from the commissary of the post, and the intercourse kept up between this post and the hostile Indians, there is too much ground to believe that the Indians have been encouraged, aided, and abetted by the officers of Spain in this cruel war against the United States. Proof positive exists that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Marks. The United States clothing being found on board of a vessel in the employ of the Government of Spain, sailing from Pensacola direct from this post, compels me to call on you for a statement in what manner you came possessed of said clothing.

The good understanding that so happily exists between His Catholic Majesty and the United States formed a just ground to believe that his agents would have discountenanced this cruel and savage war, waged against the citizens of this Republic. Too weak to comply with her treaties with the United States, or chastise her own savage subjects waging war against a friendly nation, it was scarcely to be believed that her officers would have been detected in aiding and abetting this enemy, assisting him with intelligence of our movements, and purchasing of him the property depredated of us. America, just to her treaties, and anxious to maintain peace with the world, cannot and will not permit such a savage war to be carried on in disguise any longer.

Asylums have been granted to the persons and property of our Indian foe, (fugitives from the territory of the United States.) Facilities deemed by me necessary to terminate a war, which, under existing treaties, should have been maintained by Spain, for feeding my troops, and liberating the subjects of Spain imprisoned by the Indians, have all been denied by the officers of His Catholic Majesty. All these facts prove the unjust conduct of Spanish agents in the Floridas.

Relations with Spain.

It cannot be longer tolerated; and although a Republic fond of peace, the United States know their rights, and at the expense of war will maintain them.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General Commanding.

PENSACOLA, April 27, 1818.

SIR: Your letters of the 27th instant, dated Camp on the Escambia and Fort Crawford, enclosing a proclamation, were this day delivered to me at 3 o'clock P. M. by an artificer, (a man of color,) whose immediate return does not allow me at present to reply particularly to them; and I shall only state that the few peaceful Indians who were at this place and in its neighborhood left it on the 26th, and at daybreak several of them were murdered by the troops of the United States, and among them some women and children. As I am unable to account for this act, and the violation resulting from it, I have to inform you that I shall transmit an account of the whole transaction to my superior; and I hope that in the meantime you will not permit any further hostilities to be committed on any pretence in this territory; and, in case the Indians give any reason for complaint, that you will inform me of it, that I may chastise them for it, as far as it depends on my authority.

If there be Indians still remaining in this territory, I will have them sought for, and communicate your letter to them, and advise you of the result. I do assure you on my word that your statement of the aggressions committed by the Indians is the first intelligence I have had of it, and that when I agreed to the passage of the escort of which you speak, those Indians of whom Lieutenant Eddy was apprehensive were the only ones pointed out to me.

I must repeat to you that all my wishes and efforts are directed to preserving the peace happily subsisting between our Governments, and relying on your friendly sentiments towards me, I offer you in return the assurances of mine.

God preserve you many years.

PENSACOLA, April 30, 1818.

SIR: In consequence of the request contained in your letter of the 27th instant, I assembled the principal chiefs of the Upper Creek towns of Colome, Canaan, Corvalle, and Forsythe, and communicated its contents to them; they all replied that they had long been very unhappy and miserable, without shelter or country; but that, at last, by the advice of a good friend, they had found one; that they all cheerfully adopted it, and were very grateful for the offers you had made them. These Indians amount to about eighty-seven, including women and children. I have settled that they should divide into two companies, and they will set out as soon as your answer is received, which they think it prudent to keep, as you will, when informed of their acceptance of your offer, be enabled to give proper orders for their safety on their journey, and their avoiding any unpleasant rencontre with the Choctaws, who, if not duly informed of it, might attack them; in which case, the measures taken for the peaceful arrangements that we both have so much at heart would be defeated.

Opabi-hola, an Alabamian chief, on account of his age and infirmities, will remain here for the present with his family. I have given orders for his relief, and pledge myself for his good behavior.

You will always find me ready to unite with you in such measures as may be beneficial to our respective countries, and are conformable to existing treaties.

I renew the assurances of my respect, and pray God to preserve you many years.

No. 32 a.

PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 10th instant I received your letter of the 27th of April last, informing me that on board a small schooner despatched from this port for Appalache there were found several articles of clothing, such as are used by the United States troops, and which you suppose were taken in the boat in which Lieutenant Eddy was unfortunately cut off, together with his escort. You inquire of me how I became possessed of those articles of clothing, and you proceed to state that you regret the necessity which compels you to inform me that, from written and other proofs obtained at St. Johns, the quantity of American cattle found at St. Marks, and the active communication kept up between the latter place and the hostile Indians, there appears sufficient ground to believe that they were encouraged and excited to this savage warfare against the United States by the Spanish officers. You add that there exist positive proofs that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Marks; and you conclude by declaring that shelter and protection have been given at this place to the persons and property of the Indians who are in hostility with the United States, and have fled from the American territory; that these facts, and the refusal to allow the passage of provisions for the supply of your troops, fully evince the unjust conduct of the Spanish agents in the Floridas.

To these several charges I shall reply in their order, frankly, unreservedly, and unequivocally. The first relates to the articles of clothing found on board the schooner Maria, and detained on the presumption of their being the property of the United States. A part of these, as is proved by the copy No. 1, was purchased at New Orleans in May last; a part came from Havana and a part was bought here; all which being fully substantiated the charge is consequently disproved, and your inquiry satisfactorily answered. The second is more serious, and refers to the conduct of the commandant of St. Marks, at a recent period. I immediately demanded of him an account of his proceedings; his report of which is enclosed under the No. 2. But as I am desirous that you would bring forward unquestionable proof of the misconduct of that officer, I have to request you to furnish me with it, in order that, if his misconduct be established, he may receive condign punishment; hereby assuring your excellency, with that sincerity that belongs to me, that in such an event he has acted entirely contrary to his instructions; and that on receiving the evidence required he shall be tried by a court martial, and punished in an exemplary manner, according to the merits of the case. Your sense of equity will, however, satisfy you that the Spanish Government cannot be held responsible for the misconduct of its agents while it does not support them in it, nor tolerate their errors when proved. Your subsequent complaints are directed personally and pointedly against me, and relate to the shelter and protection alleged to have been afforded to the persons and property of fugitive Indians, and to the passage of provisions up the Escambia. The best mode of giving a satisfactory answer to these charges will be to offer you a brief and faithful statement of facts. With respect to the Indians, you have assuredly not been correctly informed; for, although some few remained permanently here, chiefly consisting of women and children employed in supplying the inhabitants with fish, fuel, and other trifling articles, and had been living here long before the present war with the Seminoles, it is a fact that, when I sent round to assemble them for the purpose of communicating to them the proposal of Major Youngs, their whole number amounted but to eighty-seven; and surely the small proportion of men among them, unarmed, miserable, and defenceless, could not be considered as objects of hostility to the United States; a proof of which was shown in the continual passage of American citizens to this place, travelling unarmed and alone, without a single instance of accident happening either to their persons or property. In regard to the passage of provisions up the Escambia, so far from suspending it, I facilitated it, as far as depended on me, even to committing myself; since, as a subordinate officer, I could not becomingly allow a proceeding which was not fully authorized. I therefore, in consideration of circumstances, took that responsibility upon myself, as I stated to your excellency in my letter of the 15th ultimo, by Major Perault, to which I beg your reference. But, with a view to the benefit of this place, by means of a free intercourse with the interior, I hereby declare that in future the merchants and traders belonging to it shall pass freely from hence to Fort Crawford, and other places on the frontier, and transport all necessary supplies, either by land or water; by which means it is to be expected they will be abundantly provided, and your excellency entirely satisfied.

In offering you these explanations and details, I flatter myself I have given so full and satisfactory an answer to your excellency's letter as to leave no doubt of the sincerity of my intentions, and at the same time to have presented a certain pledge that it is my earnest wish to contribute, by every means in my power, to the maintenance of the good understanding happily subsisting between our two Governments.

PENSACOLA, May 31, 1818.

Having observed, among other things, what is stated to you by Major General Andrew Jackson, of the United States troops, in his note of the 27th April last, communicated to me in yours of the 13th instant, in which you request me to inform you of what description the articles referred to by the said General were, also by whom the coats worn by the men belonging to the gray and brown companies (de pardos y morenos) from the Havana, under my command, were sold or brought to this place, they being the same uniform as that worn by the troops of the United States, I have to inform you, in reply, that with respect to the articles of clothing shipped on board the schooner Maria, for the supply of a detachment from the aforesaid companies at Appalache, and detained by General Jackson, they consisted of fifteen four-point woollen blankets, and were brought here in His Majesty's schooner brigantine "El Almirante," arrived in this port 2d January last; twenty-five pairs of French shoes, bought here of Don Henrique Grandpré, as per exhibit No. 1, annexed; fifteen common negro hats, bought of Don Henrique Michelet, per exhibit No. 2; and twenty shirts of Crea linen, and the same number of pantaloons, received by the above-named vessel, with the exception of three or four of the latter articles, which were made in North America for the use of their troops, and came into my possession in the manner I shall presently explain to you. All which clothing I requested you, in mine of the 7th April, to be pleased to direct the proper department to have inserted in the clearance, as being for its account and risk. By the voucher annexed (No. 3) you will perceive, that on the 1st and 4th of May last, and 29th of July, there were shipped to me by Don Pedro Dalharte y Clareria, merchant of New Orleans, the hundred and thirty-one coats of the uniform reformed there, according to his letter of advice; also, twenty-eight pair of shoes, twenty Russia sheeting waistcoats, two hundred and fifty-three leathern caps for the use of the chasseurs, and a quantity of half boots and leathern stocks; all which articles were purchased from the military storekeeper at New Orleans, and brought here in the schooners Maria and Jalousie, under the charge of their skippers, Bartolome Alberty and Jose Medina, who included them in the manifests they exhibited on their arrival, and the duties on them were secured, as appears by their appraisement by the proper officers on the 19th May and 11th August last. Hence, it is evident that the conjecture formed by General Jackson that the articles of clothing detained by him were part of those captured from the escort of Lieutenant Scott, at the time he was cut off within the limits of the territory of the Republic, is entirely disproved; inasmuch as the unfortunate accident of that officer and his escort happened on the Appalachicola in December last, and the articles of clothing alluded to were purchased in New Orleans in May and July preceding, as is fully proved by the letters of advice and invoices comprised in exhibit No. 3, to which I have referred above.

God preserve you many years.

To JOSE MAZOT.

(No. 1.)

I hereby certify that, on the 10th of February last, I sold to Captain Don Benigno Garcia Calderon, commanding the gray and brown companies from Havana, two hundred and eighteen pairs of French shoes, iron shod, for the use of the men belonging to the said companies; and, at the request of the said officer, I have delivered him the present certificate, dated at Pensacola, this 18th day of May, 1818.

NEW ORLEANS, April 30, 1817.

To DON BENIGNO GARCIA CALDERON, Pensacola:

Enclosed you have an account of the cost and charges of fifty-four shirts and twenty-eight pairs of shoes, for amount whereof you are debited in account of fifty-three dollars. Although I had no orders from you for the shirts, I was induced to purchase them by the low prices and the probability of your employing them to advantage. In the sack they are put up in, you will find a uniform coat which has been re-formed here, and can be set by the storekeeper at twelve rials. I think it would answer. There are one hundred and twenty of them. I am offered by the same storekeeper fifty field-tents, nearly new, at three dollars; and a parcel of strong leathern caps, such as are worn by the chasseurs, that can be set at less than two rials, of which there about two hundred. The storekeeper having made me a second offer of the shirts, I proposed to take them in barter for coffee at ten or eight and a half; even at ten I am persuaded it would be a good bargain, as it would give the opportunity of putting off the coffee, its inferior quality making it rather dull sale. The quality most called for is the green, which is much superior, and that hardly commands twenty dollars. The cost and charges of the said shipment of shirts, by schooner Maria, are carried to your debit in account current, viz., $176 13.

Defence of F. C. Luengo, Commandant of St. Mark's.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1818.

In replying to your letter of yesterday's date, in which, among other things connected with its subject, you communicate to me the several points treated of by Major General Jackson in his letter of the 27th ultimo, and on which he founds his assertion that the Indians not only received succors at Appalache, but that they were excited to commit hostilities against the forces of the United States, and of whose movements they were exactly informed, I have to express my utter astonishment at this business, in which imposture and malevolence have been equally employed to criminate the parties alluded to in the General's letter. It is stated by the General, that, from written and other proofs obtained at St. John's, the number of American cattle found at St. Mark's, and brought by the commissary there, and the constant intercourse kept up between that place and the hostile Indians, there appear sufficient grounds to believe that they were encouraged and excited to this savage warfare by the Spaniards. To this I have to reply that it has never come to my knowledge that any person belonging to the fort had any connexion, directly or indirectly, with St. John's. And although it is true I wrote two letters to Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, one of them was merely to thank him for the three letters he wrote me, informing me of the proceedings of the insurgents at Amelia Island, and of Captain Woodbine, who, I informed you by express, was one of the two chiefs who were hung the day I left Appalache; and the purport of the other was to request him to come or send immediately for the property, which, at the request of the Indian chiefs, and to avoid increasing their suspicions, I gave permission to be deposited in the fort, and to withdraw O-Kelagne, in whose custody that property was placed. And although, in taking this step, I ran the risk of incurring the resentment of both parties, yet it was one which did not seem likely to incur suspicion. Nor does the charge of a purchase of an extraordinary number of American cattle, alleged to have been made at St. Mark's, authorize greater room for suspicion, since it is notorious that, from the time of its establishment, its supplies were obtained from the droves of cattle brought there for sale by the Indians, who had very large ones towards Mickasuky and the neighboring country. It seldom happened that we considered ourselves as fully supplied for several months together; and if the supplies were in fact derived from the plunder committed on the Americans, the sellers took good care to conceal that fact, as they were known to have droves, and were in the habit of bringing them for sale. It may be remarked that very little care was manifested by the American commandant or magistrate within whose district these excesses were committed, to be placed in a situation to complain of them to the commandant of St. Mark's, and to send him the marks of the cattle, which would have shown from whence they came, and have tended to prevent the purchase of them. With respect to the intercourse kept up between the fort and the Indians, complained of by General Jackson, and the excitement and encouragement given them by the Spaniards to commit hostilities, the charge is altogether inadmissible. An intercourse and good understanding with the Indians were at all times strongly recommended by the Government, and never were they more necessary than in the circumstances in which we have lately been placed at the fort; General Jackson having founded on them a demand of its occupation by his troops, and suggesting that such a step could not fail to receive the approbation of His Catholic Majesty. In the same letter, he stated that he had been informed by an Indian woman, a prisoner, that the hostile Indians and negroes had received considerable supplies of ammunition at the fort. I presumed that I had convinced him of the contrary in my answer, in which I represented to him that no one better than Mr. William Hambly, who, during his stay here, repeatedly interpreted to me the anxiety of the chiefs to obtain such supplies, could undeceive him on this point, as well as on that of the counsel I uniformly gave them to avoid the destruction that awaited them, and which I foresaw from the first. But it appears he is not yet satisfied, and persists in his charge. A reference to the returns of the public storekeeper will show that, from the month of May last, and prior to the receipt of your orders, there had been issued to a few of the most noted chiefs, and that merely from motives of policy, only three pounds of powder, three pounds of ball, and fourteen flints. The interpreter, Juan Sandoval, and his son, Francisco, through whom I communicated with the Indians, can testify to the truth of this statement—a step which I request of you to take in support of my refutation of General Jackson's charges. He cannot but know that a short time before the negro fort on the Appalachicola was blown up, all the chiefs of the neighboring tribes went there and supplied themselves with powder and ball, left for them by the English; and that at Miccasuky, and the huts thereabouts, there was a considerable quantity. Having thus obtained a large supply of the kind of powder and ball they most esteemed, they set little value on ours, which, in fact, they view with such indifference that it is only a chance hunter among those who come to the fort with venison, wild fowl, &c., that is willing to use it. And although, as I formerly stated in an official communication, a supply was repeatedly demanded of me by the chief Kinache, with a view to prove, by the refusal of it, that the American interest prevailed in the fort, he did not succeed in it. In consequence, we, whom they considered as American partisans to the last, were reproached with it, and have even to put up with some impertinences from them. I shall, however, in a strict adherence to truth, and because the circumstances may have given birth to these suspicions, proceed to state that the chief Pelisacho, who was executed, received, among things, at the fort, from Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, when he came from Suwanee, to request aid against the negroes, from whom he apprehended an attack, a small barrel of powder, which might contain from twenty to twenty-five pounds, and was placed, with other property, under the charge of O-Kelaghe. What he did with it, I know not; but I well know that the chief caused me extreme perplexity and vexation, by surrounding the fort with a body of four or five hundred Indians.

I never had an idea that he employed it against the Americans, but that he used it in the purchase of peltry, which he was collecting for the said Arbuthnot at the time of the arrival of the Americans. The charge alleged against the officers at St. Mark's in exciting and stirring up the Indians, and in giving them information of the movements of the Americans, is the effect of a disordered imagination; for how or whence could their movements be better known at the fort than from the Indians themselves? Thither they came and went, and passed and repassed incessantly; and their reports were so various that they deserved very little attention; as a proof of which, nothing certain was known of their operations until the different columns of their troops appeared at the mouth of the Pinar; and, although three of their boats were at anchor there for three or four days, they kept English colors flying until the day before the arrival of the army. My different communications to you are pledges that I took no part in the contest between the Americans and the Indians. I, however, had great cause of complaint against the latter. How, then, is it possible to believe that I gave them that aid of which General Jackson complains; or how can the steps I took to liberate Messrs. Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, by which I exposed myself and my garrison to the vengeance of the Indians, be reconciled with the idea of affording them succor and aid, or the fact of rescuing from them, at the most critical moment, an American soldier whom they would otherwise have put to death? I leave it to impartial observers to decide if these be not proofs of the existence at St. Mark's of a bias in favor of the American interest; and of this I trust General Jackson will be thoroughly convinced on deliberately reflecting upon the subject. I shall not attempt to deny that I have observed towards those barbarians a policy which had the appearance of a warm friendship, but by which I have incurred a considerable expense. If, however, my situation be attentively examined in its different points of view, it will be seen that all this was necessary to restrain them from doing what they had at one time premeditated, on the pretext I have just alluded to, and on others suggested to them by some persons who had gone from hence to those parts of the country. Although I have, as I conceive, given entire satisfaction on all the points embraced by Major General Jackson, I beg leave to request that, for the purpose of corroborating my statement, you will be pleased to give orders for having the declarations taken of the interpreter and of his son, of the subaltern Don Miguel Ordonez, of Don Anastasia Montes de Oca, the public storekeeper, and of Surgeon Don Diego de Barrios, as the persons who have the necessary knowledge of the subjects in question.

God preserve you many years.

Governor Mazot to General Jackson.

PENSACOLA, May 23, 1818.

Having received information that you have passed the frontiers with the troops under your command, and are now within the territory of this province of West Florida, which is under my Government, I have solemnly to protest against this proceeding as an offence against my Sovereign; and I do exhort you, and require of you forthwith to withdraw from the same; in default of which, and in case of a continuance of your aggression, I shall repel force by force.

In this event, the consequences will doubtless be the effusion of blood, and the interruption of the good understanding which has hitherto subsisted between our two nations; but as the party repelling an insult is never deemed the aggressor, you will be responsible before God and men for all the fatal consequences which may ensue.

God preserve you many years.

HEADQUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,

On the line of march, May 23, '18.

SIR: The southern frontier of the United States has, for more than twelve months, been exposed to all the horrors of a cruel and savage war. A party of outlaws and refugees from the Creek nation; negroes who have fled from their masters, citizens of the United States, and sought an asylum in Florida; and the Seminole Indians inhabiting the territory of Spain, all uniting, have raised the tomahawk, and, in the character of savage warfare, have neither regarded sex nor age. Helpless women have been massacred, and the cradle crimsoned with the blood of innocence. The United States, true to their engagements, and confiding in the faith of Spain to enforce existing treaties, never entertained a doubt but that these atrocities would early attract the attention of the Spanish Government, and that speedy and effectual measures would have been adopted for their suppression. Under this persuasion a cordon of military posts was established, to give immediate protection to such of our frontier settlers as were peculiarly exposed, and strict injunctions issued to the American officers to respect the territory of Spain, and not to attempt operations within its limits. These instructions were most scrupulously observed; and, notwithstanding the inactivity of the American troops had encouraged the Indians to the most daring and outrageous act of violence against our citizens, the Government of the United States was still disposed to respect the territory of Spain, and confide in the ability of the Spanish Government to execute existing treaties, until advised through you that, with every disposition, the Spanish authorities had not the power of controlling the Indians in Florida; that their acts of late were viewed as equally hostile to the interests of Spain as those of the United States; that Spanish subjects were not exempted from the evils of which we complained; and that the negro establishments on the Appalachicola and St. Juan rivers were founded by British agents, contrary to the will of Spain. These representations determined the President of the United States to adopt effectual measures to restore tranquillity to the southern frontier of the American Republic; and, pursuant to his orders, justifiable by the immutable laws of self-defence, I have penetrated into Florida, reduced to ashes the Seminole villages, destroyed their magazines of provisions, beaten their warriors whenever they hazarded a contest, dispersed some, and expelled others across the river.

In the course of my operations it became necessary to visit the Spanish fortress of St. Mark's. Entering the territory of Spain to fight her battles, to relieve from bondage her subjects, and to chastise an Indian tribe whom she acknowledged, under existing treaties, she was bound to preserve at peace with the United States, I had every reason to expect that the American army would have been received as friends, and every facility afforded to insure success to operations so interesting to both Governments.

My expectations have not been realized. It had been reported to me, direct from you, that Fort St. Mark's had been threatened by the Indians and negroes; and you expressed sincere apprehensions, from the weakness of the garrison and defenceless state of the work, for its safety. From other sources to be relied on, the same information had been furnished me. It became necessary, therefore, to anticipate the movements of the enemy, and amicably to get possession of a work, dislodging the enemy from which might have cost me much precious blood. On entering St. Mark's evidence of the duplicity and unfriendly feelings of the commandant evinced itself. I found that the gates of this fort had been thrown open to the avowed savage enemies of the United States; that councils of war had been permitted to be held within his own quarters by the chiefs and warriors; that the Spanish storehouses had been appropriated to the use, and were then filled with goods belonging to the hostile party; that cattle knowingly plundered from citizens of the United States had been contracted for and purchased by the officers of the garrison from the Spanish thieves; that foreign agents had free access within the walls of St. Mark's; and a Mr. Arbuthnot, condemned and executed as the instigator of this war, an inmate in the commandant's family.

From this fort was information afforded the enemy of the strength and movements of my army by the said Arbuthnot, the date of departure of express noted by the Spanish commissary, and ammunition, munitions of war, and all necessary supplies furnished.

On my return from my operations east, your letter was received, positively refusing to permit (unless exorbitant duties were paid) any provisions passing up to the American fort on the Escambia. Connected with this strong indication of your unfriendly disposition on your part, I have it, from the most unquestionable authority, that the city of Pensacola has, for some months past, been entirely under the control of Indians; that free ingress and egress are permitted to the avowed savage enemies of the United States; that supplies of ammunition, munitions of war, and provisions, have been received by them from thence; that, on the 15th of April last, there were no less than five hundred Indians in Pensacola, many of them known to be hostile to the United States, and who had but lately escaped my pursuit. The late massacre of eighteen individuals on the Federal road was committed by Indians direct from their return to Pensacola, who were received by you, and transported across the bay, to elude the pursuit of the American troops. The Americans returning, the savages were permitted to return. An Indian, wounded in pursuit by a party for having killed a citizen of the United States, was openly, in the sight of many Americans, received by you, and every comfort administered. Such practice, if authorized by the King, would justify me in open hostilities. Disposed, however, to believe that it was one of the unauthorized acts of his agents, I deem it politic and necessary to occupy Pensacola and the Barancas with an American garrison until the Spanish Government can be advised of the circumstance, and have force sufficient to maintain, and agents disposed to enforce existing treaties.

This is the third time the American troops have been compelled to enter Pensacola from the same causes. Twice had the enemy been expelled, and the place left in quiet possession of those who had permitted the irregular occupancy. This time it must be held until Spain has the power or will to maintain her neutrality. This is justifiable on the immutable principles of self-defence. The Government of the United States is bound to protect her citizens; but weak would be all her efforts, and ineffectual the best advised measures, if the Floridas are to be free to every enemy, and, on the pretext of policy or neutrality, Spanish fortresses are to be opened to their use, and every aid and comfort afforded. I have been explicit, to preclude the necessity of a tedious negotiation. My resolution is fixed, and I have strength enough to enforce it. My army now occupies the old Fort St. Michael, commanding Pensacola. If the town and Barancas are peaceably surrendered, an inventory of all the property, ammunition, arms, &c., shall be taken by officers appointed by both parties, and the amount received for by me to be accounted for by the American Government. The property of Spanish subjects shall be respected; their religion and laws guaranteed to them; the civil government permitted to remain as now established, subject to the control of the military authority of the United States; the ingress and egress open to all individuals; commerce free to the subjects of Spain, as usual; and the military furnished with transportation to Cuba.

If the peaceable surrender be refused, I shall enter Pensacola by violence, and assume the government until the transaction can be amicably adjusted by the two Governments. The military, in this case, must be treated as prisoners of war.

The proof supporting the accusation against your official station will justify this procedure.

In reply to your communication of the 22d instant I have only to observe, that the clothing detained will be a subject for future friendly settlement.

How far the Indians permitted to remain in the neighborhood of Pensacola were friendly disposed to the citizens of the United States, is tested by the late massacre committed by them on the Alabama. The Red Ground chiefs, Muldecoxy and Holmes, avowedly hostile to the United States, were but lately seen in Pensacola, and a body of Indians desecrated, a few days since, in the vicinity of the Barancas, in presence of several Spanish officers. They have not delivered themselves up, and these Red Sticks who have surrendered were not advised to this measure by you, until intelligence of my movements had been received.

By a reference to my communications of the 25th March, you will see how far I have been the aggressor in the measure protested against.

You are there distinctly advised of the objects of my operations, and that every attempt on your part to succor the Indians, or to prevent the passage of my provisions in the Escambia, would be viewed in no other light than as hostile acts on your part.

You have done both, and exposed my troops to the severest privations, by the detention occasioned in the exaction of duties on my provision vessels in Pensacola. You have, therefore, been the aggressor, and the blood which may be shed by a useless resistance on your part to my demand will rest on your head. Before God and man you will be responsible.

This will be handed to you by my aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected.

SIR: The enclosed communication was forwarded to you by my aid-de-camp, Capt. Gadsden, last evening; not finding you, however, in Pensacola, its delivery was delayed.

I have entered Pensacola to provision my troops. I have only to add, that an immediate compliance with my demand is expected. Resistance on your part would be a needless sacrifice of men.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your two notes dated the 23d and on this day, were delivered to me at ten o'clock this morning, by your aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden. Having, in mine of the 18th instant, answered the former in a satisfactory manner, I shall only add that, as to what relates to the Indians, you have been much misinformed, the facts alluded to by you being for the most part unfounded; in proof of which I have to state, that the only two Indians who have been here since the peace negotiated by me, exclusive of the eighty-seven sent off to Major Youngs, are the two who are in the jail, with three women and children; and, further, that long prior to your movements I had sent orders to Appalache, to prevent any succors being given to the Seminoles, and had also given public notice to the same effect in Pensacola, where those unfortunates had from time immemorial received regular supplies.

Your excellency is disposed to lay to my charge the blood which may be shed in consequence of my refusal to deliver up this province. A compliance with your demand would dishonor the close of my life and long military career; and I feel assured that, if placed in a similar situation, your conduct would be the same, from your natural desire to preserve unsullied your well-earned laurels.

Whatever motives may be assigned, no nation is authorized in violating the territory of another, before due representations have been made to its Government.

Your excellency has violated the Spanish territory at Appalache, by seizing on that fort and hoisting your flag—a proceeding in complete hostility with the good understanding subsisting between our respective Governments.

On the 21st instant, by your excellency's orders, Don Pedro Philibert and other inhabitants were made prisoners on their parole of honor, and this day, before Captain Gadsden's arrival at Pensacola, your army advanced upon it, and made prisoner, on his parole of honor, Don Pedro de Alba, the interpreter, the same who translated your two letters above-mentioned. These persons, and other military men, whose presence was important to the tranquillity of the place, have thus been seized in an unjustifiable manner.

These facts being established, I ask, who but your excellency will have to answer for the bloodshed which may ensue in consequence of the determination announced in your letter of taking possession of Pensacola and Barancas? I protest before God and men that my conduct is blameless, and that my sincere wishes ever have been to maintain peace and amity between our respective nations. The sincerity of my intentions is founded upon the President's Message of 25th March last to Congress; the tenor of which holds out assurances that no aggressions were to be expected from the troops of the United States. Unfortunately, however, their operations have violated the tranquillity and peace of the province.

I expect, from the generosity of your excellency, that you will leave the officers and troops of the garrison of Pensacola at perfect liberty; that your army, after receiving the necessary supplies, will evacuate the province as speedily as possible; and that you will not carry on a partial warfare against West Florida at a time when our two nations are in a state of profound peace.

Lieutenant Colonel Don Leni Piernas, provisional commandant of Pensacola, is duly authorized to represent me, and to receive any communications your excellency may be pleased to make. To all such the most prompt answers shall be given, through the ministry of the bearer, the interpreter, Don Pedro de Alba. In conclusion, if, contrary to my hopes, your excellency should persist in your intention to take possession of this fortress, I am resolved to repel force by force, and defend it to the last extremity. He who resists aggression can never be deemed the aggressor.

God preserve your excellency many years.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Pensacola, May 25, 1818.

SIR: The accusations against you are founded on the most unquestionable evidence. I have the certificate of individuals, who, on the 23d instant, at or near the Little Bayou, counted seventeen Indians in company of several Spanish officers. I have only to repeat that the Barancas must be occupied by an American garrison, and again to tender you the terms offered, if amicably surrendered; resistance would be a wanton sacrifice of blood, for which you and your garrison will have to atone. You cannot expect to defend yourself successfully, and the first shot from your fort must draw down upon you the vengeance of an irritated soldiery. I am well advised of your strength, and cannot but remark on the inconsistency of presuming yourself capable of resisting an army which has conquered the Indian tribes, too strong, according to your own acknowledgment, to be controlled by you. If the force which you are now disposed wantonly to sacrifice had been wielded against the Seminoles, the American troops had never entered the Floridas. I applaud your feeling as a soldier, in wishing to defend your post; but where resistance is ineffectual, and the opposing force overwhelming, the sacrifice of a few brave men is an act of wantonness, for which the commanding officer must be accountable to his God.

We certify that, being in Fort St. Mark's, Barancas, on the 28th of May, 1818, in the afternoon, soon after the American troops took possession of the works, and as the Spanish troops were marching out, we saw an Indian carried out by some of the Spanish soldiers; he was laid on the beach, to be put on board a boat. He was wounded in his leg or thigh, and had every appearance of having been engaged in the defence of the fort.

I certify that, on the 23d of May, being in the bayou which enters Pensacola bay, one and a half mile from the town, I saw at the ferry, on the road to Barancas, a number of Indians (I think about seventeen) in company with four Spanish officers. The officers were carried over, and the boat returned to ferry over the Indians. I saw one boat-load landed on the side next the Barancas. The Indians concealed themselves in the bushes on discovering us.

PROVINCE OF WEST FLORIDA,
Town of Pensacola, Sept. 15, 1818.

In pursuance with an order to me directed by Colonel William King, civil and military governor of said province, (a copy whereof is hereto annexed,) I caused to appear before me, at the quarters of Captain Hugh Young, of the army of the United States, in this town, the following persons, viz: Manuel Gonzales, Dr. Brosnaham, William Cooper, J. Dauphin, — Skeate, Feippa Prieto, Joachim Barreлас, P. Alba, junior, Jose Bonefi, (Marian,) and Charles Le Jeune, to answer, on oath, such interrogatories, not tending to criminate themselves, as might be propounded to them by Captain Young, relating to the intercourse which took place between the late Spanish authorities of this province and the hostile Indians during the recent war with the United States.

JOACHIM BARRELAS, being duly sworn, declares that he has frequently seen parties of Indians in the town of Pensacola since the month of November, 1817; says that parties of Indians have been provisioned by the late authorities at this place on several occasions: has frequently heard and believed that the Indians were in the habit of bringing into this place horses, cattle, &c., for the purpose of selling them and other plunder. Says he was at Barancas at the time that General Jackson came to Pensacola, in May last; deponent acted there as commissary, and knows that several Indians went from town down to Barancas with the Spanish forces, and took refuge in the fort; that, at the same time, several small parties were encamped about the Barancas; that, upon the arrival of General Jackson before the Barancas, Tapaulca and family were also in the fort. Deponent has seen said chief several times in Pensacola, and believes him to be either a Creek or Seminole Indian; that, while deponent was at Barancas, and subsequently to the said month of November, 1817, he saw an Indian, named Luna, an express from St. Marks, cross over from Santa Rosa island to Barancas, with despatches for the Governor here; says that, since the said month of November, 1817, Governor Mazot, being himself at Barancas, did order this deponent to give rations to several parties of Indians then there, of at least from thirty to forty strong—men, women, and children.

JOACHIM BARRELAS.

GEORGE SKEATE, being duly sworn, declares that he has constantly resided in the town of Pensacola since November, 1817; since which he has repeatedly seen, at different times, in said town, from thirty to forty Indians; has not seen any ammunition given to the Indians within the period alluded to; has heard and believes that horses, cattle, &c., were brought into this place by the Indians and sold, which deponent however did not see. Deponent believes that the late Governor (Mazot) was well acquainted with the several murders that were committed on the neighboring American frontier; knows of no supplies furnished by order of the Spanish Government since about the month of March, 1817, when a supply of knives, a few blankets, and some copper kettles, were furnished and delivered to a party of Indians, for the purpose, as was then said, of acting against the insurgents who were expected; that the said party of Indians shortly disappeared, and nothing more was heard of them. Deponent saw, on the day that Major Youngs attacked a party of Indians in the neighborhood of this town, a number of Indians who he believes were sent (or went themselves) across the bay in a boat belonging to Don Antonio Molina, captain of the port.

GEORGE SKEATE.

Relations with Spain.

CHARLES LE JEUNE, being duly sworn, declares that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817; since which he has frequently seen in this town or its vicinity parties of upwards of a hundred Indians encamped; that these parties were armed either with rifles or with the arms that were furnished them by the English; that although he cannot state that these parties had received ammunition from the Spanish Government here, he nevertheless can and does state that the said parties were provisioned from the King's stores by Prieto, King's storekeeper; that, previous to November, 1817, the Government was regularly in the habit of giving out ammunition to the Indians from a store which was expressly for that purpose here; that, on the day that Major Youngs attacked the Indians near this town, there was a considerable number encamped near the water side in town, who, upon hearing the report of fire-arms, crossed the bay in their own boats, and in other larger boats belonging to others.

CARLOS LE JEUNE.

WILLIAM COOPER, being duly sworn, declares that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817; during which period he has frequently seen in town and its vicinity several parties of Indians; saw one in particular with some sheet lead, and has heard that the Indians had introduced some clothes in town that looked like American manufacture; states also that Tapaulca was a Red Stick chief, and had been frequently about Pensacola for several years past.

WILLIAM COOPER.

PENSACOLA, September 19, 1818.

I certify that the foregoing depositions were sworn to and subscribed before me, on this day.
M. McKENNEY, SEN., J. P.

No. 37 c.

JOHN DUFFY, being duly sworn, declares as follows:

Question. Have you resided in and about Pensacola since November, 1817?

Answer. I have.

Q. Have you seen in said town or its vicinity, within or since that period, any Indians?

A. I have.

Q. How many did you see at any particular time?

A. About the latter end of that Spring I saw in town from fifty to sixty Indians; but few of these were armed, because they were prohibited coming into town armed. I suppose their arms were left in their camps in the neighborhood.

Q. How did these Indians subsist themselves, and how did they procure ammunition?

A. Probably from the Government here; of this, however, I am not certain.

Q. Did you see any horses, cattle, or other plunder, brought into this place by the Indians?

A. No.

Q. How many Indians were in Pensacola and its neighborhood at the time that Major Youngs attacked a party near this town?

A. Of all descriptions, viz: men, women, and children, there must have been a considerable number; not less, probably, than one hundred and fifty or sixty.

Q. When Major Youngs attacked a party near town, how did those in town find means to escape across the bay?

A. I have understood and believe that they were sent across the bay by order of the Governor.

SANTIAGO DAUPHIN.

A true copy: R. K. CALL, A. D. C.

JOSEPH BONEFI, being duly sworn, declares as follows, viz:

Question. Have you lived in Pensacola since November, 1817?

Answer. I have.

Q. Have you not, between that period and the approach of the American forces under Major General Jackson, repeatedly seen divers parties of hostile Indians in this town or its neighborhood?

A. I have. Indeed, between the said month of November and the time that the hostile party surrendered to Major Youngs, there were more or less in town; sometimes in numbers considerable, sometimes fewer.

Q. How or by whom were those Indians subsisted; and from whom or by what means did they procure ammunition and other warlike stores or weapons?

A. I have understood and do believe that they were fed by the Government here; as to ammunition, &c., I cannot state how they procured supplies, except it might have been from the stores about town.

Q. Have you seen or been informed of any horses, cattle, or other plunder, having been brought in here by the Indians within the time above alluded to?

No. 37 f.

PIERRE SENAC, being solemnly sworn, declares as follows: That he has resided in the town of Pensacola constantly since the month of November last past; that, since that time, and until the arrival of Major Youngs near this town, there were always considerable numbers of hostile Indians in or near the town; that, on many occasions within that period, he has seen from one hundred and fifty to two hundred Indians here; that their forces were regularly provisioned from the King's store here; that he has seen large quantities of sheet lead in the possession of the Indians, and considers it as greatly resembling the lead aprons of cannon; that the Government must have furnished the lead in question, as there were no other means here of getting such lead, and that the said lead was run off into balls, which this deponent saw; that, on the day Maj. Youngs attacked a party of Indians near this town, there were then in town a considerable number more, who were sent across the bay in boats provided for that purpose by the Spanish Governor.

Deponent further states that, about the first of March last past, three considerable parties of hostile Indians—one party under the command of Leon Lesassier, another under the command of Arnaud Gilmer, (both lieutenants in His Catholic Majesty's service,) and the third commanded by an Indian chief—retired out of this town, and went down towards the neighborhood of Barancas, where provisions and ammunition were regularly supplied them by the Spanish Government; that the said Indians were armed with guns which they had received from the English during the late war, and that they remained encamped within from one to three leagues off Barancas for the space of nearly a month; that these Indians, besides being armed with guns, had also tomahawks, which deponent understood and believes were furnished by John Innerarity; and that, when the Government caused the said parties to be thus assembled and equipped, they were collected at Barancas for the purpose, as deponent conceives, of eluding the vigilance of such individuals in Pensacola as would not concur in such measures.

Deponent further states that, since the said month of November last past, he has seen brought to here by the Indians a quantity of cottonade and women's clothing, brought or said to have been brought from the American frontier; that these things were publicly sold in this town, notwithstanding it was notoriously known here that those articles and property had just been taken from those whom the Indians had killed on the American frontier.

JOSE E. CARO, a citizen of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, early in the present year, (1818,) a party of hostile Indians were in Pensacola, their numbers not known, but probably fifty; that, on hearing of the approach of the American army under General Jackson, the Governor of Pensacola furnished those Indians with provision and ammunition, and sent them in public boats across the bay; the deponent saw the rations issued and the party embarked. The deponent further states that, subsequent to this, he saw three parties of hostile Indians furnished with provisions, the ostensible object of which was to enable those Indians to march to the interior and give themselves up, but it was very generally believed that those Indians had no such intention. The deponent saw those Indians set out, and states that they had their arms.

CHARLES BARON, a resident of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, about the latter end of April or beginning of May, 1818, a party of Indians, amounting to near one hundred, were in Pensacola with a quantity of plunder which, it was generally believed, was taken at the time Stoke's family were murdered on the Escambia. The Indians sold this plunder openly to the inhabitants of Pensacola, and the deponent could not learn that the Spanish authorities at Pensacola made any inquiries respecting it. The deponent further states that, at several times in the present year, (1818,) he saw parties of Indians furnished with provisions and ammunition from the King's stores; but he does not recollect the dates of these transactions. The deponent further states that he has frequently heard Spanish officers at Pensacola justify the conduct of the Indians towards the United States, manifesting in their conversation a decided hostility towards the Americans.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Gadsden, March 25, 1818.

SIR: At seven o'clock P. M., on the 9th instant, I reached Fort Scott with the brigade of Georgia militia, nine hundred bayonets strong, and some of the friendly Creeks who had joined me on my march a few days before, where, finding but one quart of corn per man and a few poor cattle, which, added to the live pork I brought along, would give us three days' rations of meat, determined me at once to use this small supply to the best advantage. Accordingly, having been advised by Colonel Gibson, Quartermaster General, that he would sail from New Orleans on the 12th February, with the supplies, and being also advised that two sloops, with provisions, were in the bay, and an officer had been despatched from Fort Scott, in a large keel-boat, to bring up a part of their lading, and deeming that the preservation of those supplies would be to preserve the army, and enable me to prosecute the campaign, I assumed the command on the morning of the 10th, ordered the live stock slaughtered and issued to the troops, with one quart of corn to each man, and the line of march to be taken up at twelve, meridian. Having to cross the Flint river, and it being very high, combined with some neglect in returning the boats during a very dark night, I was unable to move from the opposite bank until nine o'clock on the morning of the 11th, when I took up my line of march down the east bank of the river for this place, touching the river as often as practicable, looking for the provision boat which was ascending, and which I was fortunate enough to meet on the 13th instant, when I ordered an extra ration to the troops, they not having received a full one of meal or flour since their arrival at Fort Early. On that day my patrols captured three prisoners, and found some hidden corn. On the morning of the 14th I ordered the boat down the river to this place, whilst I descended by land, and reached here, without interruption, on the morning of the 16th. The eligibility of this spot as a depot determined me, and I immediately directed my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, of the engineer corps, to furnish a plan for and superintend the erection of a fortification. His talents and indefatigable zeal displayed in the execution of this order induced me to name it Fort Gadsden, to which he is justly entitled.

On my arrival here, I immediately despatched the boat to the bay for the balance of provisions known to be there, and to ascertain whether the flotilla in charge of Colonel Gibson had reached there; and which returned on the 19th, with the unpleasant intelligence that nothing had been heard of the flotilla from New Orleans since it was seen passing Fort Bowyer. I immediately put the troops on half rations, and pushed the completion of the fort for the protection of the provisions; in the event of their arrival, intending to march forthwith to the heart of the enemy, and endeavor to subvert upon him. In the meantime, I despatched Major Fanning, of the corps of artillery, to take another look into the bay; whose return, on the morning of the 23d, brought the information that Colonel Gibson, with one gunboat and three transports, and others in sight, were in the bay. On the same night I received other information that no more had arrived. I am, therefore, apprehensive that some of the smaller vessels have been lost, as one gunboat went to pieces, and another, when last spoken, had one foot water in her hold. All of the vessels had been spoken after the gale which dispersed them. A north and northwest wind has prevailed for six days, but has fortunately changed this morning. I am now awaiting a boat from the bay, (which is expected to-day,) to complete eight days' rations for my troops, upon which I mean to march.

From information received from Pensacola and New Orleans, I have no doubt but that St. Mark's is in possession of the Indians. The Governor of Pensacola informed Captain Call, of the first infantry, (now here,) that the Indians had demanded arms, ammunition, and provisions, or the possession of the garrison of St. Mark's of the commandant, and that he presumed possession would be given from inability to defend it. The Spanish Government is bound by treaty to keep the Indians at peace with us; they have acknowledged their incompetency to do this, and are consequently bound by the law of nature and nations to yield us all facilities to reduce them. Under this consideration, should I be able, I will take possession of the garrison as a depot for my supplies, should it be found in the hands of the Spanish garrison, they having supplied the Indians; but if in the hands of our enemy, I will possess it for the benefit of the United States, as a necessary position for me to hold, to give peace and security to this frontier, and put a final end to Indian warfare in the South.

Finding it very difficult to supply Fort Crawford, on the Conecuh river, by land, I have ordered the supplies for that garrison by water, and written to the Governor of Pensacola that if he interrupts them during the present Indian war, I shall view it as aiding our enemy, and treat it as an act of hostility; and stated to him the propriety, under existing circumstances, of his affording all facilities to put down their own as well as our enemies, and that our Governments, whilst negotiating, can take this subject under consideration; but, in the mean time, our provisions must pass to Fort Crawford without interruption.

In mine of the 14th February, from Hartford, I informed you of the measures adopted to procure supplies, and in my last of the 26th, from Fort Early, I informed you of their situation. To those communications I beg leave to refer you. I have only to add, that I left Fort Early for Fort Scott, and subsisted my troops on ground peas, corn, and some pork, that I could occasionally procure from the Indians, with some pork that I had on foot, the whole subsistence for man and horse not costing five hundred dollars. Of all the supplies purchased for the relief of Fort Scott, and the support of the Georgia militia, not one pound was received until I passed Fort Scott. I said in my last that blame rested somewhere; the cause of those failures will in due time be a subject of investigation, and Colonel Brearly has been arrested on the application of Gen. Gaines.

By some strange fatality, unaccountable to me, the Tennessee volunteers have not yet joined me. They promptly left their homes, and through the inclement weather reached Fort Mitchell, where I had ordered them supplies, and where Colonel Hayne, who led them, met my instructions to pass by Fort Gaines, where he would get a supply of corn that would enable him to reach Fort Scott; but the idea of starvation had stalked abroad; a panic appears to have spread itself everywhere, and he was told that they were starving at Forts Gaines and Scott, and was induced to pass into Georgia for supplies. His men and officers, as reported to me, were willing to risk the worst of consequences on what they had to join me; however, they have been marched from their supplies, to a country stripped of them, when every consideration should have induced his advisers to have urged him on to secure the supplies in the bay, and preserved themselves and Fort Scott from starvation. I have a hope that they will join me before I reach St. Mark's, or the Mickasuky towns; this would be desirable, as the troops ordered from New Orleans to protect the supplies have not reached the bay, and leaving garrisons at Forts Scott and Gadsden weakens my force much, the whole effective strength of the regulars being but three hundred and sixty privates.

In mine of the 26th ultimo, from Fort Early, I informed you that despatches received by General Gaines on the 19th ultimo from the commanding officer at Fort Scott induced him to set out that night for Fort Scott, to prevent its abandonment, &c. In his passage down the Flint river he was shipwrecked, by which he lost his assistant adjutant general, Major C. Wright, and two soldiers, (drowned.) The General reached me six days after, nearly exhausted with hunger and cold, having lost his baggage and clothing, and being compelled to wander in the woods four and a half days without anything to subsist on, or any clothing except a pair of pantaloons. I am happy to have it in my power to say that he is now with me at the head of his brigade in good health.

The great scarcity of subaltern officers in the 4th and 7th regiments of infantry has induced me to appoint several young men (present) as second lieutenants in those regiments, who, from personal knowledge and good recommendations, I have no doubt will prove themselves worthy; and trust the measure will meet the approbation of the President. A list of their names, and the regiments to which they are attached, will be furnished the adjutant and inspector general by my adjutant general. I have the honor to be, &c.

A. JACKSON, Maj. Gen.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN.

P. S.—Since writing the above, I have the pleasure to inform you that the boat from the bay has arrived with provisions, also Colonel Gibson and Captain McKeever of the navy. I shall move to-morrow, having made the necessary arrangements with Captain McKeever for his co-operation in transporting my supplies around to the bay of St. Mark, from which place I shall do myself the honor to communicate to you. Should our enemy attempt to escape with his supplies and booty to the small islands, and from thence to carry on a predatory warfare, the assistance of the navy will prevent his escape. General William McIntosh, commanding the friendly Creeks who had been ordered to reconnoitre the right bank of the Appalachicola, reported to me on the 19th instant that he had captured, without the fire of a gun, one hundred and eighty women and children, and fifty-three warriors of the Red Ground chief's party, with their cattle and supplies; the chief and thirty warriors making their escape on horseback; ten of the warriors, attempting their escape after they had surrendered, were killed by the General.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Montgomery, June 2, 1818.

SIR: The Seminole war having terminated, I deem it politic and advisable to send to Washington John Blunt and his Indian comrades, who have acted as pilots to me during the late campaign. John Blunt is a Tuckabatchee Indian, has long been friendly to the United States, and, in consequence of his opposition to the Red Stick party during the Creek war, has drawn down upon himself their vengeance during the late contest. His settlement being in an exposed situation on the Appalachicola river, he was early attacked by the Seminoles, his property destroyed, and his family rifled from him. Alone he escaped, and fled to Fort Scott, where, joining the American standard, he has proven himself a most zealous friend and faithful pilot to this period. In justice to him, I am bound to state that, to his correct knowledge of the country, and zealous attachment to the cause in which we were engaged, am I measurably indebted for the success of the present campaign.

Mr. Hambly accompanies John Blunt. Mr. Hambly is a Spanish subject by birth, and has long been a resident as a trader on the Appalachicola river. In consequence of his attachment to the American cause, and his active exertions to check the hostile feelings of those Indians disposed to war against the United States, he drew down upon himself and family their vengeance. He was forcibly taken from his home at an early period of the war; his property, goods, and negroes taken from him, and he violently transported from Mickasuky, Suwanee, and St. Mark's, until finally relieved by Captain McKeever, of the American navy. Since which period, he has been attached to my army as Indian interpreter. You will find him an honest and faithful friend to our Government, and valuable for the information which he can afford of Spanish policy and intrigue. He is well acquainted with all the transactions of foreign agents in this country, of their practices, &c., and how far encouraged by the Spanish authorities, &c.

With respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp near St. Mark's, April 8, 1818.

SIR: I wrote you from Fort Gadsden, communicating the embarrassments under which I had labored previous to my arrival at that post, and my determination, being then in a situation to commence active operations, to penetrate immediately into the centre of the Seminole towns. My army marched on the 26th ultimo, and on the 1st of April was reinforced by the friendly Creek warriors under General McIntosh, and a detachment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Colonel Elliott. On the same day, a mile and a half in advance of the Mickasukian villages, a small party of hostile Indians were discovered judiciously located on a point of land projecting into an extensive marshy pond—the position designated, as since understood, for the concentrating of the negro and Indian forces to give us battle. They maintained for a short period a spirited attack from my advanced spy companies, but fled and dispersed in every direction upon coming in contact with my flank columns, and discovering a movement to encircle them. The pursuit was continued through the Mickasukian towns, until night compelled me to encamp my army. The next day detachments were sent out in every direction to reconnoitre the country, secure all supplies found, and reduce to ashes the villages. This duty was executed to my satisfaction; nearly three hundred houses were consumed, and the greatest abundance of corn, cattle, &c. brought in. Every indication of a hostile spirit was found in the habitations of the chiefs; in the council-houses of Kenhegee's town, the king of the Mickasukians, more than fifty fresh scalps were found; and in the centre of the public square, the old Red Stick's standard, a red pole was erected, crowned with scalps, recognised by the hair as torn from the heads of the unfortunate companions of Scott.

As I had reason to believe that a portion of the hostile Indians had fled to St. Mark's, I directed my march towards that fortress. As advised, I found that the Indians and negroes combined had demanded the surrender of that work. The Spanish garrison was too weak to defend it; and there were circumstances reported, producing a strong conviction in my mind that, if not instigated by the Spanish authorities, the Indians had received the means of carrying on the war from that quarter; foreign agents, who have been long practising their intrigues and villainies in this country, had free access into the camp; St. Mark's was necessary as a depot to insure success to my operations. These considerations determined me to occupy it with an American force. An inventory of the Spanish property, munitions of war, &c., has been taken and receipted for, and the commandant and garrison furnished with transportation to Pensacola. My correspondence with the Spanish commandant, the evidences under which I acted, and a detailed account of my operations, will be furnished you as early as practicable. Success depends upon the rapidity of my movements; and to-morrow I shall march for the Suwanee river, the destroying the establishments on which will, in my opinion, put a final close to this savage war. Captain McKeever, of the navy, cruising at my request on this coast, has been fortunate enough in securing Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, the great prophet, and Homathlemico, an old Red Stick. They visited his vessels, under an impression that they were English, from whom, as they stated, supplies of munitions of war, &c., under late promises, were expected. Arbuthnot, a Scotchman, and suspected as one of the instigators of this savage war, was found in St. Mark's; he is in confinement until evidences of guilt can be collected. With respect, &c.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Before St. Mark's, April 6, 1818.

SIR: To chastise a savage foe, who, combined with a lawless band of negro brigands, have, for some time past, been carrying on a cruel and unprovoked war against the citizens of the United States, has compelled the President to direct me to march my army into Florida. I have penetrated to the Mickasuky towns, and reduced them to ashes.

In these towns I found many indications of a hostile spirit. On a red pole, in the centre of the council-house of Kenhegee's town, more than fifty fresh scalps of all ages, from the infant to the aged matron, were found suspended.

In addition to this, upwards of three hundred old scalps were found in the dwellings of the different chiefs settled on the Mickasuky pond. Those barbarians who have escaped death have fled. From information communicated by the Governor of Pensacola to two of my captains, (Gordon and Call,) I was induced to believe that they had fled to St. Mark's for protection. The Governor stated that the Indians and negroes had demanded of you large supplies of munitions of war, with a threat, in the event of a refusal, of taking possession of your fortress. He further expressed an apprehension that, from your defenceless state, they were already in possession of St. Mark's. The wife of Chenubby, a noted chief, now a prisoner in my camp, informed me that the hostile Indians and negroes obtained their supply of ammunition from St. Mark's.

To prevent the recurrence of so gross a violation of neutrality, and to exclude our savage enemies from so strong a hold as St. Mark's, I deemed it expedient to garrison that fortress with American troops until the close of the present war. This measure is justifiable on the immutable principle of self-defence, and cannot but be satisfactory, under existing circumstances, to His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain. Under existing treaties between our two Governments, the King of Spain is bound to preserve in peace, with the citizens of the United States, not only his own subjects, but all Indian tribes residing within his territory. When called upon to fulfil that part of the treaty in relation to a savage tribe who have long depredated, with impunity, on the American frontier, incompetency is alleged, with an acknowledgment that the same tribe have acted in open hostility to the laws, and invaded the rights of His Catholic Majesty. As a mutual enemy, therefore, it is expected that every facility will be afforded by the agents of the King of Spain, to chastise these lawless and inhuman savages. In this light is the possession of St. Mark's by the American forces to be viewed.

I come not as the enemy, but as the friend of Spain. Spanish rights and property will be respected. The property and rights of Spanish subjects will be guaranteed them. An inventory of all public property, munitions of war, &c., shall be made out, and certified by an officer appointed by each of us, and a receipt given for the same, to be accounted for to His Catholic Majesty by the United States. The subject of my possession of the garrison of St. Mark's will be referred to our respective Governments for amicable adjustment. Some armed vessels of the United States are in the bay of St. Mark, with whom I wish to communicate. You will, I trust, furnish me with a small vessel to convey a letter as well as some sick and wounded that are with me. As our mutual savage enemies are concentrating their forces near or on the Suwanee, an early and prompt answer is requested to this letter, with an English translation, as neither myself nor staff are acquainted with the Spanish. This will be handed you by my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant James Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected. I have, &c.

ST. MARK'S OF APPALACHE,

April 7, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Being made to understand, although with the greatest difficulty, the contents of the letter with which your excellency honored me yesterday evening, delivered to me by your aid-de-camp, James Gadsden, I will declare to your excellency the satisfaction the knowledge of your expedition against Mickasuky has afforded me. That such would be the event could not be doubted, on considering the superior talents and skilful conduct of your excellency, and to these must be attributed the success, on which I tender you my most cordial congratulations.

My chief, the Governor of Pensacola, had in truth reason to mention to your captains (Gordon and Call) what your excellency states to me, and to entertain fears for the fate of this fort, menaced by Indians and negroes, for some months past, and particularly since they have been disappointed in their expectations of obtaining powder and ball, which they have so repeatedly solicited, and to which they thought themselves entitled, from the practice which existed of supplying them annually therewith. This proves how entirely unfounded is the assertion of the wife of the chief Chenubby, that the Indians have been supplied with munitions in this fort since I was advised and determined to maintain the most perfect neutrality. No one can better remove from your excellency's mind any unfavorable impressions you may have formed on this subject than the bearer, William Hambly, as he has at various times interpreted to me the solicitations of the several Indian chiefs in my neighborhood; and he can also inform you of the advice I always gave them to avoid the destruction which has overtaken them, and which I foresaw from the beginning.

This being realized, and there being now no motive to fear any insult to the fort from these barbarians and the negroes, I beg permission of your excellency to call your attention to the difficulty I should involve myself in with my Government if I were presently to assent to what your excellency proposes to me—to garrison this fort with the troops of the United States without first receiving its orders. Such I will solicit immediately an opportunity offers, and I do not for a moment doubt that they will be given to me, so zealous is my Government to comply with the stipulations between her and the United States. In the interim, I hope your excellency will desist from your intention, and be firmly persuaded of the good faith and harmony which will reign between this garrison and whatever troops you may think fit to leave in this vicinity, who may assist me in the defence of this fort on any unforeseen event.

The sick your Excellency sent in are lodged in the royal hospital, and I have afforded them every aid which circumstances admit. I hope your Excellency will give me other opportunities of evincing the desire I have to satisfy you. I trust your Excellency will pardon my not answering you as soon as requested, for reasons which have been given you by your aid-de-camp. I do not accompany this with an English translation, as your Excellency desires, because there is no one in the fort capable thereof; but the before-named Wm. Hambly proposes to translate it to your Excellency in the best manner he can.

May our Lord preserve your Excellency many years, such is my prayer. Most excellent sir, I kiss your Excellency's hands. Your most devoted and obedient servant.

HEADQUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp near St. Mark's, April 7, 1818.

SIR: I refer you to my communication of yesterday for the motives which have compelled me to occupy the fort of St. Mark. I again repeat that I have entered the territory of Spain as a friend, to chastise a mutual enemy of both nations, and whom His Catholic Majesty was bound, under the most sacred of treaties, to have punished himself. Peculiar circumstances, however, have prevented, and it was therefore expected that every facility would have been given to the American arms to have insured success to their operations. The occupation of St. Mark's is essential to the accomplishment of my campaign, and is peculiarly so at this period, when evidence is derived from every source of the designs of the negroes and Indians against that fortress. They are now concentrating with the intention of taking possession of St. Mark's the moment my army moves from its vicinity; the dislodging them from which will cost me more American blood than I am disposed should be shed. Success to my operations requires despatch; you will excuse me, therefore, in refusing your request that a suspension should be granted until a permit is obtained from your Government, and in insisting that St. Mark's should be immediately occupied by American troops.

Major Fanning, my inspector general, and Lieutenant Simmons, of the ordnance department, are appointed to act with one or two officers nominated on your part, to take an inventory of and inspect all public property in the fort of St. Mark, for which receipts will be given in the name of the American Government.

Any disposition which you would wish made with the private property of yourself, officers, and soldiers, or any other arrangements gratifying to yourself, will be settled by my aids de-camp, Lieutenants Gadsden and Glassell.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp near St. Mark's, April 7, 1818.

SIR: I have received your protest against my proceedings. The occupancy of Fort St. Mark's by my troops previous to your assenting to the measure became necessary from the difficulties thrown in the way of an amicable adjustment, notwithstanding my assurances that every arrangement should be made to your satisfaction, and expressing a wish that my movements against our common enemy should not be retarded by a tedious negotiation. I again repeat what has been reiterated to you through my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, that your personal rights and private property shall be respected, that your situation shall be made as comfortable as practicable while compelled to remain in Fort St. Mark's, and that transports shall be furnished as soon as they can be obtained to convey yourself, family, and command to Pensacola.

I daily expect some vessels from the Bay of Appalachicola; as soon as they arrive, the most suitable shall be selected for said purpose.

APPALACHICOLA, April 7, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I should insist on what I stated to your excellency in my letter of this morning, as to the necessity of awaiting orders from the Governor of Pensacola for the delivery of the fort under my command, were I not, in addition to what your excellency says in your answer, threatened by your aid-de-camp and the officers appointed to negotiate on the subject, and had not so large a body of troops entered without awaiting my permission, and taken possession of all the stores and posts, lowering the Spanish flag, and hoisting the American. So manifest a violation of the territory of His Catholic Majesty obliges me to complain of it, and to protest against it; and I accordingly do protest it, and beg of your excellency to provide, as speedily as possible, the vessels necessary to transport me to Pensacola, together with the troops and those persons who are in the royal employ; and also to give orders that, in the interim, the private property and effects of every Spanish individual here be respected. With respect to the public property of His Catholic Majesty, I have nominated the subaltern of the detachment and commissary of the fort to make, with three officers whom you name to me, an inventory thereof.

I repeat to your excellency my respects, and pray to God to preserve your life many years.

Most excellent sir, I kiss your excellency's hands. Your most obedient and devoted servant,

F. CASO Y LUENGO.

W. Hambly's certificate, July 24, 1818.

I do hereby certify that, during my long residence on the river Appalachicola, my knowledge of the Indian language, and my intimate acquaintance with the different chiefs, gave me many opportunities of knowing through them the advice given them, from time to time, by the Governors of West Florida hostile to the United States. In the year 1812 or 1813, I saw a letter from the Governor of Pensacola to the late chief of the Seminoles, Thomas Perryman, advising him to collect his forces and join his Upper Town brethren, who he said had come to a determination to rise in arms and shake off the American yoke; he would supply their arms and ammunition; and he said he was sure that, in less than a month, their fathers and protectors, the Spaniards, would have a sufficient army in the field to aid and protect them. Not long after I saw this letter, a large party of Indians went down to Pensacola, where they received a large supply of ammunition and some arms. It was but shortly after this when they attacked and destroyed the garrison of Fort Mimms; this was the commencement of the first Indian war. On the 13th of December last, when on my plantation on the Appalachicola, I was made a prisoner by a party of Seminole Indians, and was taken up to the Ocheehee bluffs in company with Mr. Doyle, who was made a prisoner with me; they kept us there three days, during which time they were busily engaged with some transports which were then ascending the river to Fort Scott; from thence they took us to the Mickasuky, where the Indians informed me that they had been told by the commandant of St. Mark's that war was declared between Spain and the United States. From this place we were carried to the Suwanee, where Kenhagee, principal chief of the Seminoles, told me that we had been taken and robbed by order of Arbuthnot; and brought there to be tried by him; shortly after we reached this, Arbuthnot arrived from Providence, when we were tried and sentenced by said Arbuthnot to be tortured; this sentence was not put in execution by the friendly interference of Mr. Cook, clerk to Arbuthnot, and the negro chief Nero; we were then conducted back to the Mickasuky; then Kenhagee went down to the Fort St. Mark's to consult the commandant if he would take us as prisoners to keep at his order; they held a council among the neighboring chiefs, and on the fifth day he returned, and ordered us to be conducted down next morning; we arrived at St. Mark's on the 12th February, at night; the Spanish officers received us kindly, but the commandant did not forget to remind us that we were still prisoners, and marked out that night the limits of our prison, which he rigidly kept during the time of our stay.

Next morning, the first thing that presented itself to my view was my saddle-horse which had been taken from me by the Indians; he was in the possession of the commissary. I mentioned it to the commandant, but he said that he bought him of an Indian, and he could do nothing in it. A few days after, in the course of conversation, I mentioned it to the Spanish doctor; he assured me that two-thirds of the property taken from us by the Indians had been bought by them and others in the fort. The plundered property from Georgia was every day briskly bought by the commandant and others. I know one instance of an Indian making an engagement with the commandant for cattle that he was going then to plunder, and in fourteen or fifteen days brought them in and sold them. On our first arrival at St. Mark's, we had, by help of a friendly Indian, conveyed intelligence to our friends in Pensacola of our situation, and they sent us on a small vessel to effect our escape; on her arrival, the commandant said to us that he had no objection to our getting out of the power of the Indians, but that he should first demand a written obligation that we should never return to that country, nor hold any communication, direct or indirect, with the United States Government, or any of her officers. This being settled, we left St. Mark's on the night of the 28th of March, and joined Captain McKeever, in his gunboats, in the bay of Appalachicola; on the 30th returned with him to St. Mark's, where we found General Jackson, on the 6th of April. Given under my hand the 24th July.

FORT GADSDEN, May 2, 1818.

Sir: We beg leave to submit to you the following facts:

On the 13th of December, 1817, we were violently torn from our settlement on the Appalachicola river, by a number of Indians, headed by Chenubby, a chief of the Fowl Town tribe, carried to Mickasuky, and delivered to Kenhagee, King of the Mickasukians. Kenhagee carried us to the negro towns on the Suwanee, and thence to the Spanish fort, St. Mark's, to the commandant of which he delivered us as prisoners of war, captured under the orders of a Mr. Arbuthnot, reported to us as a British agent. At St. Mark's we were treated as prisoners, and not permitted to wander beyond the walls of the garrison. While at that post, the ingress and egress of Indians hostile to the United States were unrestrained, and several councils were held, at one of which, Kenhagee, King of the Mickasukians, Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, Hamathlemico, the chief of Kolemies, all of the old Red Stick party, and Jack Mealy, chief of the Ochewas, were present. When it was reported that these chiefs and their warriors were entering Fort St. Mark's for the purpose of holding a council, Hambly represented to the commandant the impropriety of permitting such proceedings within the walls of a Spanish fortress, the officer of which was bound to preserve and enforce the treaties existing between the King of Spain and the United States. He replied to Hambly with some degree of warmth, observing that it was not in his power to prevent it. On the Indians coming into the fort, at their request we were confined. The council was held in the commandant's quarters. He, the commandant, was present, but strictly forbade the intrusion of any of the officers of the garrison. The Indians were in the habit of driving to Fort St. Mark's, and disposing of cattle to the commandant and other Spanish officers. While at that post, three or four droves were brought in, acknowledged by the Indians to have been stolen from the citizens of the United States, and purchased by the Spanish officers. We were present at most of these contracts, and Hambly was often referred to as an interpreter between the purchaser and seller. Chenubby, a Fowl Town Indian, once applied to Hambly to mention to the commandant that he was about visiting the frontiers of Georgia on a plundering expedition, and wished to know whether he would purchase the cattle brought in. A contract was entered into, and Chenubby, some time after, brought in and disposed of eleven head of cattle to the Spanish commandant of Fort St. Mark's. These same cattle were those purchased by you from the commandant as his private property.

FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

Sir: In conversation with the commandant of Fort St. Mark's, on the subject of having that work occupied by an American garrison, I had occasion to notice the aid and comfort the hostile party of Indians had received, as reported from him; that they had free access within the walls of his fort; and that it was well known no small supplies of ammunition had been received from that quarter. In reply, he stated that his conduct had been governed by policy: the defenceless state of his works, and the weakness of his garrison, compelled him to conciliate the friendship of the Indians, to supply their wants, to grant what he had not the power to deny, and to throw open, with apparent willingness, the gates of his fortress, lest they should be forced by violence; that he had been repeatedly threatened by Indians and negroes; and that his security depended upon exhibiting an external friendship. After Fort St. Mark's was occupied by the American troops, a black man and Spanish soldier was reported to me as having been arrested, clad in American uniform, recognised as part of the clothing of the 4th and 7th regiments, captured in the boat commanded by Lieutenant Scott, in ascending the Appalachicola river.

In explanation, the Spanish commandant observed that his soldiers and the Seminole Indians were in the habit of trading with each other, and that this negro, with others of his garrison, had received his permission to purchase some clothing reported to have been brought in by the Indians. Respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. GADSDEN, Aid-de-camp.

Major Twiggs to General Jackson,

FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

Sir: After the occupancy of Fort St. Mark's with American troops, on the 7th of April last, it became my duty to take charge of some goods found in one of the public stores.

These goods were pointed out by the Spanish commandant, who, through Mr. Hambly as interpreter, separated several of the articles claimed as his own private property, and designated others as the property of Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, and Arbuthnot, a British agent or trader. An inventory of these was taken, and deposited with the American officer left in command of Fort St. Mark's. With respect, &c.

D. E. TWIGGS,

I certify that I acted as interpreter in the transaction above alluded to, and that two separate parcels of goods were designated by the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's as belonging to Hillis Hadjo and Arbuthnot.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that, at the capture of Fort St. Mark's, East Florida, by Major General A. Jackson, on the 7th of April, 1818, there were some cattle purchased on account of the United States, and turned over to us, which we are of opinion had been driven from the frontiers of Georgia, (a part of them at least;) and we were strengthened in our opinion by a number of officers and men from Georgia offering to swear to a number of them as the property of their neighbors and friends.

A. Arbuthnot to Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls.

NASSAU, N. P., August 26, 1817.

Sir: I am especially authorized to address you by the chiefs of the Creek nation whose names I affix to the present.

They desire it to be made known that they have implicitly followed our advice in living friendly with the Americans who were their neighbors, and nowise attempted to molest them, though they have seen the Americans encroach on their territory, burning their towns, and making fields where their houses stood; rather than make resistance, they have retired lower in the peninsula. The town of Ecan Halloway, on the Chatahoochee, where Otomisco was chief, is one instance of the encroachments of the Americans. This town is situated under the guns of Fort Gaines, and Mico was desired to submit to the Americans, or his town would be blown to atoms. Rather than do this he retired, is now living in the lower nation, and his fields, where the town stood, are ploughed up by the Americans. They complain of the English Government neglecting them, after having drawn them into a war with America; that the promise made them of sending people to reside among them has not been kept; and if they have not some person or persons to reside in the nation to watch over their interests, they will soon be driven to the extremity of the peninsula. You left Mr. Hambly to watch over the interests of the Creek nation, but you had hardly left the nation when he turned traitor, and was led by Forbes to take the part of the Americans. His letter (No. 47 b.) to me, of which I annex a copy, will show you what lengths he would go if he had the means. It is Hambly and Doyle who gave the Indians all the trouble they experience. They send their emissaries among the Lower Creeks, and make them believe that the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are coming down on them. They send to the Cowetas, and report that the lower nation is arming against them. Thus both are put in fear, and their fields are neglected, and hunting is not thought of. I have endeavored to do away this fear, by writing to the chiefs of Coweta town that they ought to live on friendly terms with their brethren of the lower nation, whose wish it was to be on good terms with them, and not to listen to any bad talks, but to chase those that give them from among them. My letter was answered by them rather favorably; and I hope the talk that was sent to the Big Warrior last June will heal the differences between them.

Hillis Hadjo arrived in my schooner at Ochlochnee Sound last June, and was well received by all the chiefs and others who came to welcome him home. In consequence of his arrival, a talk was held, the substance of which I put on paper for them, and it was sent, with a pipe of peace, to the other nations.

Hillis Hadjo wished to return to Nassau with me, but I prevailed on him to stay with the nation and keep them all at peace.

I am desired to return Hillis Hadjo's warmest acknowledgments for the very handsome manner in which you treated him in England; and he begs his prayers may be laid at the foot of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent. I left him and all his family well on the 20th of June.

Old Cappachimico desired me to send you his best respects, and requests you will send him out some people to live among them, and all the land they took from Forbes shall be theirs. At all events, they must have an agent among them, to see that the Americans adhere to the treaty, and permit them to live unmolested on their own land. This agent should be authorized by His Majesty's Government, or he will not be attended to by the Americans.

In the gazettes of Georgia, the Americans report that the Seminole Indians are continually committing murders on their borders, and making incursions into the State. These are publications tending to irritate the American Government against the poor Indians; for, during the time I was in the nation, there was only one American killed; and he, with two others, was in the act of driving off cattle belonging to Boleck, chief of Suwanee; whereas, three men and a boy were killed last June, by a party of cattle-stealers, while in their hunting-camps; the boy they scalped; and one of Boleck's headmen was killed on St. John's river in July. The backwoods Georgians, and those resident on the borders of the Indian nation are continually entering it and driving off cattle. They have in some instances made settlements, and particularly on the Choctawhatchy river, where a considerable number have descended.

cans were to give up to the Indians all the lands that may have been taken during the war, and place them on the same footing they were in Choctawhatchy in 1811. It appears that they have not done so; that Fort Gaines, on the Chatahoochee river, and Camp Crawford, on the Flint river, are both on Indian territory that was not in possession of the Americans in 1811.

They are fearful that, before any aid is given them by the English Government, they will no longer be in possession of any territory. I wrote last January to his excellency the Hon. Charles Bagot, representing the encroachments of the Americans, (as I was informed, by the copy of a letter from the Right Hon. Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that His Majesty's ambassadors had received orders to watch over the interests of the Indians.) Since my return here, I have received from Mr. Moodie, of Charleston, an extract of a letter from the Hon. Charles Bagot, that the expense of postage is so considerable that any further communications of the same nature must be sent him by private hands. Now, sir, as no person goes direct from this to Washington, how am I to be able to comply with this desire? Thus, he will be kept ignorant of the real situation of the poor Indians, and the encroachments made on their lands by American settlers, while we may be told by the American Government that no encroachments have been made, and that the forts they still hold are necessary to check the unruly Seminoles. Thus, the persons appointed to watch over the poor Indians have no other means of information than from the parties interested in their destruction; and, from seeing, from time to time, in the American gazettes, accounts of cruel murders, &c., committed by the Indians on the frontier settlers of the United States, he apprehends the Indians merit all the Americans do to them. But let His Majesty's Government appoint an agent with full powers, and to correspond with His Majesty's ambassador at Washington, and his eyes will then be open as to the motives that influence American individuals, as well as the Government, in vilifying the Indians.

The powers given me and the instructions were to memorialize His Majesty's Government, as well as the Governor General of Havana; but if you will be pleased to lay this letter before His Majesty's Secretary of State, it will save the necessity of the first, and I fear that a memorial to the Governor General would be of no use. Referring you to the enclosed, (No. 47 b,) I remain, most respectfully, your obedient servant.

SIR AND FRIEND: Affairs having assumed a serious aspect between the savages and the Americans, and not doubting that the storm will pass this way, I entertain apprehensions for the safety of your little objects, and believe it to be your interest not to lose a moment in removing them from hence.

I shall be happy to see you, that I may have the pleasure of embracing you, and an opportunity of conversing with you on the politics of the day; which, under existing circumstances, it is improper to commit to paper. In the expectation of this pleasure, I am, with my little family,

Minutes of the proceedings of a special court, organized agreeably to the following order, viz:

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adj't Gen.'s Office, Ft. St. Mark's,
April 26, 1818.

GENERAL ORDER.

The following detail will compose a special court, to convene at this post, at the hour of 12 M., for the purpose of investigating the charges exhibited against A. Arbuthnot, Robert Christie Ambrister, and such others who are similarly situated, as may be brought before it:

The court will record all the documents and testimony in the several cases, and their opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoners; and what punishment, if any, should be inflicted.

DETAIL.

Major General E. P. Gaines, president.

Members.

Colonel King, 4th infantry.
Colonel Williamson, Tennessee volunteers.
Lieutenant Col. Gibson, Tennessee volunteers.
Major Muhlenberg, 4th infantry.
Major Montgomery, 7th infantry.
Captain Vashon, 7th infantry.
Colonel Dyer, Tennessee volunteers.
Lieutenant Colonel Lindsay, corps artillery.

Lieut. J. M. Glassell, 4th infantry, recorder.

An orderly will be detailed from Gen. Gaines's brigade; and the court will sit without regard to hours.

By order of Maj. Gen. JACKSON:
ROBERT BUTLER,
Adjutant General.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 26, 1818.

The court convened, pursuant to the foregoing order; when, being duly sworn in the presence of the prisoner, and he being asked if he had any objections to any member thereof, and replying in the negative, the following charges and specifications were read, viz:

Charges against A. Arbuthnot, now in custody, and who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens, he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

Specification. That the said A. Arbuthnot, between the months of May and July, or some time in June, 1817, wrote a letter to the Little Prince, exhorting and advising him not to comply with the treaty of Fort Jackson, stating that the citizens of the United States were infringing on the Treaty of Ghent, as he believed, without the knowledge of the Chief Magistrate of the United States, and advising the Upper and Lower Creeks to unite and be friendly, stating that William Hambly was the cause of their disputes; also advising the Little Prince to write to the Governor of New Providence, who would write to His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, through whom the United States would be called to a compliance with the Treaty of Ghent, and advising them not to give up their lands under the Treaty of Fort Jackson, for that the American citizens would be compelled to give up to them all their lands under the Treaty of Ghent.

CHARGE 2. Acting as a spy, and aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war.

Specification 1. In writing a letter from St. Mark's fort, dated April 2, 1818, to his son John, at Suwanee, (marked A,) detailing the advance of the army under General Jackson, stating their force, probable movements, and intentions, to be communicated to Bowlegs, the chief of the Suwanee towns, for his government.

Relations with Spain.

Specification 2. In writing the letters marked B, without date, and C, with enclosures, Jan. 27, 1818; and D, called "a note of Indian talks;" and E, without date, applying to the British Government, through Governor Cameron, for munitions of war and assistance for our enemies; making false representations, and also applying to Mr. Bagot, British Ambassador, for his interference, with a statement, on the back of one of the letters, of munitions of war for the enemy.

CHARGE 3. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, and causing their arrest, with a view to their condemnation to death, and the seizure of their property, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain, the United States, and the Indians, they being citizens of the Spanish Government.

Specification 1. In writing the letters marked F, dated August 26, 1817; G, dated May 13, 1817; and H, threatening them with death, alleging against them false and infamous charges, and using every means in his power to procure their arrest; all which writings and sayings excited, and had a tendency to excite, the Indians and negroes to acts of hostility with the United States.

By order of the court:

J. M. GLASSELL,
Recorder.

To which charges and specifications the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The prisoner having made application for counsel, it was granted him, when the court proceeded to the examination of the evidence.

JOHN WINSLETT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that some time before last July the Little Prince received a letter, signed by a Mr. Arbuthnot, advising the upper part of the nation to unite with the lower chiefs in amity, and stating that the best mode for them to repossess themselves of their lands would be to write to him, (Arbuthnot,) and he would send on their complaints to the Governor of Providence, whence it would be forwarded to His Britannic Majesty, and he would have the terms of the Treaty of Ghent attended to; he, moreover, stated his belief that the encroachments on the Indian lands were unknown to the President of the United States. The witness also identified the signature of the letter of the prisoner to his son, marked A, referred to in the first specification to the second charge, and heretofore noted as being the same with that sent to the Little Prince.

The witness, on being further interrogated, stated the language of the letter alluded to to be, that the British Government, on application, would cause to be restored to them their lands they held in 1811, agreeably to the terms of the Treaty of Ghent.

Question by the prisoner. Who is the Little Prince, or is he known by any other name?

Answer. He is known by the name of Tustenuggee Hopoy, and is the second chief of the nation.

Question. Where is the letter you allude to, or in whose possession?

Answer. It was left in the possession of the Little Prince when I last saw it.

Question. Has this Little Prince no other name than what you state?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question. Do you swear that the letter alluded to was addressed to the Little Prince?

Answer. I do not. It was presented to me by the Little Prince to read and interpret for him, which I did.

Question. Are you certain that the letter stated that the Chief Magistrate of the United States could have had no knowledge of settlements made on Indian land, or injuries committed?

Answer. The letter stated that to be the belief of the writer.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, with regard to the first specification of the second charge, that, being at Suwanee, in the town, about the 6th or 7th of April, he was awakened early in the morning by Mr. Ambrister's receiving, by the hands of a negro, who got it from an Indian, a letter from St. Marks, at that time stated by Ambrister to be from the prisoner.

Question by the prisoner. Did you see that letter, or hear it read?

Answer. I did see the paper, but I did not hear it read.

Question by the prisoner. Did you state that the letter was received by an Indian express?

Answer. So the black man that delivered it said.

A question being raised by a member of the court as to their jurisdiction on the third charge, and its specification, the doors were closed, and, after mature deliberation, they decided that this court is incompetent to take cognizance of the offences alleged in that charge and specification.

PETER B. COOK, a former clerk to the prisoner, and a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, about December or January last, the prisoner had a large quantity of powder and lead brought to Suwanee in his vessel, which he sold to the Indians and negroes; that subsequent to that time, which he cannot recollect, Ambrister brought for the prisoner in his (the prisoner's) vessel nine kegs of powder, and a large quantity of lead, which were taken possession of by the negroes. The witness also identified the letters referred to in the foregoing charges and specifications, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H; also, the power of attorney, No. 1, granted by the Indians to A. Arbuthnot, being the prisoner's handwriting.

Question by the court. Have you at any time within the last twelve months heard any conversation between the prisoner and the chief called Bowlegs relating to the war between the United States and the Seminoles?

Answer. I heard the prisoner tell Bowlegs that he had sent letters to the Prince Regent, and expected soon to have an answer. Some time afterwards, some of the negroes doubted his carrying those letters, when the prisoner stated that he had, but, the distance being great, it would take some time to receive an answer.

By the court. State to the court when and where you first saw the letter signed A. Arbuthnot, dated April 2, 1818, referred to in the first specification of the second charge.

Answer. About the 6th of April, a black man, who said he had received it from an Indian gave it to Mr. Ambrister, whom I saw reading it.

Question by the court. Do you know by what means that letter was conveyed to Suwanee?

Answer. I understood by an Indian who was sent from Fort St. Mark's.

Question by the court. Who paid the Indian for carrying the letter referred to in the last interrogatory?

Answer. I do not know.

Question by the court. What steps were taken by the negroes and Indians on the receipt of the letter?

Answer. They at first believed the bearer an enemy, and confined him, but, learning the contrary, began to prepare for the enemy, and the removal of their families and effects across the river; the Indians lived on the opposite side.

Question by the court. Did the Indians and negroes act together in the performance of military duty?

Answer. No; but they always said they would fight together.

Question by the court. Did not Nero command the blacks, and did not Bowlegs own Nero, and was not the latter under the immediate command of Bowlegs?

Answer. Nero commanded the blacks, and was owned and commanded by Bowlegs; but there were some negro captains who obeyed none but Nero.

Question by the court. What vessel brought to Suwanee the ammunition which you said was sold by the prisoner to the Indians and negroes?

Answer. The schooner Chance, now lying at the wharf; she is a foretopsail vessel belonging to the prisoner.

The witness also identified the manuscript of the prisoner in a paper granting him full power to act in all cases for the Indians, numbered 1; and, also, a letter, without signature, to the Governor of St. Augustine, numbered 2; further, a letter, without date, to Mr. Mitchell, Indian agent, numbered 3; and an unsigned petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron, praying his aid in men and munitions of war, numbered 4; all of which the witness stated to be in the handwriting of the prisoner.

The court then adjourned to meet to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

The court convened pursuant to adjournment. Present: Major General E. P. GAINES, President.

Members:

Colonel King.

Lieut. Colonel Gibson,

Colonel Williamson, Major Muhlenberg,
Major Montgomery, Lieut. Col. Elliott,
Captain Vashon, Major Fanning,
Colonel Dyer, Major Minton,
Lieut. Col. Lindsay, Captain Crittenden.

Lieutenant J. M. Glassell, Recorder.

When the further examination of the witness, PETER B. COOK, took place, viz:

Question by the prisoner. How long have you been acquainted with the settlement on the Suwanee?

Answer. Between six and seven months.

Question. For what term of years did you engage to live with the prisoner?

Answer. For no stated period: I was taken by the year.

Question. Were you not discharged by the prisoner from his employ?

Answer. He told me he had no further use for me after I had written the letters to Providence.

Question. Where did you stay after you were discharged?

Answer. I staid in a small house belonging to a boy called St. John, under the protection of Nero.

Question. What was the subject-matter of the letters you wrote to Providence?

Answer. After being refused by the prisoner a small venture to Providence, I wrote to my friends for the means to trade by myself.

Question. Do you believe the prisoner had knowledge of the venture being on board the schooner?

Answer. I do not believe he had; it was small and in my trunk.

Question. Do you know that Ambrister was the agent of the prisoner?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you think that the powder and lead shipped would more than supply the Indians and negro hunters?

Answer. I did not see the powder and lead myself, but was told by Bowlegs that he had a great quantity; he had three kegs, keeping to fight with.

Question. Did the Indians reside on the east side of the river?

Answer. They did.

Question. You were asked of the negroes and Indians, when the letter marked A was communicated, if they did not take up arms; had they received information of the defeat of the Indians at Mickasuky prior to this date?

Answer. It was afterwards, I believe, that they received the information.

Question. Did not Bowlegs keep other powder than that got from the prisoner?

Answer. He had some he got from the Bluff, which was nearly done; he said his hunters were always bothering him about powder.

Question. Did you state that, at the time Ambrister ascended the river, there was no other vessel at the mouth of the river?

Answer. There was none other there; there was one had sailed.

Question. There is a letter (A) spoken of; how do you know that the son of the prisoner had that letter in his possession?

Relations with Spain.

Answer. I saw him with it, which he dropped, and a boy called John picked it up and gave it to me.

Question. You stated that the Indians and negroes doubted the fidelity of the prisoner in sending letters to the Prince Regent; do you think that the prisoner would have been punished by them had he not complied with their wishes?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Do you believe that the prisoner was compelled to write the Indian communications?

Answer. He was not compelled.

WILLIAM HAMBLY, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, and commencing a statement of what he heard the chiefs say, and the prisoner objecting to hearsay evidence of that kind, the court was cleared, in order to take the question; when it was decided that the prisoner's objection was not valid. The witness was, therefore, recalled, and stated that, fifteen or twenty days after the prisoner's arrival at Ochlochnee, the Seminole Indians began to steal horses from the United States settlements, and commit murders on the Satilla river, which, he was informed by them, was at the instigation of the prisoner.

The chiefs of the little villages in the witness's neighborhood then desired him to write a few lines to the prisoner, stating those reports, and that he did not know that those Indians he was exciting had long been outlawed, and cautioned him against such proceedings, or he might be involved in their ruin. This the witness did, when the prisoner wrote him a long and insulting letter, (which was lost,) upbraiding the witness for calling those Indians outlaws, and accusing him of exciting the Indians to cruel war. The witness was told by all the chiefs and Indians who had seen the prisoner that he advised them to go to war with the United States if they did not surrender the lands which had been taken from them, and that the British Government would support them in it.

The Indians who took the witness and a Mr. Doyle prisoners, which happened on the thirteenth day of December last, told them it was by the prisoner's order; and on their arrival at Mickasuky, (as prisoners,) Kenhagee, and all his chiefs, told them it was by the prisoner's orders they were taken and robbed. On their arrival at Suwanee, they were told by the Indian and negro chiefs, who sat in council over them, that the prisoner had advised that he should be given up to five or six Choctaw Indians, who were saved from the negro fort, who would revenge themselves for the loss of their friends at that place. On their return from Suwanee, the chief Kenhagee told them that he had got the prisoner to write several letters for him; one to the Governor of Providence, one to the British Minister at Washington, one to the Secretary of State in London, and one to the American agent for Indian affairs, protesting against the proceedings of the commanding officer at Fort Scott.

While the witness was at Suwanee, the Indian chief told him that the prisoner had arrived at that place with ten kegs of powder on board of his vessel; and, while in Fort St. Mark's, sometime in March, Hillis Hadjo, or Francis, brought an order from the prisoner to the commandant for two kegs of powder, with other articles, which were in his possession.

Question by the court. Were any murders or depredations committed on the white settlements by the Indians previous to the prisoner's arrival at Ochlochnee?

Answer. None, except one murder near Fort Gaines, which was before or about the time of the prisoner's arrival.

Question. How long have you resided among the Indians? State to the court whether you are acquainted with the Indian language, and how long since you learned it?

Answer. I have resided among them fourteen years, and have understood their language twelve years.

Question. Do you believe the Seminoles would have commenced the business of murder and depredation on the white settlements had it not been at the instigation of the prisoner, and a promise, on his part, of British protection?

Answer. I do not believe they would without being assured of British protection.

Question. What was the light in which the prisoner was viewed by the hostile Seminoles; was it that of an authorized agent of the British Government?

Answer. The different chiefs always represented him to me as such.

The witness recognised the letter marked G, and signed A. Arbuthnot, as being a copy of the one alluded to in his testimony as lost.

Question by the president. Are you acquainted with the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. I have seen it, but cannot say I am acquainted with it.

Question. Is that which you have just seen, and say is the copy of the one you lost, the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. It looks to be his handwriting, but I cannot say positively.

Question. Was the prisoner considered as the agent of the Seminoles at the time those murders were committed?

Answer. I had not seen the prisoner at that time; the Indian chiefs told me that the prisoner had reported himself to them as an English agent.

Question. Where did you understand the prisoner to be when you were taken prisoner?

Answer. The Indians told us that he had gone over to Providence, but was expected back by the time we should arrive at Suwanee.

Question. Did you not request Kenhagee to prevail upon the prisoner to give you a passage in his schooner to Providence?

Answer. Yes; but was told that the prisoner refused it, stating that, if we were forced upon him, he would blindfold us, and make us walk overboard.

Question. What were the reasons given by

Relations with Spain.

Kenhagee for the prisoner's not granting your request?

Answer. Kenhagee stated that the prisoner was fearful of meeting with an American vessel, when we should be taken out, and he thereby lose his schooner.

EDMUND DOYLE, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, was questioned as follows:

Question by the judge advocate. Do you know anything that would tend to substantiate the charges against the prisoner now before you?

Answer. I know nothing but from common report.

WILLIAM S. FULTON, an evidence on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, testified to the copy of a letter from A. Arbuthnot to General Mitchell, agent for Indian affairs, dated Suwanee, January 19, 1818, and marked No. 6, as acknowledged by the prisoner to be the same, in substance, as one written by himself at that time; an extract from that letter was then read to the court.

Question by the president. Where did the prisoner acknowledge the letter just read to be a copy of the one written by himself?

Answer. In the encampment before this place, about the 6th or 7th instant.

Question. Was not the acknowledgment made when he was a prisoner?

Answer. It was.

Question by the president. Did you hear a gentleman say to the prisoner, whilst in custody, that those who recommended the scalping-knife and tomahawk should feel their keenest edge?

Answer. I did hear a gentleman say that those who excited the Indians to the murder of the unoffending should feel the keenest edge of the scalping-knife; but, as well as I recollect, that observation was not made until after the repeated acknowledgments of the prisoner of having written the letter.

Question by the court. Was not the confession of the prisoner to this letter made voluntarily, and without any constraint whatever?

Answer. I conceive it was.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution being closed, the prisoner requested, as a witness, Robert C. Ambrister as one of his witnesses, against whom criminal charges had been filed, and was in custody on account thereof; to which the judge advocate objecting, the court was cleared to take its sense, when it was decided that Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody for similar offences with the prisoner, cannot be examined as evidence before the court.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a previous witness, now on the part of the prisoner, being again sworn, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Was there any other vessel at the mouth of the Suwanee river when Ambrister seized your schooner?

Answer. Yes.

Question. What vessel was it? Was it not the vessel which Ambrister came in?

Answer. It was a sloop, and I understand Ambrister came in her.

Question. Did Ambrister ever mention to you who recommended him to seize the prisoner's schooner, or who assisted him in stimulating the negroes to do so?

Answer. No; I understood he came on board of his own accord.

Question by the court. Have you, since you commanded the prisoner's vessel, ever brought any arms to that part of the country?

Answer. No; I brought a quantity of lead and ten kegs of powder in the last trip.

JOHN WINSLETT, a former witness on the part of the prosecution, being recalled on behalf of the prisoner, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Are you not of opinion that the letter which you say was written by the prisoner to the Little Prince is now in the possession of the Little Prince?

Answer. After reading it, I returned it to him, and I believe it to be still in his possession, as Indians seldom destroy papers of that kind.

The prisoner requesting some time to make up his defence, he was given until to-morrow evening, at four o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818,
Four o'clock P. M.

The recorder having read over the proceedings of the court with closed doors, the prisoner was recalled into court, and made the defence marked K, and attached to these proceedings. The doors were then closed, and, after the most mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, the court find the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, guilty of the first specification to the first charge, and guilty of the first charge; guilty of the first and second specifications to the second charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" they, therefore, do, on the most mature reflection, sentence the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, to be suspended by the neck until he is dead; two-thirds of the court concurring therein.

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major General, Pres. of the Court.
J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

From A. Arbuthnot to his son, John Arbuthnot.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 2, 1818, nine o'clock in the morning.

DEAR JOHN: As I am ill able to write a long letter, it is necessary to be brief. Before my arrival here, the commandant had received an express from the Governor of Pensacola, informing him of a large embarkation of troops, &c, under the immediate command of General Jackson; and the boat that brought the despatch reckoned eighteen sail of vessels off Appalachicola. By a deserter that was brought here by the Indians, the commandant was informed that three thousand men, under the orders of General Jackson, one thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse, under General Gaines, and five hundred under another General, were at Prospect Bluff, where they are rebuilding the burnt fort; that one thousand Indians, of different nations, were at Spanish Bluff, building another fort under the direction of American officers; that, so soon as these forts were built, they intended to march—they have commenced. Yesterday morning advice was received that they had appeared near—and taken two of the sons of McQueen and an Indian. Late in the afternoon three schooners came to anchor at the mouth of the river, and this morning the American flag is seen flying on the largest.

I am blockaded here; no Indians will come with me; and I am now suffering from the fatigue of coming here alone.

The main drift of the Americans is to destroy the black population of Suwanee. Tell my friend Boleck that it is throwing away his people to attempt to resist such a powerful force as will be down on Suwanee; and, as the troops advance by land, so will the vessels by sea. Endeavor to get all the goods over the river in a place of security, as also the skins of all sorts; the corn must be left to its fate. So soon as the Suwanee is destroyed, I expect the Americans will be satisfied, and retire; this is only my opinion; but I think it is conformable to the demand made by General Gaines of Kenhagee some months since. In fact, do all you can to save all you can; save the books particularly. It is probable the commandant will receive some communication from the vessels to-day, when he will know more certainly what are their motives in coming off the fort. I think it is only to shut up the passage to the Indians. Twenty canoes went down the river yesterday, and were forced to return. The road between this and Mickasuky is said to be stopped. Hillis Hadjo and Homathlemipo were here late last night to hear what vessel; they will remove all their cattle and effects across St. Mark's river this morning, and perhaps wait near thereto for the event.

I have been as brief as I can, to give you the substance of what appear facts that cannot be doubted; to enter into details in the present moment is useless. If the schooner is returned, get all the goods on board of her, and let her start off for Manatee creek, in the bottom of Cedar Key bay; you will then only have the skins to hide away. But no delay must take place, as the vessels will, no doubt, follow the land army, and perhaps even now some are gone round. I pray your strictest attention, for the more that is saved will be eventually more to your interest. Let the bearer have as much calico as will make him two shirts, for his trouble; he has promised to deliver this in three, but I give him four days.

I am yours, affectionately,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

B.

From A. Arbuthnot to Charles Cameron, Governor of Bahamas.

SIR: Being empowered by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to represent the state of their nation to your excellency, that you may be pleased to forward the same for the information of His Majesty's Government, to whom alone they look up for protection against the aggressions and encroachments of the Americans, I beg leave to submit to your excellency the enclosed representations, humbly praying that your excellency will be pleased to take an early opportunity of forwarding the same to Great Britain.

I am also instructed by Boleck, chief of Suwanee, to make the demand herein enclosed, he never having had any share of the presents distributed at Prospect Bluff, though he rendered equally essential services as any of the other chiefs to the British cause while at war with America, and was at New Orleans with a part of his warriors. His frontiers being more exposed to the predatory incursions of the back Georgians, who enter his territory and drive off his cattle, he is obliged to have large parties out to watch their motions, and prevent their plundering; and being now deficient of ammunition, he prays your excellency will grant his small demand.

Humbly submitting the same, I have the honor to remain your excellency's most humble servant,
A. A.

First, we beg leave to represent that Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, late clerks at Prospect Bluff to Messrs. Forbes, and who still reside on the Appalachicola river, we consider as the principal cause of our present troubles and uneasiness. Hambly was the instrumental cause of the fort at Prospect Bluff being destroyed by the Americans, by which we lost the supplies intended for our future wants. Since then both these men have kept emissaries among us, tending to harass and disturb our repose, and that of our brethren of the Middle and Upper nations; they spread among us reports that the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are descending to drive us off our land; they equally propagate false.

C.

From A. Arbuthnot to Benjamin Moodie, Esq., enclosing letters to Charles Bagot, Esq., British Minister at Washington.

SUWANEE, IN THE CREEK NATION,
January 27, 1818.

SIR: The enclosed containing matter of serious moment, and demanding the immediate attention of his excellency the British Ambassador, I trust he will, for this time, forgive the trifling expense of postage, which I have endeavored to prevent as much as possible by comprising much matter in one sheet of paper. Should you, sir, be put to any trouble or expense by this trouble I give you, on being made acquainted with the same, I will instruct Bain, Dunshee, & Co., to order payment of the same.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

From A. Arbuthnot to the Hon. Charles Bagot.

SIR: It is with pain I again obtrude myself upon your excellency's notice; but the pressing solicitations of the chiefs of the Creek nation, and the deplorable situation in which they are placed by the wanton aggressions of the Americans, I trust your excellency will take as a sufficient apology for the present intrusion.

In August last, the head chief of the Seminole Indians received a letter from General Gaines, of which I have taken the liberty of annexing your excellency the contents, as delivered me by the chief's head English interpreter, with Kenhagee's reply thereto.

This letter appears to have been intended to sound the disposition of the chief, and ascertain the force necessary to overrun the nation, for from then until an actual attack was made on Fowl Town, the same General, with General Jackson, seems to have been collecting troops and settlers in various quarters.

If your excellency desires to have further information respecting the situation of this country and its inhabitants, I can, from time to time, inform your excellency of such facts and circumstances as are stated to me by chiefs of known veracity, or which may come under my own observation; and your excellency's orders addressed to me at New Providence will either find me there, or be forwarded me to this country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, &c.,
A. A.

[The following memoranda were on the back of the foregoing letter.]

Kenhagee, 1,000; Boleck, 1,500; Oso Hatcho, Choctawhatchy, 500; Himashy Mico, Chatahoochee, 500;—at present with Hillis Hadjo. At present under arms, 1,000 and more, and attacking those Americans who have made inroads into their territory.

A quantity of gunpowder, lead, muskets, and flints, sufficient to arm one thousand to two thousand men.

Muskets, 1,000, more smaller pieces, if possible; 10,000 flints, a proportion for rifle put up separate; 50 casks gunpowder, a proportion for rifle; 2,000 knives, six to nine-inch blades, good quality; 1,000 tomahawks; 1000 pounds vermilion; 2,000 pounds lead, independent of ball for muskets.

KENHAGEE,
BOLECK.

(No. 1.)

From General Gaines to the Seminole Chiefs.

TO THE SEMINOLE CHIEFS: Your Seminoles are very bad people; don't say whom; you have murdered many of my people, and stolen my cattle; and many good houses, that have cost me money, you have burnt for me; and now that you see my writing, you will think I have spoken right. I know it is so—you know it is so; for now you may say I will not go upon you at random; but just give me the murderers, and I will show them my law; and when that is finished and passed, if you will come about any of my people, you will see your friends; and if you see me, you will see your friend. But there is something out in the sea, a bird with a forked tongue; whip him back before he lands, for he will be the ruin of you yet; perhaps you do not know who or what I mean—I mean the name of Englishmen.

I tell you this, that if you do not give me up the murderers who have murdered my people, I say I have got good strong warriors with scalping knives and tomahawks. You harbor a great many of my black people among you at Suwanee. If you give me leave to go by you against them, I shall not hurt anything belonging to you.

GENERAL GAINES.

From Kenhagee to General Gaines, in answer to the foregoing.

You charge me with killing your people, stealing your cattle, and burning your houses. It is I that have cause to complain of the Americans. While one American has been justly killed while in the act of stealing cattle, more than four Indians have been murdered while hunting by those lawless freebooters. I harbor no negroes. When the Englishmen were at war with America, some took shelter among them; and it is for you white people to settle those things among yourselves, and not to trouble us with what we know nothing about. I shall use force to stop any armed Americans from passing my towns or on my lands.

KENHAGEE.

To General GAINES.

"Note of Indian talks."

In August, Cap had a letter from General Gaines, in substance as annexed, No. 1, and returned the answer as by No. 2. Nothing further was said on either side. The end of October, a party of Americans from a fort on Flint river surrounded Fowl Town during the night, and began burning it; the Indians then in it fled to the swamp, and in their flight had three persons killed by fire from the Americans; they rallied their people, and forced the Americans to retire some distance, but not before they had two more persons killed. The Americans built a block-house or fort where they had fallen back to, and immediately sent to the forts up the country for assistance, stating the Indians were the aggressors. One of those letters falling into the hands of General Mitchell, he made inquiry, and found his people were the aggressors, and also settled with Inhimathlo for the loss his people had suffered; at the same time sending a talk to Kenhagee, by a headman, Opony, that he would put things in such a train as to prevent further encroachments, and get those Americans to leave the forts. But no sooner was this good talk given, and before the bearer of it returned home, than hundreds of Americans came pouring down on the Indians. Roused to a sense of their own danger, they flew to arms, and have been compelled to support them ever since. It is not alone from the country, but by vessels entering Appalachicola river, that troops and settlers are pouring into the Indian territory, and, if permitted to continue, will soon overrun the whole of the Indian lands.

From the talk sent Kenhagee by General Mitchell, I am in hopes that those aggressions of the Americans on the Indian territory are not countenanced by the American Government, but originate with men devoid of principle, who set laws and instructions at defiance, and stick at no cruelty and oppressions to obtain their ends. Against such oppressors the American Government must use not only all their influence, but, if necessary, force, or their names must be handed down to posterity as a nation more cruel and savage to the unfortunate aborigines of this country than ever were the Spaniards, in more dark ages, to the natives of South America.

The English Government, as the special protectors of the Indian nations, and on whom alone they rely for assistance, ought to step forward and save those unfortunate people from ruin; and as you, sir, are appointed to watch over those interests, it is my duty, as an Englishman, and the only one in this part of the Indian nation, to instruct you of the talks the chiefs bring me for your information; and I sincerely trust, sir, you will use the powers you are vested with for the service and protection of these unfortunate people, who look up to you as their saviour. I have written General Mitchell, who I learn is an excellent man, and, as he acts as Indian agent, I hope his influence will stop the torrent of innovators, and give peace and quietness to the Creek nation.

I pray your excellency will pardon this intrusion, which nothing but the urgency of the case would have induced me to make.

I have the honor to be, &c.

From Capparechimico and Boleck to Governor Cameron.

It is with pain we are again obliged to obtrude ourselves on your excellency's notice, in consequence of the cruel war we have been forced into by the irruption of the Americans into the heart of our lands. It will be first necessary to state to your excellency that one head chief, Kenhagee, received a letter from General Gaines in August last, a copy of which is enclosed, with the answer returned thereto. This letter only appears to have been a prelude to plans determined on by the said General and General Jackson, to bring on troops and settlers to drive us from our lands and take possession of them; for, in the end of October, a party of Americans surrounded Fowl Town during the night, and in the morning began setting fire to it, making the unfortunate inhabitants fly to the swamp, and who, in their flight, had three persons killed by the fire of the Americans. Our Indians, rallying, drove the Americans from the town, but, in their exertions, had two more of their people killed. The Americans retired some distance and built a fort or block-house to protect themselves until the assistance they had sent for to the forts up the country should arrive. A letter falling into the hands of General Mitchell, the Indian agent, which stated the Indians to have been the aggressors, he suspected its truth, and, on inquiry, found it was the reverse; in consequence, he made satisfaction to Inhimathlo, the chief of Fowl Town, and his people, for the injuries and losses they had sustained; at the same time he desired a talk to be sent to our head chiefs, stating his wish to see all the Indians friends, and that in twenty days he would send and get the Americans to retire from the forts. But this had no effect on the lawless invaders of our soil, for, before the bearer of the talk could return home, he met hundreds of Americans descending on us; they have also settlers and troops which come from Mobile, and go up the Appalachicola river. Thus, seeing no end to those inroads, necessity compelled us to have recourse to arms, and our brethren are now fighting for the land they inherited from their fathers, for their families and friends. But what will our exertions do without assistance? Our sinews of war are almost spent; and harassed as we have been for years, we have not been able to lay by the means to provide for our extraordinary wants; and to whom can we look up to for protection and support, but to those friends who have at all former times held forth their hands to uphold us, and who have sworn, in their late treaty with the Americans, to see our just rights and privileges respected and protected from insult and aggression? We now call on your excellency, as the representative of our father, King George, to send such aid in ammunition as we are absolutely in want of, as our brother chief, Hillis Hadjo, was informed, when in England, that, when ammunition was wanted to enable us to protect our just rights, your excellency would supply us with what was necessary. We have applied to the Spanish officer at the fort of St. Mark, but his small supply prevents his being able to assist us, and we have only on your excellency to depend. We likewise pray your excellency would be pleased to send an officer or person to lead us right, and to apportion the supply you may be pleased to send us agreeably to our proper wants.

In praying your excellency will lend an ear to our demand, and despatch it without delay, we remain your excellency's most obedient friends and servants.

CAPPACHIMICO,
BOLECK,

For ourselves and all the other chiefs of the Lower Creek nation.
His Exc'y Governor CAMERON.

F.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to Colonel E. Nicholls.

NASSAU, N. P., August 26, 1817.

Sir: Especially authorized by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, whose names I affix to the present, I am desired to address you, that you may lay their complaint before His Majesty's Government. They desire it to be made known that they have implicitly followed your advice in living friendly with the Americans, who were their neighbors, and nowise attempted to molest them, though they have seen the Americans encroach on their territory, burning their towns, and making fields where their houses stood, on the Chatahoochee; rather than make resistance, they have retired lower in the peninsula. The town of Ecan Halloway, where Otis Mico was chief, is one instance of the encroachments of the Americans. This town is situated under the guns of Fort Gaines; and Mico was desired to submit to the Americans, or his town would be blown to atoms; rather than do so, he retired, and is now living in the lower nation; and his fields, and even where the town stood, is ploughed up by the Americans. They complain of the English Government neglecting them after having drawn them into a war with America; that you, sir, have not kept your promise of sending people to reside among them; and that, if they have not some person or persons resident in the nation to watch over their interests, they will soon be driven to the extremity of the peninsula. You left Mr. Hambly to watch over the interests of the Creek nation, but you had hardly left the nation when he turned traitor, and was led by Forbes to take the part of the Americans. His letter to me, of which I annex you a copy, will show you what lengths he could go if he had the means. It is Hambly and Doyle who give the Indians all the trouble they experience; they send their emissaries among the Lower Creeks, and make them believe the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are arming against them: thus both are put in fear; and their fields are neglected, and hunting is not thought of. I have endeavored to do away this fear, by writing the chief of the Coweta towns that they ought to live on friendly terms with their brethren of the lower nation, whose wishes were to be on good terms with them, and not to listen to any bad talks, but to chase those that give them from among them. My letter was answered by them rather favorably, and I hope the talk that was sent to the Big Warrior last June will heal the difference between them.

Hillis Hadjo arrived in my schooner at Ochlochnee Sound last June, and was well received by all the chiefs and others who came to welcome him home. In consequence of his arrival, a talk was held, the substance of which I put on paper for them, and it was sent with a pipe of peace to the other nations. Hillis Hadjo wished to return to Nassau with me, but I prevailed on him to stay in the nation, and keep them all at peace. I regret, sir, to notice this poor man's affairs, though by his desire: it appears that he arrived in Nassau a short time after I had left it, in January, and Captain W. being here, took charge of him, his goods and money, prevailing on the Governor to let him stay with him until he went down to the nation, which it was his intention to do. Of the money received of Governor Cameron, he had only given him eighty dollars, by Captain W., a barrel of sugar, a bag of coffee, and a small keg of rum; and the interpreter, Shugert, informed me that when Hillis Hadjo asked for an account, Captain W. refused, it, saying it would be useless to a man who could not read. He also misses two cases, one of which contained, he thinks, crockery; I have made inquiry of His Majesty's ordnance storekeeper, and he informs me the whole were delivered to Captain W.; they are therefore lost to Hillis Hadjo.

I am desired to return Hillis Hadjo's warmest acknowledgments for the very handsome manner you treated him in England, and he begs his prayer may be laid at the foot of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent. I left him and all his family well on the 20th of June. Old Capparechimico desires me to send his best respects, and requests that you would send out people to live among them, and all the land they took from Forbes shall be theirs. At all events, they must have an agent among them, to see that the Americans adhere to the treaty, and permit them to live unmolested on their own lands. This agent should be authorized by His Majesty's Government, or he will not be attended to by the Americans. In the gazettes of Georgia, the Americans report the Seminole Indians are continually committing murders on their borders, and making incursions into the State. These are fabrications tending to irritate the American Government against the poor Indians; for, during the time I was in the nation, there was only one American killed, and he, with two others, was in the act of driving off cattle belonging to Bowlegs, chief of Suwanee; whereas three men and a boy were killed last June, by a party of American cattle-stealers, while in their hunting-camps; the boy they scalped; and one of Bowlegs' headmen was killed on St. John's river, in July. The back-woods Georgians, and those resident on the borders of the Indian nation, are continually entering it, and driving off cattle. They have, in some instances, made settlements, and particularly on the Choctowhatchy river, where a considerable number have descended.

By the treaty with Great Britain, the Americans were to give up to the Indians all the lands that they may have taken from them during the war, and place them on the same footing they were in 1811. It appears they have not done so; that Fort Gaines, on the Chatahoochee river, and Camp Crawford, on the Flint river, are both on Indian territory, that was not in possession of the Americans in 1811. They are fearful that, before any aid is given by the English Government, they will no longer be in possession of any territory.

I wrote last January to his excellency the honorable Charles Bagot, respecting the encroachments of the Americans; as I was informed by the copy of a letter from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that His Majesty's ambassador had received orders to watch over the interests of the Indians. Since my return here, I have received of Mr. Moodie, of Charleston, an extract of a letter from the honorable Charles Bagot, stating that the expense of postage is so considerable, that any further communications of the same nature must be sent him by private hands. Now, sir, as no person goes direct from this to Washington, how am I to be able to comply with his desire? Thus he will be kept ignorant of the real situation of the poor Indians, and the encroachments daily made on their lands by American settlers: while he may be told by the American Government that no encroachments have been made, and that the forts they still hold are necessary to check the unruly Seminoles. Thus the person appointed to watch over the interests of the Indians having no other means of information than from the parties interested in their destruction, and seeing from time to time, in the American gazettes, accounts of cruel murders, &c. committed by the Indians on the frontier settlements of the United States, he apprehends the Indians merit all the Americans do to them.

But let His Majesty's Government appoint an agent, with full powers, and to correspond with His Majesty's ambassador at Washington, and his eyes will then be opened as to the motives that influence American individuals, as well as the Government, in vilifying the Indians. The powers given me and the instructions were to memorialize His Majesty's Government as well as the Governor General of Havana; but if you will be pleased to lay this letter before His Majesty's Secretary of State, it will save the necessity of the first; and I fear that a memorial to the Governor General would be of no use. Referring you to the answer,* I am, most respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

From A. Arbuthnot to William Hambly.

OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, May 3, 1817.

SIR: On my return here this day, I received a letter signed by you, and dated the 23d March. As you therein take the liberty of advising me, as you say, by order of the chiefs of the Creek nation, I am glad of, and shall embrace this opening you give me, and reply to you at some length. First, sir, let me premise that, when you lived at Prospect Bluff, a clerk to Messrs. Forbes & Co., you did not consider Cappachimico, McQueen, or any other of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, as outlaws, nor have they ever been considered as such by the English Government, who are the especial protectors of the Indian nations; and it ill becomes Mr. Hambly to call Cappachimico an outlaw—that man who has ever been his friend, and by his authority has prolonged his life. Yes, sir, the young chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation, considering you as the chief cause of their troubles, would have long ere this had possession of you, and, perhaps, with your life made you pay the forfeit for the injuries heaped on them, had not that man, who has been your friend from your early youth, stepped in as your protector. Yet this is the man whom Mr. Hambly presumes to call an outlaw! A pardoned villain, when going to the gallows, would bless the hand that saved his life; but Mr. Hambly blasphemes his saviour!

As Mr. Hambly's generous friend is the principal cause of my being in this country, as an honest man I shall endeavor to fulfil my promise to him and the other chiefs. The guilty alone have fear; an honest and upright man dreads no danger, fears no evil, as he commits no ill; and your arm of justice ought to be applied where it would rightly fall—on the heads of the really guilty. Your mean and vile insinuation, that I have been the cause of thefts and murders, comes ill from him who has been the cause of the murder of hundreds. Though your usage was made villainous at the fort, yet your revenge was too savage and sanguinary. If your conduct, sir, to the Indians were guided by as pure motives as mine, you would endeavor to influence them to esteem and respect each other as brothers, and live in harmony and friendship; cultivating their lands in Summer, and taking their diversions of hunting in Winter; respecting their neighbors, and making yourself respected by them. If thus, sir, you would act, (and by your knowledge of their language you have much more in your power than any other man,) you would then be the true friend of the Indians. Were I an instigator to theft and murder, would I hold the language I have done to the chiefs and others who have called on me? Ask the lieutenant commanding at Fort Gaines if my letter to him breathed the strains of a murderer; ask Opony Hatcho, or Dany, his interpreter, if the commendatory note I sent him by order of Opony could be written by an instigator to murder; ask Opony himself if my language to him was that of a murderer; ask Mappalitchy, a chief residing among the Americans on Ockmulgee, if my language and advice to him savored of that of a murderer. All those, and every Indian who has heard my talks, will contradict your vile assertions.

But Mappalitchy has given me a clue by which I can unravel from whence the aspersions come: not from Opony Hatcho, or any of the chiefs of the upper towns, but from him who endeavors to lead them to mischiefs and quarrels with each other. Did not the chiefs hear my note read with respect, and perfectly accord with my sentiments of being all as brethren, uniting in the bonds of friendship and love? Did not they agree to smoke the pipe of peace with their brethren of the lower nation, and live in future as brothers? What made some of them alter their minds afterwards? The interference of a humane man, who caused them to write a letter to me demanding my removal from a band of outlaws, and which letter is signed "William Hambly."

I shall only make one more observation, and that will show from whence I came, and whether I came amongst the Indians as a revenger, or as the friend of peace and harmony.

In the Spring of 1816, Mr. Hambly sent Governor Cameron a letter containing talks of the chiefs of the Indian nations: they were forwarded to England, and his excellency handed me, on my leaving Providence, an answer thereto from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, one of His Majesty's chief Secretaries of State, that I might make the same known to the chiefs on my arrival in the nation. What will Governor Cameron think of the man who, in 1816, could write against the encroachments of the Americans on the Indian nation, and in the Spring of 1817 call the chiefs of that nation, for whom he more especially wrote, outlaws? Mr. Hambly may sell his services to America, but no man can expatriate himself from the allegiance due to his native country; and a Government may call on a friendly nation to give up a subject that has seriously wronged her.

I recommend Mr. Hambly to be content with the douceur he may have received, and permit the unlettered Indian to live quietly and peaceably on his native land.

I shall send a copy of this letter with the one from you, to be read to the chiefs of the nation, and shall, at the same time, take an opportunity of explaining myself more fully than I did in the note sent by Opony. Wishing you a speedy recantation of your errors, and a return to your former way of thinking, I am your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to the Governor of Havana.

The chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are hereunto annexed, beg leave to approach your excellency and represent their complaints. Long imposed on by the persons keeping stores in this country, in charging us exorbitant prices for their goods, while they only allowed us a very trifling one for our peltry, we have found it necessary to look out for a person that will deal fairly with us, and we wish to establish a store for him on Appalache river. We have made application to the commandant of St. Mark's, and he has referred us to your excellency. It is not alone the impositions that have been practised upon us that has made us presume to address your excellency; we have complaints of a more serious nature against the persons employed by the only house that has been established among us, that of Mr. Forbes. In the first place, some years back, under false pretences, they attempted to rob us of a very large portion of our best lands, and we the more readily acceded to it, from the faithful promise given us that they would get English people to settle it and live among us; but far from doing this, Mr. Forbes attempted to sell it to the American Government, and settle it with Americans. Thus finding ourselves deceived and imposed on, we withdrew our grant about three years since, which, from the stipulations contained therein not being fulfilled on the part of Mr. Forbes, we conceived we had a right to do. Secondly, Mr. Doyle and Mr. William Hambly, the two persons left in the nation to carry on Mr. Forbes's business have, for more than two years, been endeavoring to influence us to join the Americans; and finding that fair means would not swerve us from our attachments to our ancient friends, the English, they have recently had recourse to threats of bringing the Americans down upon us; and that people only want a pretext to attack us, which the said Doyle and Hambly attempt to give them by spreading false reports of our murdering the Americans, stealing their cattle, and preparing for war against them, while, in fact, it is the Americans who murder our red brethren, steal our cattle by hundreds at a time, and are daily encroaching on our lands, and maintaining the settlers in their ill-gotten possessions by armed force.

On the Choctawhatchy river there is a large body of Americans, forming settlements, and more are daily joining them. As this river is far within that line marked out by your excellency's Government and the Americans some years since, (though that line was unknown to us until very lately, and we never gave our sanction, nor, in fact, knew of any sale of our lands being made to the Americans,) we trust your excellency will give orders to displace them from within the line, and send them back to their own country. Our delaying to address your excellency to represent the afore-mentioned grievances has been owing to the want of a person to attend to our talks, and put them in writing for us. The commandant of the fort of St. Mark has heard all our talks and complaints. He approves of what we have done and what we are doing, and it is by his recommendation we have thus presumed to address your excellency.

We have the honor to be your excellency's most obedient and very humble servants,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

His Ex'cy the GOVERNOR GENERAL, &c.

No. 2.

[Supposed to be from Bowlegs to the Governor of St. Augustine.]

Sir: I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer to the same is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you, and hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and people. My warriors and others that go to St. Augustine return with false reports tending to harass and distress my people, and preventing them from attending to their usual avocations. At one time the Americans and upper Indians, supported by a force of about three thousand men, were running lines far within the Indian territory; at another time, they were collecting a force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns below. Now, sir, we know of no reason the Americans can have to attack us, an inoffensive and unoffending people. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since the Americans made peace with our good father, King George. We have followed the orders of his officer that was with us, (Lieutenant Colonel Edward Nicholls,) and in nowise molested the Americans, though we see them daily encroaching on our territory, stealing our cattle, and murdering and carrying off our people. That same officer also told us, we, as allies to the great King, our father, were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans, and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before and during the war. Yet, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are daily making encroachments on our land, getting persons who are not known to the chiefs, and without any power or authority to grant and sign over lands to them. Thus they deceive the world, and make our very friends believe we are in league with them.

The principal chiefs of the nation, with the head warriors, assembled at my town on the 8th instant, and came to the resolution of informing the British Minister at Washington of the conduct of the Americans and the officers of their Government towards us; it has been done accordingly, and copies sent to England. We demand of the King, our father, to fix some of his people among us, who may inform him from time to time of what is passing, and see the Americans do not extend themselves on our lands. The Spanish subjects in the Floridas are too much in the interests of the Americans to be our friends. For the Governors I shall always entertain the greatest regard; but for the people, they do not act so as to merit my esteem and protection. You desire I would chase those marauders who steal my cattle: my people have lately driven some Americans from Lahhewary, and I have no doubt the Americans will lay hold of this as a pretext to make war on us, as they have before done, in stating we harbor their runaway slaves.*

To His Ex'cy Don JOSE COPPINGER,
Governor of St. Augustine.

Sir: Kenhagee, the head chief of the Lower Creek nation, has called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and American people. But, far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but ascending the Appalachicola in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders. Your known philanthropy and goodwill to the Indians induce the head chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands, and order that those who have already presumed to seize our fields may retire therefrom.

Relations with Spain.

The Indians have seized two persons who they think have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans upon them, and they are now in their possession as prisoners. It is even reported they have made sales of Indian lands without the knowledge, consent, or approbation of the chiefs of the nation; and, from their long residence in the nation, and the great influence that one of those people formerly enjoyed among the chiefs as their chief, there is some reason to believe he has been guilty of improper conduct with regard to the Indian nation.*

No. 4.

Petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron.

We, the undersigned, have been deputed by the chiefs of the Creek nation to wait on your excellency, and lay before you their heavy complaints. To the English we have always looked up as friends, as protectors; and on them we now call to aid us in repelling the approaches of the Americans, who, regardless of treaties, are daily seizing our lands and robbing our people. They have already built seven forts on our lands; they are making roads and running lines into the very heart of our country; and, without the interference of the English, we shall soon be driven from the land we inherited from our forefathers.

The Americans tell us the English will regard us no more, and that we had better submit to them; but we cannot submit to their shackles, and will rather die in defence of our country.

When peace was made between the English and Americans, we were told by Lieutenant Colonel E. Nicholls that the Americans were to give up our lands they had taken, and we were desired to live quietly and peaceably, in nowise molesting the Americans. We have strictly followed these orders; but the Americans have not complied with the treaty. Colonel Nicholls left William Hamby in charge of the fort at Prospect Bluff, with orders to hear us, if any cause of complaint, and represent the same to the British Government; but he turned traitor, and brought the Americans down on the fort, which was blown up, and many of our red brethren destroyed in it. The ammunition and stores intended for our use were either destroyed or taken off by the Americans. We have sent several messengers to inform your excellency of these proceedings of the Americans, but they have never returned to us with an answer. Three of our red brethren have lately been killed by the Americans, while hunting on our own lands; and they threaten to attack the towns of Mickasuky and Suwanee, the only two large towns left us in the Creek nation; and, without aid from your excellency, we cannot repel their attack. We are therefore deputed to demand of your excellency the assistance of troops and ammunition, that we may be able effectually to repel the attack of the Americans, and prevent their further encroachments; and if we return without assistance, the Americans, who have their spies among us, will the more quickly come upon us. We most humbly pray your excellency will send such a force as will be respected and make us respectable.*

I beg leave to represent to your excellency the necessity of my again returning to the Indian nation with the deputies from the chiefs; and as my trouble and expense can only be defrayed by permission to take goods to dispose of among them, I pray your excellency will be pleased to grant me such letter or license as will prevent me from being captured, in case of meeting with any Spanish cruiser on the coast of Florida.

borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and the American people; but far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but both troops and settlers ascending the Appalachicola river in vessels. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders.

Your known philanthropy and goodwill towards the Indians in general induce the chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands and paternal birthright, and also order that those who have already seized on their fields may retire therefrom.

The Indians have seized two persons known to have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans down on their lands, and they are now in their possession as prisoners; and they have it in report that sales of their lands have been made by those two people without the consent, approbation, or knowledge of the chiefs; and from their long residence in the nation, and the one having enjoyed great confidence in the nation, and with the chiefs, as English interpreters, there is some reason to believe those reports, when leagued with the swarms of Americans coming from Mobile and other places, seizing the best of the Indian lands. Such improper sales have actually been made.

In taking this liberty of addressing you, sir, in behalf of the unfortunate Indians, believe me I have no wish but to see an end put to a war which, if persisted in, I foresee must eventually be their ruin, and, as they were not the aggressors, if, in the height of their rage, they committed any excesses, that you will overlook them as the just ebullition of an indignant spirit against an invading foe.

DEFENCE.

May it please this Honorable Court:

The prisoner arraigned before you is sensible of the indulgence granted by this honorable court in the examination of the case now before them. It is not the wish of the prisoner, in making his defence, to tire the patience of the court by a minute reference to the voluminous documents and papers, or to recapitulate the whole of the testimony which has come before this honorable court in the course of this investigation. Nor is it the intention of the prisoner to waste the invaluable time of this court by appeals to their feelings or sympathy, though I am persuaded that sympathy nowhere more abounds than in a generous American breast. My only appeal is to the sound and impartial judgment of this honorable court, the purity and uprightness of their hearts, that they will dispassionately and patiently weigh the evidence which they have before them, apply the law, and on these, and these alone, pronounce their judgment.

If this honorable court please, I shall now proceed to examine the law and evidence that is relied on by this honorable court in support of the first charge and specification.

Winslett, a witness on the part of the prosecution, says: The Little Prince showed him a letter written in June last, signed A. Arbuthnot, requesting his friendship with the lower nation of Indians. The same witness stated he believed the letter to be now in the possession of the Little Prince. Here, may it please this honorable court, I would call their attention to the law relating to evidence; first premising that the rules of evidence are the same, whether in civil or military tribunals. (McCom. 99.) This point being conceded, the next inquiry is, what are the rules of evidence with respect to the admission of letters or papers of private correspondence in a court of criminal jurisdiction? May it please this honorable court, must you not produce the original letters and papers, if they are not lost or mislaid so that they cannot be obtained? And, in case they are lost, proof must be made of the handwriting being the same as that of the original, before they can be received as evidence. (McCom. on Courts-Martial. Peake's Evidence. Gilbert's Law of Evidence.) No instance can be cited where a copy of a letter was read as evidence when the original could be obtained, much less the giving in evidence the contents of such letter from bare recollection. The only proof that this honorable court has of the existence of such a letter being in the hands of any person, or its contents being known, is the vagrant memory of a vagrant individual. Make this a rule of evidence, and I ask you where would implication, construction, and invention stop? Whose property, whose reputation, or whose life, would be safe? Here I would beg leave to mention a remark made by the president of this court in the course of this investigation, which was, that, notwithstanding the letter was proved by the witness to be in the possession of the Little Prince, this court could not notice that circumstance, because there was no means by which it could be obtained. I would ask the honorable court what means have they adopted, or what exertions have they made to procure this letter? If the honorable court please, I shall here close the defence on the first charge and specification, believing that they are neither supported by law nor evidence.

May it please the honorable court, I will now come to the second charge, and first specification of that charge. In support of this charge and specification, the evidence before the court is a letter written to my son. If the court please, this letter was written in consequence of the situation of my property at Suwanee, and the large debts that were due me from Bowlegs and his people. Nothing, I believe, of an inflammatory nature can be found on reading the document marked A, authorizing the opinion that I was prompting the Indians to war. On the contrary, if the honorable court will examine the document marked A, they will see that I wish to lull their fears, by informing them that it was the negroes and not the Indians that the Americans were principally moving against.

If the honorable court please, I will make a few remarks upon the second specification, and then close my defence. In proof of this charge, the court have before them the evidence of Hambly, Cook, and sundry letters purporting to be written by myself to different individuals. May it please the court, what does Cook prove? Why, that I had ten kegs of powder at Suwanee. Let me appeal to the experience of the court, if they think that this quantity of powder would supply one thousand Indians, and an equal number of blacks, more than two months for hunting. As to the letters named in this specification, may it please the court, the rules of evidence laid down in the first part of this defence will apply with equal force in the present case. It remains now, may it please the court, to say something as to Hambly's testimony. And may it please this honorable court, the rule laid down in this case as to hearsay evidence will be found without a precedent. A strong case was stated by an intelligent member of this court, on the examination of this part of the evidence; that is, "would you receive as testimony what a third person had said, who, if present, you would reject as incompetent?" Apply this principle to the present case; could an Indian be examined on oath in our courts of judicature? If, then, the testimony of savages is inadmissible, Hambly proves nothing.

Here, may it please the honorable court, I close my reply to the charges and specifications preferred against me, being fully persuaded that, should there be cause for censure, my judges will, in the language of the law, lean to the side of mercy.

Continuation of the minutes of the proceedings of a special court, whereof Major General Gaines is president, convened by order of the 26th April, 1818.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27 1818.

The court proceeded to the trial of Robert C. Ambrister, a British subject, who, being asked if he had any objections to any one of the members of the court, and replying in the negative, was arraigned on the following charges and specifications, viz:

Charges against Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody, who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

Specification 1. That the said Robert C. Ambrister did give intelligence of the movements and operations of the American army between the 1st and 20th March, 1818, and did excite them (the negroes and Indians) to war against the Army of the United States, by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, whose Government was in peace and friendship with the United States, and all her citizens.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

Specification 1. That the said Robert C. Ambrister, a subject of Great Britain, which Government was in peace and amity with the United States and all her citizens, did, between the 1st of February and 20th of March, 1818, levy a war against the United States, by assuming command of the Indians in hostility and open war with the United States, and ordering a party of them to meet the army of the United States, and give them battle, as will appear by his letters to Governor Cameron, of New Providence, dated 20th March, 1818, which are marked A, C, and D; and the testimony of Mr. Peter B. Cook, and Captain Lewis, of the schooner Chance.

By order of the court:

J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

To which charges and specifications, the prisoner pleaded as follows, viz:

To the first charge and specification, not guilty.

To the second charge and specification, guilty, and justification.

The court adjourned until to-morrow morning, at seven o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818.

The court met pursuant to adjournment. Present:

Major General GAINES, President.

Members.

Colonel King,	Colonel Dyer,
Colonel Williams,	Lieut. Col. Lindsay,
Lieut. Col. Gibson,	Lieut. Col. Elliott,
Major Muhlenberg,	Major Fanning,
Major Montgomery,	Major Minton,
Captain Vashon,	Captain Crittenden,
Lieutenant J. M. Glassell,	Recorder.

The recorder then read to the court the following order, viz:

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adj't Gen.'s Office, near St. Mark's,
April 28, 1818.

GENERAL ORDER.

Captain Allison, of the 7th infantry, is detailed to form a supernumerary member of the special court now sitting at Fort St. Mark's.

By order:

Pursuant to the above order, the supernumerary member took his seat.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, about the 5th or 6th of April, 1818, his vessel and himself having been captured by the prisoner, and he brought to Suwanee as a prisoner, there was an alarm among the negroes and Indians, created by learning some news from Mickasuky, at which time the prisoner appeared active in giving orders and sending a detachment to meet the army. The witness also stated that the prisoner appeared to be a person invested with authority among the negro leaders, and gave orders for their preparation for war, procuring ammunition, &c., and that the leaders came to him for orders; the prisoner furnished them with powder and lead, and recommended to them the making of balls, &c. very quickly. The witness also stated that the prisoner occasionally dressed in uniform, with his sword, and that on the first alarm, which he understood was from Mickasuky, by a negro woman, he put on his uniform. The witness further stated that, some time about the 20th of March, 1818, the prisoner with an armed body of negroes (twenty-four in number) came on board his vessel, and ordered him to pilot them to Fort St. Mark's, which he stated he intended to capture before the Americans could get there, threatening to hang the witness if he did not obey.

Question by the court. Did you ever understand by whose authority and for what purpose the accused came into the country?

Answer. I have frequently heard him say that he came to attend to Mr. Woodbine's business at the bay of Tampa.

Question by the prisoner. Did I not tell you, when I came on board the schooner Chance, I wished you to pilot me to St. Mark's, as I was informed that two Americans, by the names of Hambly and Doyle, were confined there, and I wished to have them released from their confinement?

Answer. You stated you wanted to get Hambly and Doyle from St. Mark's; I do not know what were your intentions in so doing.

Question. Did I not tell you that I expected the Indians would fire on me when I arrived at St. Mark's?

Answer. You did not; you stated that you intended to take the fort in the night by surprise.

Question. Did you see me give ammunition to the negroes and Indians; if so, how much, and at what time?

Answer. I saw you give powder and lead to the negroes when you came on board, and advised them to make balls; and I saw you give liquor and paint to the Indians.

Question. Have you not often heard me say, between the 1st and 20th of April, that I would not have anything to do with the negroes and Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. About the fifteenth of April I heard you say you would not have anything to do with the negroes and Indians; I heard nothing about exciting them to war.

Question. Can you read writing?

Answer. Not English writing.

Question. Did you not hear me say, when arriving at Suwanee, that I wished to be off immediately for Providence?

Answer. I did not; after the alarm, you said you wished to be off for Tampa.

Question. Did you not say to the accused you wished to visit Mr. Arbuthnot at his store on Suwanee, and get provisions yourself?

Answer. I did not; I stated I wanted provisions.

Question. Did I send or command any Indians to go and fight the Americans?

Answer. I do not exactly know that you sent them; the Indians and negroes were crowding before your door, and you were dividing the paint, &c. among them; and I understood a party was going to march.

Question. Did I not give up the schooner in charge to you as captain?

Answer. After our return from Suwanee town, you directed me to take charge of her to go to Tampa.

JOHN J. ARBUTHNOT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, some time about the 23d of March, the prisoner came with a body of negroes, partly armed, to his father's store, on Suwanee river, and told the witness that he had come to do justice to the country, by taking the goods and distributing them among the negroes and Indians, which the witness saw the prisoner do; and that the prisoner stated to him that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business, to see the negroes righted. The witness has further known the prisoner to give orders to the negroes; and that, at his suggestion, a party was sent from Suwanee to meet the Americans to give them battle; which party returned on meeting the Mickasuky Indians in their flight. The witness also testified to the handwriting of the letter marked A, and referred to in the specification of the second charge as the writing of the prisoner.

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear me say that I came on Woodbine's business?

Answer. I did.

Question by the prisoner. Were not the negroes alluded to at Arbuthnot's store before I arrived?

Answer. No, you came with them.

PETER B. COOK, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that he never heard the prisoner give any orders to Indians or negroes; that the prisoner did distribute Arbuthnot's goods, and also paint, to the negroes and Indians; also, that some powder was brought from Suwanee by the prisoner; and distributed among the negroes by Nero. Some time in March the prisoner took Arbuthnot's schooner, and, with an armed party of negroes, about twenty-four in number, set out for St. Mark's for the purpose of taking Arbuthnot's goods at that place, and that he would compel the commandant to give them up. On hearing of the approach of the American army, the prisoner told the negroes it was useless for them to run; for if they ran any farther, they would be driven into the sea.

The prisoner told the witness that he had been a lieutenant in the British army under Colonel Nicholls. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa to see about those negroes he had left there. The prisoner told the witness he had written a letter to Governor Cameron for ammunition for the Indians some time in March, and also told the witness that he had a commission in the patriot army under McGregor, and that he expected a captaincy. The witness testified that the letters marked A, B, C, and D, and referred to in the specification to the second charge, were in the handwriting of the prisoner; also one marked E.

Question by the prisoner. Did you not frequently hear me say that I would have nothing to do with the Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question. Are you acquainted with Lewis Phenix, and have you not heard him express ill-will against me in consequence of my wishing him to pilot me to St. Mark's?

Answer. I never did.

Question. Do you know of my sending troops at any time to fight against the United States; and have I not been constantly with you, so that you would have had an opportunity of knowing if there had been any sent by me?

Answer. I have not. They might have been sent without my knowledge.

JACOB HARMON, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, some time in the latter end of March, or 1st of April, the prisoner took possession of the schooner Chance, with an armed party of negroes, and stated his intentions of taking St. Mark's. On his way thither, on going ashore, he learned from some Indians that Arbuthnot had gone to St. Mark's, which induced him to return. The witness also stated that while the prisoner was on board, he had complete command of the negroes, who considered him as their captain. The prisoner took the cargo of the vessel up towards Suwanee, which consisted of, with other articles, nine kegs of powder and five hundred pounds of lead.

The evidence on both sides being closed, the prisoner was allowed until five o'clock this evening to make his defence.

The time allowed the prisoner for the preparation of his defence having expired, he was brought before the court, and made the defence marked M, which is attached to these proceedings.

The court was then cleared, and the proceedings read over by the recorder, when, after due deliberation on the testimony brought forward, the court found the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of so much of the specification to the first charge as follows, viz: "And did excite them to war with the United States, by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, he being a subject of Great Britain, which Government was at peace and friendship with the United States and all her citizens;" but not guilty of the other part of the specification; guilty of the first charge; guilty of the specification of the second charge, and guilty of the second charge; and do therefore sentence the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, to suffer death, by being shot, two-thirds of the members of the court concurring therein.

One of the members of the court requesting a reconsideration of his vote on the sentence, the sense of the court was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative; when the vote was again taken, and the court sentenced the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The court adjourned sine die.

SUWANEE, NEAR FORT ST. MARK'S,
March 20, 1818.

SIR: I am requested particularly by all our Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them two years ago, and have advanced some considerable distance in their country, and are now making daily progress. They say they sent a number of letters to your excellency by Arbuthnot, but have never received one answer, which makes them believe that he never delivered them, and you will oblige them much if you will let them know whether he did or not. The purport of the letters was, begging your excellency to be kind enough to send them down some gunpowder, muskets, balls, lead, cannon, &c., as they are now completely out of those articles. The Americans may march through the whole territory in one month, and, without arms, &c., they must surrender. Hillis Hadjo, or Francis, the Indian chief, the one that was in England, tells me to let your excellency know that the Prince Regent told him that whenever he wanted ammunition your excellency would supply him with as much as he wanted. They beg me to press upon your excellency's mind to send the above-mentioned articles down by the vessel that brings this to you, as she will sail for this place immediately, and let the Prince Regent know of their situation. Any letters that your excellency may send down be good enough to direct to me, as they have great dependence in my writing. Any news that your excellency may have respecting them and America, you will be doing a great favor to let me know, that I may send among them.

Relations with Spain.

There is now a very large body of Americans and Indians, which I expect will attack us every day, and God only knows how it will be decided; but I must only say that this will be the last effort with us. There has been a body of Indians gone to meet them, and I have sent another party. I hope your excellency will be pleased to grant the favor they request. I have nothing further to add, but am, sir, with due respect, your obedient, humble servant.

SUWANEE, NEAR RIVER APPALACHICOLA.

DEAR SIR: Francis and all the Indian chiefs have requested me particularly to acquaint you that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them these two years past, and are making daily progress in this territory, and say they will proceed; that you are the only friend they have in that part of the world, and hope you will exert yourself in their behalf, and ask for as much assistance as can be had; that the Americans are at the forks of the river Appalachicola; they have written a number of times to England and Providence, but have never received one answer; they expect the man never delivered the letters, but they have full hopes in my writing; they request you will make the Prince Regent acquainted with their deplorable situation. The Americans have been very cruel ever since they have commenced, and hope you will not lose a single moment in forwarding their views; they say they will be extremely happy to see you out; nothing would give them greater pleasure than to see you out at this present time. If they should not see you, send them out all news and directions, that they may be guided by them. There are about three hundred blacks at this place, and a few of our bluff people; they beg me to say they depend on your promises, and expect you are on the way out; they have stuck to the cause, and will always believe in the faith of you, and any directions you may give. Send to me at this place, and I will do what I can.

I remain, my dear sir, most truly yours,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

SIR: I am requested particularly by the Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them a long time since, and have advanced some distance in their territory, and are still continuing to advance; that they, the chiefs of Florida, have sent repeatedly to your excellency, and have never received one answer; they suspect Mr. Arbuthnot has never delivered the papers to your excellency; they wish me to state to you that they are completely out of ammunition, muskets, &c., begging your excellency will be pleased to send them the articles above-mentioned, with a few cannon, as the Americans build their boats so strong that their rifle balls cannot penetrate their sides. To the captain of the vessel, who will come down again, I have given an order to make your excellency acquainted with what time the vessel will sail for this place. Your excellency will, I hope, be good enough to make the Prince Regent acquainted with their situation, and ask for assistance, which they have pressed me very hard to press on your excellency's mind, and likewise to send them down what news may be respecting them and the country, which will be a great satisfaction to them.

I have the honor to be, sir, with due respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

SIR: I am requested by Francis, and all the Indian chiefs, to acquaint your excellency that they are at war with the Americans, and have been some time back; that they are in great distress, for the want of ammunition, balls, arms, &c., and have written by Mr. Arbuthnot several times, but they suppose he never delivered them to your excellency. You will oblige them much to let them know whether he did or not. I expect the Americans and Indians will attack us daily. I have sent a party of men to oppose them.

They beg me to press on your excellency's mind to lay the situation of the country before the Prince Regent, and ask for assistance. All news respecting them your excellency will do a favor to let me know by the first opportunity, that I may make them acquainted. I have given directions to the captain to let your excellency know when the vessel will sail for this place.

I hope your excellency will be pleased to send them the ammunition. I expect, if they don't procure some very shortly, that the Americans will march through the country. I have nothing further to add, but am, dear sir, your most obedient, humble servant.

DEFENCE.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 28, 1818.

The United States of America vs. Robert Christie Ambrister.

Who being arraigned before a special court-martial upon the following charges, to wit:

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

To the first charge, the prisoner at the bar pleaded not guilty; and as to the second charge, he pleaded guilty, and justification. The prisoner at the bar feels grateful to this honorable court for their goodness in giving a sufficiency of time to deliberate and arrange his defence on the above charges.

The prisoner at the bar here avails himself of the opportunity of stating to this court, that, inasmuch as the testimony which was introduced in this case was very explicit, and went to every point the prisoner could possibly wish, he has nothing further to offer in his defence, but puts himself upon the mercy of this honorable court.

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Camp four miles north of St.
Mark's, April 29, 1818.

GENERAL ORDERS.

At a special court-martial, commenced on the 26th instant, at St. Mark's, and continued until the night of the 28th, of which Brevet Major General E. P. Gaines is president, was tried A. Arbuthnot, on the following charges and specifications, viz:

CHARGE 1. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens, he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

CHARGE 2. Acting as a spy, aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war.

CHARGE 3. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, confiscate their property, and causing their arrest, with a view to their condemnation to death, and the seizure of their property, they being citizens of Spain, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain, the United States, and the Indians.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The court, after mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, find the prisoner, A. Arbuthnot, guilty of the first charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" and, after mature reflection, sentence him, A. Arbuthnot, to be suspended by the neck until he is dead.

Was also tried Robert C. Ambrister, on the following charges, viz:

CHARGE 1. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and late an officer of the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded as follows, viz:

To the first charge, not guilty. To the second charge, guilty, and justification.

The court, on examination of the evidence, and on mature deliberation, find the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of the first and second charges, and do, therefore, sentence him to suffer death, by being shot. One of the members requesting a reconsideration of the vote on this sentence, and it being had, they sentence the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The commanding General approves the finding and sentence of the court in the case of A. Arbuthnot; and approves the finding and first sentence of the court in the case of Robert C. Ambrister; and disapproves the reconsideration of the sentence of the honorable court in his case; it appearing, from the evidence and pleading of the prisoner, that he did lead and command within the territory of Spain (being a subject of Great Britain) the Indians in war against the United States, these nations being at peace. It is an established principle of the law of nations, that any individual of a nation, making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and pirate. This is the case of Robert C. Ambrister, clearly shown by the evidence adduced.

The commanding General orders that Brevet Major A. C. W. Fanning, of the corps of artillery, will have, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock a. m., A. Arbuthnot suspended by the neck with a rope until he is dead; and Robert C. Ambrister to be shot to death, agreeably to the sentence of the court.

John James Arbuthnot will be furnished with a passage to Pensacola by the first vessel.

Relations with Spain.

Captain R. K. Call, of the first regiment of infantry, is appointed volunteer aid-de-camp to the commanding General, until further orders.

The special court, of which Brevet Major General F. P. Gaines is president, is dissolved.

By order of Major General A. JACKSON:

No. 50.

[Extracts from Message of 25th March, 1818.]

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to General Gaines, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

You no doubt have already been informed that the notorious Woodbine has recently made his appearance again, at the mouth of the Appalachicola, and that he has an agent now among the Seminole Indians and negroes in that quarter, stirring them up to acts of hostility against this country; and that Woodbine himself has gone, in an armed vessel, to some part of the West Indies for supplies. Connected with this fact is another, which may serve as an intimation of the future conduct of these people, when once in the possession of the supplies which it is said they expect on the return of Woodbine. About ten or twelve days ago, a small party of those Indians entered the frontier of Wayne county, and stole two horses and some cattle; they were pursued by some of the inhabitants, who peaceably demanded restoration of the stolen property; and, instead of a compliance on the part of the Indians, they immediately fired upon the whites, who retired without returning a shot. One of the whites was mortally wounded.

FEBRUARY 24, 1817.

The charge given me by Colonel Clinch and yourself, and other officers of the United States, induces me to believe there is a confidence placed in me which I ought not to deceive; I therefore think it my duty as well as my inclination to give you the following information: There was a friend of mine, not long since, in the Fowl Town on Flint, and he saw many horses, cattle, and hogs that had come immediately from the State of Georgia; and they are bringing them away continually. They speak in the most contemptuous manner of the Americans, and threaten to have satisfaction for what has been done—meaning the destruction of the Negro fort. There is another of my acquaintances returned immediately from the Seminole towns, and saw the negroes in parade there; he counted about six hundred that bore arms; they have chosen officers of every description, and endeavor to keep up a regular discipline, and are very strict in punishing violators of their military rules. There is said to be about the same number of Indians belonging to their party, and there are both negroes and Indians daily going to their standard. They say they are in complete fix for fighting, and wish for an engagement with the Americans, or McIntosh's troops; they would let them know they had something more to do than they had at Appalachicola. They have chosen Bowlegs for their head, and nominated him King, and pay him all kind of monarchical respect, almost to idolatry, keeping a picket guard at the distance of five miles. They have a number of the likeliest American horses. But there are one or two chiefs that are not of the choir; Kenhagee, the Mickasuky chief, is one that is an exception.

Extract of a letter from Archibald Clarke, Intendant of St. Mary's Georgia, to General Gaines, dated

FEBRUARY 26, 1817.

On the 25th instant the house of Mr. Garret, residing in the upper part of this county, near the boundary of Wayne county, was attacked during his absence, near the middle of the day, by this party, consisting of about fifteen, who shot Mrs. Garret in two places, and despatched her by stabbing and scalping. Her two children, one about three years, the other two months, were also murdered, and the eldest scalped; the house was then plundered of every article of value, and set on fire.

Extract of a letter from Richard M. Sands, 4th infantry, commanding at Fort Gaines, Georgia, to Colonel William King, or officer commanding the 4th regiment of infantry, dated

MARCH 15, 1817.

I enclose, for your information, two letters which I received a few days since. Yesterday William Perryman, accompanied by two of the Lower chiefs, arrived here; he informs me that McQueen, the chief mentioned in one of the enclosed letters, is at present one of the heads of the hostilities; that they are anxious for war, and have lately murdered a woman and two children. He likewise says that he expects the news in George Perryman's letter is true, for there are talks going through the towns that the English are to be at Ochlochnee river in three months.

Extract of a letter from David B. Mitchell, Indian agent, to the Secretary of War, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA.

March 30, 1817.

By yesterday's mail I received a letter from Mr. Timothy Barnard, who resides at Flint river, in the Indian country, a considerable distance below the agency, in which he observes: "I have been informed two days past, from below, where the Red Stick class reside, that a party has been down near St. Mary's, and murdered a woman and two children, and brought off some horses." "I will further state that I have received information from other persons at and near Fort Gaines, that a British agent is now among these hostile Indians, and that he has been sending insolent messages to the friendly Indians and white men settled above the Spanish line; he is also charged with stimulating the Indians to their present hostile aspect; but whether he is an acknowledged agent of any foreign Power, or a mere adventurer, I do not pretend to determine, but am disposed to believe him the latter."

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T.,

April 3, 1817.

I received by the last mail a letter from Archibald Clarke, Esq., Intendant of the town of St. Marys, by which it appears that another outrage, of uncommon cruelty, has recently been perpetrated by a party of Indians upon the Southern frontier, near the boundary of Wayne county. They have massacred a woman, (Mrs. Garret,) and two of her children; the mother and eldest child were scalped; the house plundered and burnt.

Extract of a letter from A. Culloh to General Gaines, written at Fort Gaines.

We are hourly told by every source of information, by the friendly Indians, by letters from William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, who reside low down on the Appalachicola, that all the lower tribes of Indians have imbodyed, and are drying their meats to come on to the attack of this post. The British agent at Ochlochnee Sound is giving presents to the Indians. We have among us Indians who have been down and received powder, lead, tomahawks, knives and a drum for each town, with the royal coat of arms painted on it. We have at this time at least five hundred Indians skulking in this neighborhood, within three or four miles of us, who will not act for themselves, and who are evidently waiting for the signal to strike an effectual blow. They have stolen almost every horse belonging to the citizens. They have scared them from the fields which they have cleared, and have taken possession of their houses. They are now stealing horses, cattle, and hogs, from the Georgia lines, and have killed one or two families on the Satilla.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA,

November 21, 1817.

The first brigade arrived at this place on the 19th instant. I had previously sent an Indian runner, to notify the first town chief, E-me-hemant-by, of my arrival, and, with a view to ascertain whether his hostile temper had abated, requesting him to visit me. He replied that he had already said to the commanding officer here all he had to say, and he would not come.

Among the articles found in the house of the chief was a British uniform coat (scarlet) with a pair of gold epaulets, and a certificate signed by a British captain of marines, "Robert White, in the absence of Colonel Nicholls," stating that the chief had always been a true and faithful friend to the British.

The reports of friendly Indians concur in estimating the number of hostile warriors, including the Red Sticks and Seminoles, at more than two thousand, besides the blacks, amounting to near four hundred men, and increasing by runaways from Georgia. They have been promised, as several Indians inform me, assistance from the English at New Providence. This promise, though made by Woodbine, is relied on by most of the Seminole Indians. I have not a doubt but they will sue for peace as soon as they find their hopes of British aid to be without a foundation.

General Gaines to the Secretary of War—with a talk.

HEADQ'RS, FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA,

December 2, 1817.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on the 26th ultimo, your communication of the 30th October.

I am very happy to find that the President approves of my movement, but I much regret that his just expectations as to the effect there was reason to believe would be produced on the minds of the Indians by this movement have not been realized. I am now quite convinced that the hostility of these Indians is, and has long since been, of so deep a character as to leave no ground to calculate upon tranquillity, or the future security of our frontier settlements, until the towns south and east of this place shall receive a signal proof of our willingness to retaliate for every outrage. It is now my painful duty to report an affair of a more serious and decisive nature than has heretofore occurred, and which leaves no doubt of the necessity of an immediate application of force, and active measures on our part. A large party of Seminole Indians on the 30th ultimo formed an ambuscade upon the Appalachicola river, a mile below the junction of the Flint and Chatahoochee, attacked one of our boats ascending near the shore, and killed, wounded, and took the greater part of the detachment, consisting of forty men, commanded by Lieutenant R. W. Scott, of the 7th infantry. There were also on board, killed or taken, seven women, the wives of soldiers. Six men of the detachment only escaped, four of whom were wounded. They report that the strength of the current at the point of attack had obliged the lieutenant to keep his boat near the shore; that the Indians had formed along the banks of the river, and were not discovered till their fire had commenced, in the first volley of which Lieutenant Scott and his most valuable men fell.

The lieutenant and his party had been sent from this place some days before to assist Major Muhlenberg in ascending the river with three vessels laden with military stores brought from Montgomery and Mobile. The Major, instead of retaining the party to assist him, as I had advised, (see enclosure No. 2,) retained only about twenty men, and in their place put a like number of sick, with the women, and some regimental clothing. The boat, thus laden, was detached alone for this place. It is due to Major Muhlenberg to observe that, at the time he detached the boat, I have reason to believe he was not apprized of any recent hostilities having taken place in this quarter. It appears, however, from Lieutenant Scott's letter, received about the hour in which he was attacked, (see enclosure No. 3.) that he had been warned of the danger. Upon the receipt of this letter, I had two boats fitted up with covers and port-holes for defence, and detached Captain Clinch with an officer and forty men, with an order to secure the movement of Lieutenant Scott, and then to assist Major Muhlenberg.

This detachment embarked on the evening of the 30th, and must have passed the scene of action below at night, and some hours after the affair terminated. I have not yet heard from Captain Clinch. I shall immediately strengthen the detachment under Major Muhlenberg with another boat, secured against the enemy's fire. He will, therefore, move up with safety, keeping near the middle of the river. I shall moreover, take a position with my principal force at the junction of the river, near the line; and shall attack any vessel that may attempt to intercept our vessel and supplies below, as I feel persuaded the order of the President, prohibiting an attack upon the Indians below the line, has reference only to the past, and not to the present or future outrages, such as the one just now perpetrated, and such as shall place our troops strictly within the pale of natural law, where self-defence is sanctioned by the privilege of self-preservation. The wounded men who made their escape concur in the opinion that they had seen upwards of five hundred hostile Indian warriors at different places below the point of attack. Of the force engaged they differ in opinion; but all agree that the number was very considerable, extending about one hundred and fifty yards along the shore, in the edge of a swamp or thick woods. I am assured by the friendly chief that the hostile warriors of every town upon the Chatahoochee prepared canoes and pushed off down the river to join the Seminoles as soon as the account of my movement from the Alabama reached them.

The Indians now remaining upon the Chatahoochee, I have reason to believe, are well disposed. One of the new settlers, however, has recently been killed; but it has been clearly proved that the murderer had belonged to the hostile party. The friendly chiefs in the neighborhood, when apprized of the murder assembled a party, and sent in pursuit of the offender, and followed him to the Flint river, on the route to Mickasuky, whither he escaped. Onishajo and several other friendly chiefs, have offered me their services, with their warriors, to go against the Seminoles. I have promised to give them notice of the time that may be fixed for my departure, and then to accept their services. The enclosure No. 1 contains the substance of what I have said to the chiefs who have visited me; several of whom reside south of the Spanish line, and west of Appalachicola river. It was expected by the chiefs that I should communicate to them my views and wishes. I felt authorized to say but little, and I deemed it necessary, in what I should say, to endeavor to counteract the erroneous impressions by which they have been misled by pretended British agents.

I hope the President will see in what I have said nothing to disapprove. I feel persuaded a report of the various talks which I received from the chiefs would show the propriety of what I have said to them; such a report I have not a moment's time now to make. The Indians are at this moment firing at our camp from the opposite side of the river.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major General commanding.

Talk enclosed in 51 a, (No. 1.)

FORT SCOTT, November, 1817.

SIR: The waters having risen sufficiently high to enable you to ascend the river with all the vessels, I wish you to do so, though it should take longer than I had anticipated. You can avail yourself of the aid of Lieutenant Scott's detachment to expedite your movement hither. Keep your vessels near to each other; and, should you meet any insuperable obstacle, endeavor to apprise me thereof, and you shall have additional relief. Wishing to see you soon, with your fleet, I remain, with great regard, your obedient servant,

E. P. GAINES.

Lieutenant Scott to General Gaines.

SPANISH BLUFF, November 28, 1817.

SIR: Enclosed you will receive Major Muhlenberg's communication, which he directs me to forward to you by express from this place. Mr. Hambly informs me that Indians are assembling at the junction of the river, where they intend to make a stand against those vessels coming up the river. Should this be the case, I am not able to make a stand against them. My command does not exceed forty men, and one-half sick and without arms. I leave this immediately.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. W. SCOTT,

Lieut. 7th Infantry, com'g detachment.

NOTE.—The bearer of this is entitled to three dollars on delivering this letter. The Indians have a report here that the Indians have beaten the white people.

General Gaines to Captain Clinch.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT SCOTT,
November 30, 1817.

SIR: You will embark with the party assigned you on board the covered boats; descend the river until you meet with Lieutenant Scott; deliver to him a cover for his boat, and give him such assistance as, in your judgment, shall be necessary to secure his party, and expedite his movement to this place. You will then proceed, with the residue of your command, down the river, until you meet with Major Muhlenberg; report to him, and act under his orders. You will, in no case, put your command in the power of the Indians near the shore. Be constantly on the alert. Remember that United States troops can never be surprised by Indians without a loss of honor, to say nothing of the loss of strength that might ensue.

General Jackson to the Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Bowlegs's Town, Suwanee river,
April 20, 1818.

SIR: My last communication, dated Camp before St. Mark's, 8th April, and those to which it referred, advised you of my movements and operations up to that date, and, as I then advised you, I marched from that place on the morning of the 9th. On the evening of the 10th I was joined by the rear of the Tennessee volunteers, also by the Indians under General McIntosh, whom I had left at Mickasuky to scour the country around that place. Although the weather has been dry and pleasant, and the waters had subsided in a great degree, our march might be said to have been through water, which kept the infantry wet to the middle; and the depth of the swamps, added to the want of forage, occasioned the horses to give out daily in great numbers. On the morning of the 12th, near Econfinnah, or Natural Bridge, a party of Indians were discovered on the margin of a swamp, and attacked by General McIntosh and about fifty Tennessee volunteers, who routed them, killing thirty-seven warriors, and capturing six men and ninety-seven women and children; also recapturing a white woman who had been taken at the massacre of Scott. The friendly Indians also took some horses and about five hundred head of cattle from the enemy, who proved to be McQueen's party. Upon the application of an old woman of the prisoners, I agreed that if McQueen was tied and carried to the commandant of St. Mark's, her people should be received in peace, carried to the upper tribes of the Creek nation, and there provisioned until they could raise their own crops. She appeared much pleased with those terms, and I set her at liberty, with written instructions to the commandant of St. Mark's to that effect. Having received no further intelligence from McQueen, I am induced to believe the old woman has complied with her part of the obligation.

From St. Mark's I marched with eight days' rations, those that joined me having but five; this was done under the expectation of reaching this place in that time, founded on the report of my faithful Indian guide, which I should have accomplished but for the poverty of my horses and the continued sheets of water through which we had to pass. On the morning of the 15th my scouts overtook a small party of Indians, killing one man and capturing the residue, consisting of one man and woman and two children, and on that evening I encamped, as my guide supposed, within twelve miles of Suwanee. I marched very early on the 16th, under the hope of being able to encompass and attack the Indian and negro towns by one o'clock, P. M., but, much to my regret, at three o'clock, and after marching sixteen miles, we reached a remarkable pond, which my guide recollected, and reported to be distant six miles from the object of my march; here I should have halted for the night, had not six mounted Indians, (supposed to be spies,) who were discovered, effected their escape: this determined me to attempt, by a forced movement, to prevent the removal of their effects, and, if possible, themselves from crossing the river, for my rations being out, it was all-important to secure their supplies for the subsistence of my troops. Accordingly, my lines of attack were instantly formed and put in motion, and about sunset my left flank column, composed of the second regiment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Colonel Williamson, and a part of the friendly Indians, under Colonel Kanard, having approached the left flank of the centre town and commenced their attack, caused me to quicken the pace of the centre, composed of the regulars, Georgia militia, and my volunteer Kentucky and Tennessee guards, in order to press the enemy in his centre, while the right column, composed of the first regiment of Tennessee volunteers, under Colonel Dyer, and a part of the friendly Indians, headed by General McIntosh, who had preceded me, were endeavoring to turn his left and cut off his retreat to the river; they, however, having been previously informed of our force, by a precipitate retreat soon crossed the river, where, it is believed, Colonel Kanard, with his Indians, did them considerable injury. Nine negroes and two Indians were found dead, and two negro men made prisoners.

On the 17th foraging parties were sent out, who found a considerable quantity of corn and some cattle. The 18th, having obtained some small craft, I ordered General Gaines across the river with a strong detachment and two days' provision to pursue the enemy. The precipitancy of their flight was soon discovered by the great quantity of goods, corn, &c., strewn through the swamps, and convinced General Gaines that pursuit was in vain. Nine Indians and five negro prisoners were taken by our Indians. The evidence of haste with which the enemy had fled induced the General to confine his reconnoissance to search for cattle and horses, both of which were much wanted by the army. About thirty head of cattle were procured; but, from the reports accompanying General Gaines's, which will in due time be forwarded to you, and the disobedience of his orders by the Indians, not one pound was brought into camp.

As soon as time will permit, I shall forward a detailed account of the various little affairs with the enemy, accompanied with reports of the commanding officers of the detachment. Suffice it for the present to add, that every officer and soldier under my command, when danger appeared, showed a steady firmness, which convinced me that, in the event of a stubborn conflict, they would have realized the best hopes of their country and General.

I believe I may say that the destruction of this place, with the possession of St. Mark's, having, on the night of the 18th, captured the late Lieutenant Ambrister, of the British marine corps, and, as represented by Arbuthnot, successor to Woodbine, will end the Indian war for the present; and should it be renewed, the position taken, which ought to be held, will enable a small party to put it down promptly.

I shall order, or take myself, a reconnoissance west of the Appalachicola at Pensacola point, where, I am informed, there are a few Red Sticks assembled, who are fed and supported by the Governor of Pensacola. My health being impaired, as soon as this duty is performed, the positions taken, well garrisoned, and security given to the southern frontiers, (if the Government have not active employment for me,) I shall return to Nashville to regain my health. The health of the troops is much impaired, and I have ordered the Georgia troops to Hartford to be mustered, paid, and discharged; the General having communicated his wishes, and that of his troops, to be ordered directly there, and reporting that they have a plenty of corn and beef to subsist them to that point. I have written to the Governor of Georgia to obtain from the State the necessary funds to pay General Glascock's brigade when discharged, and that the Government will promptly refund it. I am compelled to this mode to have them promptly paid, Mr. Hogan, the paymaster of the seventh infantry, (for whom I received from Mr. Brent an enclosure said to contain $50,000,) not having reached me.

From the information received from Ambrister and a Mr. Cook, who was captured with him, that A. Arbuthnot's schooner was at the mouth of this river, preparing to sail for the bay of Tampa, my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, volunteered his services with a small detachment to descend the river and capture her. The importance of this vessel to transport my sick to St. Mark's, as well as to destroy the means used by the enemy, induced me to grant his request; he sailed yesterday, and I expected to have heard from him this morning. I only await his report to take up the line of march on my return for St. Mark's. The Georgia brigade, by whom I send this, being about to march, compels me to close it without the report of Lieutenant Gadsden.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ANDREW JACKSON.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort St. Marks, April 26, 1818.

SIR: I wrote you from Bowlegs' Town on the 20th instant. On the night of the same day I received the expected despatch from my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, communicating the success of his expedition: and, on the next day, as soon as the sick of my army were despatched down the Suwanee river, to be conveyed in the captured schooner to St. Mark's, I took up the line of march for that fort. I arrived at this place last evening, performing a march of one hundred and seven miles in less than five days. Lieutenant Gadsden had reached it a few hours before me. He communicates having found, among the papers of Arbuthnot, Ambrister, and Cook, letters, memorials, &c., all pointing out the instigators of this savage war, and, in some measure, involving the British Government in the agency. These will be forwarded you in a detailed report I purpose communicating to you as early as practicable.

The old woman spoken of in my last communication to you, who promised to use her influence in having McQueen captured and delivered up, has not been heard of. From signs discovered on the opposite shore of the St. Mark's river, I am induced to believe that the Indian party is still in this neighborhood. A detachment will be sent out to reconnoitre the country, to receive them as friends if disposed to surrender, or inflict merited chastisement if still hostile.

I shall leave this in two or three days for Fort Gadsden, and, after making all necessary arrangements for the security of the positions occupied, and detaching a force to scour the country west of the Appalachicola, I shall proceed direct for Nashville. My presence in this country can no longer be necessary. The Indian forces have been divided and scattered, cut off from all communication with those unprincipled agents of foreign nations who had deluded them to their ruin; they have not the power, if the will remains, of again annoying our frontier.

I remain, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

General Jackson to the Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Gadsden, May 5, 1818.

SIR: I returned to this post with my army on the evening of the 2d instant, and embrace an early opportunity of furnishing you a detailed report of my operations to the east of the Appalachicola river. In the several communications addressed to you from Hartford, Fort Scott, and this place, I have stated the condition of the army on my assuming the immediate command, the embarrassment occasioned from the want of provisions, the privations of my troops on their march from the frontiers of Georgia, and the circumstances which compelled me to move directly down the Appalachicola river to meet with and protect the expected supplies from New Orleans. These were received on the 25th of March, and on the next day I was prepared for active operations. For a detailed account of my movements from that period to this day you are respectfully referred to the report prepared by my adjutant general, accompanied with Captain Hugh Young's topographical sketch of the route and distance performed. This has been principally a war of movements. The enemy, cut off from their strongholds, or deceived in the promised foreign aid, have uniformly avoided a general engagement. Their resistance has generally been feeble; and in the partial rencontres into which they seem to have been involuntarily forced, the regulars, volunteers, and militia, under my command, realized my expectations; every privation, fatigue, and exposure was encountered with the spirit of soldiers, and danger was met with a degree of fortitude calculated to strengthen the confidence I had reposed in them.

On the commencement of my operations, I was strongly impressed with a belief that this Indian war has been excited by some unprincipled foreign or private agents. The outlaws of the old Red Stick party had been too severely convinced, and the Seminoles were too weak in numbers to believe that they could possibly alone maintain a war with even partial success against the United States. Firmly convinced, therefore, that succor had been promised from some quarter, or that they had been deluded into a belief that America dare not violate the neutrality of Spain by penetrating to their towns, I early determined to ascertain these facts, and so direct my movements as to undeceive the Indians. After the destruction of the Mickasukian villages, I marched for St. Mark's. The correspondence between myself and the Spanish commandant, in which I demanded the occupancy of that fortress with an American garrison, accompanies this. It had been reported to me, direct from the Governor of Pensacola, that the Indians and negroes unfriendly to the United States had demanded of the commandant of St. Mark's a supply of ammunition, munitions of war, &c., threatening, in the event of a noncompliance, to take possession of the fort. The Spanish commandant acknowledged the defenceless state of his fortress, and his inability to defend it; and the Governor of Pensacola expressed similar apprehensions. The Spanish agents throughout the Floridas had uniformly disavowed having any connexion with the Indians, and acknowledged the obligations of His Catholic Majesty, under existing treaties, to restrain their outrages against the citizens of the United States. Indeed, they declared that the Seminole Indians were viewed as alike hostile to the Spanish Government, and that the will remained, though the power was wanting, to inflict merited chastisement on this lawless tribe. It was, therefore, to be supposed that the American army, impelled by the immutable laws of self-defence to penetrate the territory of His Catholic Majesty, to fight his battles, and even to relieve from a cruel bondage some of his own subjects, would have been received as allies, hailed as deliverers, and every facility afforded to them to terminate speedily and successfully this savage war. Fort St. Mark's could not be maintained by the Spanish force garrisoning it. The Indians and negroes viewed it as an asylum, if driven from their towns, and were preparing to occupy it in this event. It was necessary to anticipate their movements, independent of the position being deemed essential as a depot, on which the success of my future operations measurably depended. In the spirit of friendship, therefore, I demanded its surrender to the army of the United States until the close of the Seminole war. The Spanish commandant required time to reflect. It was granted. A negotiation ensued, and an effort was made to protract it to an unreasonable length. In the conversations between my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, and the Spanish commandant, circumstances transpired convicting him of a disposition to favor the Indians, and of having taken an active part in aiding and abetting them in this war. I hesitated, therefore, no longer; and as I could not be received in friendship, I entered the fort by violence. Two light companies of the 7th regiment of infantry, and one of the 4th, under the command of Major Twiggs, were ordered to advance, lower the Spanish colors, and hoist the star-spangled banner on the ramparts of Fort St. Mark's. The order was executed promptly. No resistance was attempted on the part of the Spanish garrison. The duplicity of the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's, in professing friendship towards the United States while he was actually aiding and supplying her savage enemies, throwing open the gates of his garrison to their free access, appropriating the King's stores to their use, issuing ammunition and munitions of war to them, and knowingly purchasing of them property plundered from the citizens of the United States, is clearly evinced by the documents accompanying my correspondence. In Fort St. Mark's, as an inmate of the family of the Spanish commandant, an Englishman, by the name of Arbuthnot, was found. Unable satisfactorily to explain the objects of his visiting this country, and there being a combination of circumstances to justify a suspicion that his views were not honest, he was ordered into close confinement. The capture of his schooner, near the mouth of Suwanee river, by my aid-de-camp, Mr. Gadsden, and the papers found on board, unveiled his corrupt transactions, as well as those of a Captain Ambrister, late of the British colonial marine corps, taken as a prisoner near Bowlegs' town. Those individuals were tried, under my orders, by a special court of select officers, legally convicted as ex-citizens of this savage and negro war, legally condemned, and most justly punished for their iniquities. The proceedings of the court-martial in this case, with the volume of testimony justifying their condemnation, present scenes of wickedness, corruption and barbarity, at which the heart sickens, and in which, in this enlightened age, it ought not scarcely to be believed that a Christian nation would have participated; and yet the British Government is involved in the agency. If Arbuthnot and Ambrister are not convicted as the authorized agents of Great Britain, there is no room to doubt but that that Government had a knowledge of their assumed character, and was well advised of the measures which they had adopted to excite the negroes and Indians in East Florida to war against the United States. I hope the execution of these two unprincipled villains will prove an awful example to the world, and convince the Government of Great Britain, as well as her subjects, that certain (if slow) retribution awaits these unchristian wretches, who, by false promises, delude, and excite an Indian tribe to all the horrid deeds of savage war.

Previous to my leaving Fort Gadsden, I had occasion to address a communication to the Governor of Pensacola on the subject of permitting supplies to pass up the Escambia river to Fort Crawford. This letter, with a second from St. Mark's, on the subject of some United States' clothing, shipped in a vessel in the employ of the Spanish Government, to that post, I now enclose, with his reply. The Governor of Pensacola's refusal of my demand cannot but be viewed as evincing a hostile feeling on his part, particularly in connexion with some circumstances reported to me from the most unquestionable authority. It has been stated that the Indians at war with the United States have free access into Pensacola; that they are kept advised from that quarter of all our movements; that they are supplied from thence with ammunition and munitions of war; and that they are now collecting in large bodies, to the amount of four or five hundred warriors, in that city; that inroads from thence have lately been made on the Alabama, in one of which eighteen settlers fell by the tomahawk. These statements compel me to make a movement to the west of the Appalachicola; and, should they prove correct, Pensacola must be occupied with an American force, the Governor treated according to his deserts, or as policy may dictate. I shall leave strong garrisons in Fort St. Mark's, Fort Gadsden, and Fort Scott; and in Pensacola, should it become necessary to possess it.

It becomes my duty to state it as my confirmed opinion that, so long as Spain has not the power or will to enforce the treaties by which she is solemnly bound to preserve the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no security can be given to our southern frontier, without occupying a cordon of posts along the seashore. The moment the American army returns from Florida, the war hatchet will be again raised, and the same scenes of indiscriminate murder with which our frontier settlers have been visited will be repeated. So long as the Indians within the territory of Spain are exposed to the delusions of false prophets, and the poison of foreign intrigue; so long as they can receive ammunition, munitions of war, &c., from pretended traders, or Spanish commandants, it will be impossible to restrain their outrages. The burning of their towns, the destroying of their stock and provisions, will produce but temporary embarrassments; resupplied by Spanish authorities, they may concentrate or disperse at will, and keep up a lasting predatory warfare against the frontiers of the United States, as expensive as harassing to her troops. The savages, therefore, must be made dependant on us, and cannot be kept at peace without being persuaded of the certainty of chastisement being inflicted on the commission of the first offence.

I trust, therefore, that the measures which have been pursued will meet the approbation of the President of the United States. They have been adopted in pursuance of your instructions, under a firm conviction that they alone were calculated to insure "peace and security to the southern frontier of Georgia."

The army will move on the 7th from hence, crossing the Appalachicola river at the Ochesee bluff, about thirty miles above.

ANDREW JACKSON.

No. 55.

General Jackson to the Secretary of War.

HEADQUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Montgomery, June 2, 1818.

SIR: In a communication to you of the 5th of May, I detailed at length the operations of my army up to that period. Leaving a strong garrison of regulars in Forts Scott and Gadsden, I resumed my march, with a small detachment of the 4th regiment of infantry, one company of artillery, and the effectives of the Tennessee volunteers, the whole not exceeding twelve hundred men, to fulfil my intentions, communicated to you, of scouring the country west of the Appalachicola river. On the 10th of May, my army crossed that river at the Ochesee village, and, after a fatiguing, tedious, and circuitous march of twelve days, misled by the ignorance of our pilots, and exposed to the severest of privations, we finally reached and effected a passage over the Escambia. On my march, on the 22d of May, a protest from the Governor of Pensacola was delivered me by a Spanish officer, remonstrating in warm terms against my proceedings, and ordering me and my forces instantly to quit the territory of His Catholic Majesty, with a threat to apply force in the event of a non-compliance. This was so open an indication of a hostile feeling on his part, after having been early and well advised of the object of my operations, that I hesitated no longer on the measures to be adopted. I marched for and entered Pensacola with only the show of resistance, on the 24th of May. The Governor had previously fled to Fort Carlos de Barancas, where, it was said, he had resolved upon a most desperate resistance. A correspondence ensued between us, (accompanying this, marked A,) detailing at length my motives for wishing and demanding that Pensacola and its dependencies be occupied with an American garrison. The package marked B are documents substantiating the charges, in part, against the conduct of the Spanish Governor, having knowingly and willingly admitted the savages, avowedly hostile to the United States, within the town of Pensacola.

The peaceable surrender of the fort of Barancas was denied. I marched for and invested it on the evening of the 25th of May, and on the same night pushed reconnoitering parties under its very guns. On the morning of the 26th, a military reconnoissance was taken; and on the same night, a lodgement was made, under a fire from the Spanish garrison, by Captain Gadsden of the engineers, aided by Captains Call and Young, on a commanding position, within three hundred and eighty-five yards of the Spanish works, and a nine-pounder mounted. A howitzer battery was simultaneously established on the capitol, and within seven hundred and sixty yards of the fort. At daylight on the 27th, the Spanish garrison opened their artillery on our batteries; a parley was sounded, a flag sent in, and the surrender of Fort Carlos de Barancas again demanded; the favorable positions obtained were pointed out, and the inutility of resistance urged. Anxious to avoid an open contest, and to save the effusion of blood, the same terms previously offered were again tendered. These were rejected, and offensive operations recommenced. A spirited and well-directed fire was kept up the greater part of the morning, and at intervals during the afternoon. In the evening a flag was sent from the Spanish commandant, offering to capitulate, and a suspension of hostilities was granted until eight o'clock next day, when the enclosed articles of capitulation (marked C) were signed and agreed to. The terms are more favorable than a conquered enemy would have merited; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, my object obtained, there was no motive for wounding the feelings of those whose military pride or honor had prompted to the resistance made. The articles, with but one condition, amount to a complete cession to the United States of that portion of the Floridas hitherto under the government of Don Jose Mazot.

The arrangement which I have made to secure Pensacola and its dependencies are contained in the general orders, marked D. I deemed it most advisable to retain, for the present, the same government to which the people had been accustomed, until such time as the Executive of the United States may order otherwise. It was necessary, however, to establish the revenue laws of the United States, to check the smuggling which had been carried on successfully in this quarter for many years past, and to admit the American merchant to an equal participation in a trade which would have been denied under the partial operations of the Spanish commercial code.

Capt. Gadsden was appointed by me collector, and he has organized and left the department in the charge of officers on whom the greatest confidence may be reposed.

Though the Seminole Indians have been scattered, and literally so divided and reduced as no longer to be viewed as a formidable enemy, yet, as there are still many small marauding parties supposed to be concealed in the swamps of the Perdido, Choctawhatchy, and Chapouley who might make occasional and sudden inroads on our frontier settlers, massacring women and children, I have deemed it advisable to call into service for six months, if not sooner discharged, two companies of volunteer rangers, under Captains McGirt and Boyles, with instructions to scour the country between the Mobile and Appalachicola rivers, exterminating every hostile party who dare resist, or will not surrender and remove with their families above the thirty-first degree of latitude.

The Seminole war may now be considered as at a close, tranquillity again restored to the southern frontier of the United States; and, as long as a cordon of military posts is maintained along the Gulf of Mexico, America has nothing to apprehend from either foreign or Indian hostilities. Indeed, sir, to attempt to fortify or protect an imaginary line, or to suppose that a frontier on the thirty-first degree of latitude, in a wilderness, can be secured by a cordon of military posts while the Floridas lay open to an enemy, is visionary in the extreme.

Under this firm belief, I have bottomed all my operations. Spain had disregarded the treaties existing with the American Government, or had not power to enforce them; the Indian tribes within her territory, and which she was bound to keep at peace, had visited our citizens with all the horrors of savage war; negro brigands were establishing themselves when and where they pleased; and foreign agents were openly and knowingly practising their intrigues in this neutral territory.

The immutable principles, therefore, of self-defence justified the occupancy of the Floridas, and the same principles will warrant the American Government in holding it until such time as Spain can guaranty, by an adequate military force, the maintaining her authority within the colony.

A topographical sketch of the country from the Appalachicola to Pensacola accompanies this. Captain Young will prepare, as soon as practicable, a topographical memoir of that part of the Floridas in which my army has operated, with a map of the country.

Captain Gadsden is instructed to prepare a report on the necessary defences of the country, as far as the military reconnoissance he has taken will permit, accompanied with plans of existing works, what additions or improvements are necessary, and what new works should, in his opinion, be erected to give permanent security to this important territorial addition to our Republic.

As soon as this report is prepared, Captain Gadsden will receive orders to repair to Washington City with some other documents which I may wish to confide to his charge.

At the close of a campaign which has terminated so honorably and happily, it gives me pleasure to express my approbation generally of the officers and soldiers of every species of corps which I have had the honor to command. The patience with which they endured fatigue and submitted to privations, and the determination with which they encountered and vanquished every difficulty, are the strongest indication of the existence of that patriotic feeling which no circumstances can change, and of that irresistible ardor for the defence of their country which will prove her strength and bulwark under any exposure. I should do violence to my feelings if I did not particularly notice the exertions of my Quartermaster General, Colonel George Gibson, who, under the most embarrassing circumstances, relieved the necessities of my army, and to whose exertions I was indebted for the supplies received. His zeal and integrity in this campaign, as well as in the uniform discharge of his duties since his connexion with my staff, merit the approbation and gratitude of his country.

With respect, your most obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General Commanding.

ST. MARY'S RIVER, Sept. 27, 1817.

"On our arrival here, we found General McGregor in command of Amelia Island. A few days afterwards he decamped, and embarked on board the privateer McGregor, formerly the San Josef."

"The noted Woodbine, of infamous memory, arrived here from Nassau, with a view, as was said, to join the patriots; but his friend McGregor having left the cause, he was disappointed, and embarked with McGregor, who sailed a few days since for Nassau, to commence some new expedition, which, it is generally supposed, will be to the bay of Espiritu Santo, or bay of Tampa, in latitude 28 degrees 18 minutes north, and longitude 76 degrees 30 minutes west. This is an extensive bay, and capable of admitting ships of any size, contiguous to which are the finest lands in Florida, which Woodbine pretends belong to him by virtue of a grant from the Indians. He says he has surveyed the whole of the Gulf of Mexico, and Tampa bay is the only place into which large ships can enter."

"My informants, I have no doubt, are possessed of as much information of the views and plans of McGregor and Woodbine as any person in the United States." "They sailed from Amelia in September, in company with a schooner belonging to Woodbine, he being on board. Some time after they had got to sea, General McGregor and family were put on board the schooner with Woodbine, and steered for New Providence."

"From what has been written, it may readily be supposed that my friends had an opportunity of learning something of the plan of the future operations of McGregor and Woodbine, and they believe it to be as follows: Woodbine persuaded McGregor that he could find friends and funds in New Providence, and that a British regiment had lately been disbanded there; that they would pick up as many of the soldiers as possible, and, with what negroes and others they could gather, would make a tolerable force. They were then to sail for Tampa bay, a fine harbor to the north-westward of Cape Florida, where they were to be joined by 1,500 Indians, already engaged to Woodbine, and invade Florida from that point; they were then to march across, and attack St. Augustine."

[Enclosed in letter of December 24, 1817.]

The vessels must be at Tampa bay, commonly called Espiritu Santo. I calculate to be at Tampa bay by the latter end of April, or 1st day of May, 1818. There are three bars: the northernmost bar is best, having five fathom water; keep on the larboard shore, going in. There is a small sandy key between the northern and middle channels; upon this sandy key there will be a flag-staff, and, on hoisting your signal, you will be answered by the Florida flag, and a pilot will come off.

BALTIMORE, July 30, 1817.

Allow me now to relate, in detail, the particulars of my intercourse with General McGregor whilst in this city, in regard to his objects. He declared his object to be, in the first place, to take possession of Amelia; thence to wrest the Floridas from Spain, when he should immediately call on the inhabitants, by proclamation, to designate some of their most respectable fellow-citizens to form a constitution on the model of some of the adjoining States; that, so far as it might depend on him, he would encourage the existing disposition of the people in that section to confederate with the United States; leaving it to the will and policy of this [our] Government, and to political circumstances, as they might arise, to indicate the most favorable time for their admission into the Union.

I leave this to-day for England, to arrange my private affairs, which, from the many years that I have been in South America, have not improved by my absence; my family remain here until my return."

stand by whose authority, and for what purpose, the accused came into the country?

Answer. I have frequently heard him say he came to attend to Mr. Woodbine's business at the bay of Tampa.

From the examination of JOHN J. ARBUTHNOT, a witness on the part of the prosecution:

"And that the prisoner stated to him that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business to see the negroes righted."

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear me say that I came on Woodbine's business?

Answer. I did.

From the examination of PETER B. COOK, a witness on the part of the prosecution:

"The prisoner told the witness that he had been a lieutenant in the British Army, under Colonel Nicholls. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa, to see about those negroes he had left there. The prisoner told the witness that he had written a letter to Governor Cameron for ammunition for the Indians, some time in March; and also told the witness that he had a commission in the patriot army under McGregor, and that he expected a captaincy."

BAHAMA ISLAND:

To His Royal Highness Frederick, Duke of York, Commander-in-chief, &c., the memorial of Robert Christie Ambrister, of the Island of New Providence, gentleman, humbly sheweth:

That your memorialist, a British subject, and son of James Ambrister, Esq., lieutenant colonel, and commanding the militia of New Providence, having served for nearly four years past as midshipman in the British navy, on board His Majesty's ships Sparrow, Captain Edward Burt, Rhodan, Captain George Mowbray, Reindeer, Captain J. P. Douglass, and Bramble, Captain William P. Poyson; from which last-mentioned ship he obtained his discharge in England in 1813, and returned to the island of New Providence, where his friends reside; that Major Nicholls, of the royal marines, having shortly after arrived at the said island of New Providence, in His Majesty's ship Hermes, in company with His Majesty's ship Carron, for the purpose of raising recruits for a corps denominated the corps of colonial marines, destined to serve during the American war in such parts of the Indian territory bordering upon the United States of America, or in the States themselves, as circumstances should render it necessary, your memorialist applied for, and obtained, a commission of auxiliary second lieutenant in that regiment, which he immediately joined, and proceeded, under the command of the said Major Edward Nicholls, to Appalachicola, from whence he proceeded to the Creek nation, where he served until those forces were disbanded upon the termination of hostilities with the Americans, when he returned to the said island of New Providence.

And your memorialist further sheweth, that having been assured by the said Major Nicholls, at the time of his accepting the above-mentioned commission, (a copy of which he begs leave to annex,) that he had no doubt but he would be placed upon half-pay when his services were no longer required, your memorialist is desirous either of obtaining half-pay, or of being more actively employed, and of obtaining a commission either in one of His Majesty's West India regiments, or in such other of His Majesty's regiments as to your Royal Highness shall see fit.

Your memorialist, therefore, humbly prays your Royal Highness to take into your consideration this his memorial, and he shall ever pray.

Ambrister's commission as auxiliary second lieutenant.

By the honorable Sir Alexander Cochrane, Knight of the Bath, Vice Admiral of the Red, and Commander-in-chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, on the North American station, &c., to Mr. Robert C. Ambrister, hereby appointed auxiliary second lieutenant of the corps of colonial marines to be raised upon the continent of North America:

Whereas I have thought fit to send a detachment of the royal marine corps to the Creek nations for the purpose of training to arms such Indians and others as may be friendly to, and willing to fight under the standard of His Majesty, I do, by these presents, constitute and appoint you an auxiliary second lieutenant of such corps of colonial marines as may be raised upon the continent of North America, to hold such local rank while actually employed upon the said continent, until further orders. You are therefore carefully and diligently to discharge the duty of auxiliary second lieutenant, by exercising and well-disciplining both the inferior officers and marines of the said corps; and I do hereby command them to obey you as their second auxiliary lieutenant. And you are to observe and follow such orders and directions from me, or any other of your superior officers, according to the rules and discipline of war, in pursuance of the trust hereby reposed in you.

Given under my hand and seal, at Bermuda, this 25th day of July, 1814, in the fifty fourth year of His Majesty's reign.

SUWANEE, January 19, 1818.

MY DEAR AMELIA: I have embraced this opportunity of writing you, hoping to find you well, as it leaves me at present; and I am very sorry to inform you of the times at present. We are threatened every day by the d—d Americans; not threatened only, but they have made an attempt, which we have stopped. On 1st December I marched with thirty men to go against them. After seven days' march we arrived at the fort; and, after our men got rested I went against it. We had an engagement for four hours, and seeing that we could do no good with them, we retreated and came off. The balls flew like hail stones; there was a ball that had like to have done my job; it just cleared my breast. For six days and six nights we had to encamp in the wild woods, and it was constantly raining night and day; and as for the cold, I suffered very much by it; in the morning the water would be frozen about an inch thick. There was a boat that was taken by the Indians which had in it thirty men, seven women, and four small children; there were six of the men who got clear, and one woman saved, and all the rest of them got killed; the children were taken by the heels, and their brains dashed out against the boat. We have got Mr. Hambly and Doyle prisoners, and we are going to send them to Nassau to stand their trial, as they have caused all this disturbance. Hambly told me that it was published in the American newspapers that they were to take possession of the nation in March; and if that be the case, you will see us sooner than you expected. If they should come when the vessel is away, we shall have to take to and run in our canoes, as we have some very fine ones here. One knows not hardly what to do for those d—d puppies, as we may call them, for they are no better.

We find that what I have mentioned is all d—d lies. But Arbuthnot has threatened my life once or twice; but, on my return, I will punish him by the law. You must excuse my bad writing, as I am in a hurry. Give my love to your mother and your sister, and Mrs. Roberts, and all inquiring friends. I have nothing more to say at present, as times will not admit.

I remain yours, forever,

PETER B. COOK.

OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, May 3, 1817.

SIR: On my return here this day, I received a letter signed by you, and dated the 23d March last. As you have taken the trouble of advising me, you will, of course, expect my reply; and I embrace the opportunity of doing it at length. First let me premise, sir, that when you lived at Prospect Bluff, a clerk to Messrs. Forbes & Co., you did not consider Cappachimico, McQueen, or any other of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation, as outlaws. Does the man whom the attachment of Cappachimico has saved from the hands of retributive justice presume to call him an outlaw? For shame, sir! The most hardened villain would not thus calumniate the saviour of his life. Your generous friend, sir, and the other chiefs, have called me to this country. They insist on the fulfilment of my promise; and, as an honest man, I will endeavor to do it. Let your arm of justice fall on the guilty. An honest and upright man, who harms no man, and endeavors to do all the good he can, fears no man or judge; his acts are open to inspection, and will bear the test of scrutiny. Thus, sir, I answer your insinuation, that, since my arrival in this country, I have instigated persons to steal and murder. Ask the lieutenant commanding at Fort Gaines if the letter I wrote him bears the features of an instigator to murder. Ask Opoy Hatcho if the recommendatory note I sent him, by order of Opoy, breathes the strains of a murderer. Ask Opoy himself if my language and advice to him was that of a murderer. Ask Mappalitchy, a chief residing on the Ockmulgee, among the Americans, what my advice was. All those will contradict your vile insinuation. But Mappalitchy informed me the Cowetas were all pleased with the letter and my note Opoy sent them, and perfectly accorded with my sentiments of living as brethren, and as one large family, respecting their neighbors, but, at the same time, at all times ready to protect their property. Yet several of them, a few days afterwards, (no doubt influenced by some humane and good man,) recanted their promise, and ordered a letter to be written me; which letter, I presume, I have this day received, signed by you. Now, sir, if your principles were as humane as mine—if you took as much pleasure in fostering any spark of friendship the upper Indians may show to their brethren of the lower nation as you do in fomenting the quarrels between them, you would then be their friend and benefactor. You, sir, that speak their language fluently, have much in your power; but I fear you use that power to the injury of all, and, eventually, to your own ruin. Let me advise you to change your tone and mode of acting. How much more creditable would it be for you to propagate friendly actions, and create an attachment among the Indians of all nations one to the other, than to endeavor to foment quarrels, and have your emissaries in every quarter of the nation spreading false reports, tending to harass and disturb them. Now, sir, with regard to your and Mr. Doyle's reporting that I am no Englishman, and only one of those wild adventurers who risk life and property for lucre, be pleased to come down to Ochlochnee, and I will show you a letter written by Earl Bathurst to Governor Cameron, (and which I received from him to read to the chiefs of the Creek nation,) an answer to a letter, I believe, written by you, early in the Spring of 1816.

I shall not reflect on the part you took in blowing up the fort at Prospect Bluff; it is not my business. I know the blacks used you shamefully, as they did all that went near them, yet I think the revenge you took savors much of a savage.

Do not think, sir, that I am to be frightened away from this place while I have the protection of the Spaniards, and the support of honest men. An upright man is not easily daunted.

I keep a copy of this letter, and send a copy of yours, with my answer, to Opoy Hatcho, and, as I am in daily expectation of letters from New Providence, perhaps they may induce me to write you further.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

The murders and thefts you talk of I do not believe. There are a parcel of outlaws calling themselves Americans, who are continually coming into the nation, stealing cattle, &c., and lately, I hear, one was killed out of three, and his horse taken and publicly sold while in the act of stealing and driving off cattle.

Indian Talk.

To our good brother the Chief Tustonaky Thlucco, the Big Warrior:

Your brothers, chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are put to the talk we now send you, have found it necessary to hold the same, that their sentiments and opinions may be known to all their red brethren of the four nations, and stop the mouths of bad men who are continually sending false and bad talks to us as well as to our brethren, for the purpose of making ill-blood between us. Know, then, we have met at Ochlochnee Sound with our warriors and young chiefs, and have held our talk, which is this:

The red brethren of the four nations are all descended from the same fathers, and ought to live as brothers; and for this reason we now take them by the hand, to live henceforth at peace and united to each other, and let no bad talks be listened to, or come among us.

When Colonel Nicholls, the English officer who was last among us, went away, he gave us a good talk, desiring us to live well with all our brethren, and never permit ill-blood to be between us, and to respect the Americans that were our neighbors, and not molest them, or permit our people to steal. We have carefully kept this talk, followed his advice, &c.

It is nearly three years since we received a white bead from the Cherokees; we have held it sacred, and it has been in our — at all our talks; we now send you, that you may forward to their head, Minichico Mico, a pipe from his old friends; you will also send him the present talk, and from him let it be sent to the Chickasaws, and from them to the Choctaws.

Colonel Nicholls promised us to send people from England to keep stores in different parts of the nation to furnish us with goods; he had found people willing to come, but when they heard that the fort of Appalachicola was destroyed, they were fearful of coming, and withdrew their promise.

Let us protect all white men that give us good talks, but let us not regard or listen to those who give us bad ones, but rather send them from among us, for he must be a bad man who wishes ill-blood between brothers.

From this time, therefore, let us not listen to any bad talks; let us all hold each other fast by the hand of peace, and each brother hold the other in his heart.

This is sent with a good will, and will be kept by us.

Mr. Arbuthnot to the Honorable Charles Bagot.

[Found with Arbuthnot's papers.]

SIR: On my return to this from the Indian nation, about a month since, I received a letter from Mr. Moodie, annexing an extract from a letter of your excellency, and which in future shall be attended to, when I have occasion to write on Indian affairs.

As I am now especially authorized by the chiefs whose names I beg leave to annex to the present to make such representations as may be of service to the nation, and learning by the copy of a letter from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that your excellency is instructed to watch over the interests of the four nations, I shall take the liberty to lay before your excellency such matters as have come under my own observation, and what has been reported to me by chiefs in whose veracity I can place some confidence. On my arrival at Ochlochee Sound last January, I was met by several of the principal chiefs, who reiterated the complaints that were stated to your excellency in their letter of last November. On the Chatahoochee particularly, they stated the Americans were descending in numbers, driving the poor Indian from his habitation. The report was confirmed some weeks after by Otosmico, the chief of the town of Ecan Halloway, on the Chatahoochee, who informed me that the officer commanding at Fort Gaines had repeatedly sent messages to him, desiring he would submit to live under the American Government, and threatening that his non-compliance would force him to turn the guns of the fort against the town and drive them out. These threats, and swarms of American settlers descending, drove the poor Indians from their homes, and thirty-six fields in a state of cultivation were occupied by the new settlers, and where the houses stood the plough has passed over.

On the Choctawhatchy, which is far within the Indian territory, Americans have formed a large settlement, which, if persisted in, will soon drive the Indians to the extremity of the peninsula.

Agreeably to the treaty between Great Britain and America, the latter were to confine themselves to the same boundaries they enjoyed in 812, prior to the war. This they have not done, but encroached on almost every point of the Indian territory. The chiefs think that it is impossible the conduct of the persons acting so contrary to the treaty can be known to the American Government; and, the more to blind the Government, and to mislead them as to the true state and disposition of the Indians, they are continually spreading reports in the public gazettes, of Georgia, &c., of cruelty committed by the Seminole Indians on inhabitants living on the borders of the United States; whereas it is persons in the back settlements of Georgia who enter the Seminole territory in large parties to steal cattle, which they frequently drive off in gangs of fifty and one hundred at a time; and if in these excursions the Indians meet them and oppose these predatory plunderers, blood sometimes has been spilt, which was the case in April last, when a party of Mickasuky Indians met three men driving off cattle, and attacked them, killing one, and retaking the cattle. But those bloodthirsty back-settlers of Georgia soon retaliated on the poor Indians, for early in June they returned to plunder, and meeting with an Indian encampment they killed one man; another making his escape, they pursued him to another encampment, where they killed two others and a boy; the boy they scalped. Early in July a headman of the town of Suwanee was killed on St. John's river, while hunting, but the chief does not reckon the persons who killed him true Americans. For the better showing your excellency how those poor Indians are abused, I beg leave to enclose you paragraphs taken from American papers, the whole of which are complete fabrications, tending to mislead the American Government. I also beg your excellency's attention to a letter from an American officer, dated at Fort Gaines, with Cappachimico, the head chief of the Seminoles' answer thereto; but notwithstanding it is stated to be by authority of the President of the United States, the gentleman waited no time to receive an answer, but, prior to the chief's messenger arriving at the fort, had continued his road for St. Mary's, leaving them ignorant of what talk he was authorized to give them; and I have since learned that Mr. Dinkins was an officer of General Jackson's staff, travelling through the nation.

HON. CHARLES BAGOT,
H. B. M.'s Ambassador, Washington.

A. Arbuthnot to a person of rank in England.

[Taken from the London Times newspaper of 7th August, 1818.]

SUWANEE, LOWER CREEK NATION,
January 30, 1818.

When I last took the liberty of writing to you, by desire of the chiefs of the Creek nation, I little expected that war would so soon have commenced between the Americans and them. It is, however, actually begun, by the wanton aggressions of the former, in an attack on Fowl Town, during the night. Though this wanton attack has been disavowed by General Mitchell, the American agent for Indian affairs, and he has made reparation for the injury and loss sustained by Inhimathlo and his people, yet the continued aggressions of the Americans, and the numbers pouring into the nation, not from the land side alone, but from Mobile and elsewhere, by the Apalachicola river, have compelled the Indians to take arms as their only resource from oppression.

Your friend Hillis Hadjo has been called by his people to put himself at their head, and he is now encamped at Spanish Bluff, the residence of Doyle and Hambly, which is now in the possession of the Indians, with from one thousand to one thousand two hundred men; those men are principally Red Sticks, who are scattered about in the nation, and who have collected and put themselves under his command, with a few hundred Upper Indians who have joined them.

I cannot allow myself to believe that those encroachments on Indian territory are made with the knowledge of the American Government, and General Mitchell's conduct and message to Kenhagee assure me it is not so. But there are persons who wish to get hold of the Indian lands, and they stick at no means, however cruel and oppressive, to obtain their ends. General Gaines's letter, of August last, to Kenhagee, clearly shows that he and General Jackson are determined, if possible, to get hold of the whole Indian lands. After falsely accusing them of murders, thefts, burning houses, &c., he says: "But there is something out in the sea, a bird with a forked tongue; whip him back before he lands, for he will be the ruin of you yet. Perhaps you do not know what or whom I mean. I mean the name of Englishman."

The other contents of this letter plainly show me that those two Generals have formed a plan of possessing themselves of the whole Indian lands. That this plan has originated with Forbes, Inneraritys, or those of their subordinate agents, I have little doubt, as every part of the conduct of those inferior actors, shows they have been employed for the express purpose of rooting out the poor Indian from his paternal inheritance. The report of Hambly having made sales, in the name of the chiefs, of all the lands from Pensacola to St. Augustine, comes from St. Mark's fort. I shall soon be there, and learn from what source they derive their information.

That false and improper sales have been made, I have no doubt; without such had been the case, the Americans would never have poured into the Indian nation by the Apalachicola.

It is reported that John Forbes has withdrawn from all Indian concerns; but the Inneraritys are enough, with their subordinate agents, to disturb the whole Indian nation; and I have not the least doubt that through them the present troubles come.

The chiefs have written to Governor Cameron for a supply of ammunition, and which Kenhagee informs me Hillis Hadjo, when in England, had orders to demand, in case of actual need. It is really necessary the English Government should do something for those people. In the late war they drew them into their quarrel against America; at the peace they agreed to see them protected in their rights and privileges, and placed on the same footing as before the war; since then they have never troubled themselves about them, thinking it enough that His Majesty's Ambassador had orders to see that those people were protected in their rights and privileges. But how is his excellency the British Ambassador to know if the Indian is righted, and permitted to live quietly on his own land? He interdicts the correspondence of any private individual on Indian affairs, unless it can be put into his hand without any expense. Does he expect a true account of what passes in the Indian nation from the American Government, or from the hiring gazettes of the towns of Upper Georgia? It is the interest of both to deceive, and unless the door is opened for British subjects to speak what they know, and instruct his excellency of such matters respecting the Creek nation as they are certain to be true, he can never have the means of judging what is proper to be done.

I have, by desire of the chiefs, written to his excellency the honorable Charles Bagot on their affairs, and also Governor Cameron, with a demand for a small supply, [of arms, munitions, &c.] of which they stand greatly in need. I trust, sir, you will make such representations to His Majesty's Government as the circumstances of the case require, that those unfortunate people, who look up to you as their friend, may soon rest peaceably and quiet in their country.

You will pardon the liberty I take, which nothing but the pressing solicitations of Kenhagee would have induced me to take; and, with much respect, I am, sir, &c.

Boleck to Governor Coppinger.

[Translation from the Spanish translation received from Governor Coppinger, and communicated by Mr. De Onis, enclosed in his letter of the 27th March, 1818, to the Secretary of State. For the original, in English, see No. 49, court-martial proceedings, No. 2.]

SUWANEE, November 18, 1816.

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you; and I hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and my people. My warriors and others who go to St. Augustine return with false reports, tending to harass and disturb my people, and prevent them attending to their usual avocations. At one time, the Americans, supported by a force of three thousand men, and such of our brethren as they have compelled to join them, are running lines far within our territory; at another, they are collecting a large force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns that may not join them. Now, sir, we know of no reason they can have for attacking an inoffensive and unoffending people, whose wish is to inhabit their woods, without disturbing or being disturbed by any one. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since they made peace with our good father, King George. We have followed the orders of the officer of our father who was among us, Colonel Edward Nicholls, and in nowise molested the Americans, though we daily see them encroaching on our lands, stealing our cattle, and murdering or carrying off our people. We were told by the same officer that, as allies of our father, we were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans, and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before the war; but, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are making daily encroachments, and forging treaties (which they pretend are concluded with our people) for cessions and grants of lands which never were in existence, and the signatures of which are unknown to the chiefs of the Creek nation, who alone have a right to assign or transfer the common property. The want of a proper person among our people to acquaint us with these transactions is the cause of our long silence on them, and leads the world, as well as our friends, to think we are in league with the Americans.

The principal chiefs of the nation assembled lately at my town of Suwanee, and resolved to inform the Minister of King George at Washington of our grievances, and of the conduct and usurpation of the Americans; which was accordingly done, and copies sent to England. Until we have one or more persons among our people to watch over our rights and interests, we shall continue to be exposed to the same conduct on the part of the Americans, whose system appears to be the destruction of our peace and tranquillity, and expelling us from our native land.

You desire that I would chase off those who steal my cattle, &c. Some of my people have lately driven away several Americans who were endeavoring to settle at Lachua; and I do not doubt they will represent that as an act of hostility, although you well know that Lachua is in the heart of my territory, and was, until the Americans killed my brother, our chief town. I return you my thanks for your letter,

And am, with great respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

BOLECK, his X mark,
Chief of the Seminole nation.

ST. AUGUSTINE, IN FLORIDA,

FRIEND AND BROTHER BOLECK: Your letter of the 18th of November was delivered to me yesterday by one of your servants, in which you inform me of the receipt of mine of the 26th September last, and other circumstances which give you and your warriors uneasiness. I see with pain that the whole comes from the information of persons in whom you ought not to place the smallest confidence, it being their principle to employ such opportunities for the purpose of seducing you and your people from their daily labors. In consequence of this, and of what you tell me of your desire to keep up the best understanding and correspondence with me, and of your hope that the opportunities will not be wanting, let me give you such counsel as may be useful to you, your people, and warriors. I will do so from the sentiments of sincere friendship I bear towards you, fearful, however, that the sentiments of others, who come into the territory under the appearance of friendship, but with bad intentions, may influence your minds and obtain your confidence by their flattering representations. It is ascertained here that two persons have lately presented themselves as commissioners of the English nation, who have carried off several runaway negroes belonging to the subjects of the King, my master, and your friend, among whom was one of Don Francisco Pellicer's, and another of Mr. Bunch's, both inhabitants of this province. This did not seem credible to me, as I could not suppose that so good a friend to our nation as you are could consent to such proceedings; but, in case they have really happened, you will be sensible of their great impropriety, and of the just grounds of complaint on the part of the persons so injured, who are desirous, as well as myself, of assuring you of the sincere good-will and friendship we have for the Seminole tribe of Indians, of which you are the chief.

I am, with great respect, your most affectionate and faithful servant,

JOSE COPPINGER.

M. hove to, to wait for canoes seen coming off; came to anchor in two fathoms; six canoes came on board full of Indians and blacks, Billy and Jack among them, with several negroes that were at the bluff; found that Bowlegs and Doherty had started in a canoe last night; this day at meridian observation good, latitude 29° 13', Cedar Keys, the outermost, bearing east-southeast six miles. At 6 P. M. Bowlegs, with retinue, consisting of five canoes, came on board, and continued all night; had a very long talk with Captain W. 27th. The brother-in-law of Bowlegs desired Captain W. to listen to what he had heard from the Spaniards of the Americans' intention of attacking them; they wished to live quietly and attend to their cattle, &c., but could not for the Americans and revolted Spaniards, who daily killed their cattle, &c. This day bought six deer skins, sixteen racoon skins, and three pounds wax, paid in taffia. Bowlegs and retinue left me at 2 P. M.; Captain W. had started about an hour before for Suwanee. At 8 P. M. began to blow fresh from southeast, continued blowing all night. 28th, at 2 P. M., got under way and stood to sea. 29th. Wind north-west, blowing hard and squally, all day beating off and on, double-reefed foresail, reefed mainsail, &c.; at 4 P. M. struck on a shallow bank six miles southeast from the mouth of the river; bore up and stood off; lowered jib and mainsail, and repaired latter, which had given way near the gaff; wore and stood in shore, and came to anchor in fourteen feet water, Great Cedar Key bearing southeast six miles. 30th, at 7 A. M., got under way, and stood for the entrance between the two large keys, luffing and bearing away so as to keep in two fathoms; came to anchor at 9 A. M., a mile and a half from islands. Captain went to sound channel; returned and reported channel to the southward, and that the large island must be brought to bear northeast. At 11 A. M., a canoe, two men, three women and their children, from Cape Anetole; got under way, rounded the bank, and grounded between two banks, where we lay all night. 31st October, warped into a deep channel, with much difficulty drawing her through the mud; wrote W. and Auchisee Indians, and also fishermen; cut poles to stake out channel. 1st November. Wind northeast, extremely cold, again warping, but did not succeed in getting into anchorage; observed meridian, latitude 29° 11', the south end of the Great Cedar Key north-west by north, three-quarters of a mile; the outer or southwest point of the high or South Key southeast and by south one and a half mile; lay quite dry at low water; at 10 P. M. floated off, and stood into a good channel, but laying the warp too far out she tailed on the west side, where we lay for the night, after bowing taut our best bower, laid in mid channel. 2d. Floated off at 10 A. M., and pulled up to good anchorage under the lee of the island; boat went to an inshore key to look for water, and returned two casks full. 3d. Self and captain on shore until half-past 11 A. M.; caught nothing; observation good, latitude 29° 11'; the high part of South Key due east two miles, the sandy beach of Great Cedar Key west half a mile. At sundown, Captain W. arrived from Suwanee; several canoes with negroes at the point; captain returned from fishing on point; some good fish. 4th. Idle all day; afternoon prepared rum, sugar, coffee, and molasses to send Robin Creighton, per colored lad named Charles, (see note thereof;) during the night the wind shifted to the north and north-northeast, drizzling rain and very cold. 5th. Wind north-northeast, rain, and very cold; cleared up before midday; at 4 P. M. two canoes from Suwanee; one came on board, reported Cappachimico and all the chiefs waited for Captain W.; prepared sundry articles for Suwanee, and sent a canoe off to get Frank's canoe to go with Captain W. and self. 6th, at 12 o'clock M., started for Suwanee, in Frank's canoe, camped for the night at the little island, mouth of the river; a canoe, with several men and women, camped at same place, bound for schooner, with corn, &c. 7th. At 4 o'clock A. M. started up the river; at 8 o'clock A. M., camped and breakfasted at Pine bluff, and at 2 o'clock P. M. arrived at Buera landing, took through the pine barren, and lost our way to Christophertown; again getting to the river, at half past 4 P. M. arrived at Robert's; Captain W. and guide had arrived a little before; visited Cappachimico and McQueen at Indiantown. 8th. A long talk with Indians; their complaints of the conduct of the Americans. McQueen mentioned they had taken one of his negroes and confined him in the fort at the forks. A chief from Chehaw said that they had killed three Indians in his neighborhood, on their own ground, and taken eleven horses; several others stated losses in cattle and horses, and the Seminole chiefs in particular; a chief — of — said that, in confidence of the treaty being faithfully fulfilled on the part of the Americans, a half-breed man, named Moses, before the war, settled near the forks, returned to take possession of his fields, and was murdered by the Americans. The chiefs ordered a letter, in way of memorial, to be written to our ambassador in America, and copies to be sent to England, representing the conduct of Americans; the same was done agreeably to the substance of their talk, read and interpreted to them by their own interpreters afterwards; each chief put his mark in my presence, which I certified. 9th. Cold and clear; Cappachimico, McQueen, and the other chiefs met, and had a long talk, more fully particularizing their particular grievances; they also stated the number of forts (seven) the Americans had built, and the roads they had cut, and were still continuing to cut, within their territory.

McQueen stated that McIntosh and the Coweta Indians were the cause of the Americans' conduct; that, after the peace, a deputation had been sent up to have a talk with the commander at Fort Mitchell, in the forks, who were instructed to inform him of what Colonel Nicholls had stated to them with regard to their rights to the territory, prior to the war being guaranteed by the treaty between England and the United States, and to request that he, the commandant, would refrain from further encroachments, and give orders that their lands should be respected. The answer they received from the commander was, that it was all true they had told him, but that he had orders to act as he did. A chief of the Fowl Town Indians stated that the American troops, returning from the destruction of the fort at Prospect Bluff, burnt one entire town and murdered several of their people, because they would not join them when going down the river. The Tiger warrior, and two other men of note, spoke, stating the circumstances of aggression and cruelty that had come to their knowledge. Cappachimico, McQueen, and the others, further stated what reports they had from Doyle, Hambly, &c., and all were of opinion, and firmly believed, that Hambly, a clerk to and influenced by Forbes, was the cause of the destruction of the fort at the bluff; and that Hambly went down the river as a guide to the American army, and was particularly instrumental in its being blown up, as he pointed out to the American officers where the magazines were placed, that they might play their shells against them. Such few negroes as were saved from the explosion unhurt were carried off by the Americans, with cannon, ammunition, arms, &c., that were found in the fort.

N. B. I take no notice of Captain W.'s talk to the Indians, because I doubt much of what he stated was not founded in fact, and was only mentioned by him to strengthen the chiefs in their attachment to the British Government. I say no further on this head. Of his promises, I fear he has also gone too far; and, perhaps, at a future time, when the Indians find them unperformed, the rage for their disappointment may fall on me as a party aiding and abetting Captain W. in his deception. I have gone beyond my promise to Captain W.; I have been deceived in almost everything; and yet he thinks every thing and person must be subservient to him. I have had himself and aid-de-camp on board since the 31st August; in any expedition, in canoe or boat, I have supplied his wants. I kept three negroes on board more than two months on his account. I presented the chiefs for him and on his account. I have seen my provisions taken and given away when we were on short allowance; for Captain W. gives liberally when it is not out of his own pocket, but is extremely covetous when anything is wanted from home.

10th. Cappachimico and McQueen gave me a note of the most necessary articles they wanted immediately, and which I promised them to bring, if possible, by the end of December, and land them as agreed. Gave them a card with seals &c., as a token that, when they received a messenger with the duplicate thereof in R. W., he came with the straight talk from me; made each a present of rum, sugar, coffee, and one hundred cigars; also, the Tiger warrior and two others and the rest had a good lot of cigars each; gave them a parting glass; took leave at twelve, midday.

They all started on horseback. The two deputies that go to Nassau with me left behind.

These men are children of nature; leave them in their forests to till their fields and hunt the stag and graze their cattle, their ideas will extend no farther; and the honest trader, in supplying their moderate wants, may make a handsome profit of them.

They have been ill-treated by the English, and robbed by the Americans; cheated by those who have dealt with them, receiving goods and other articles at most exorbitant prices for their peltry, which has been much undervalued. I say the English ill-treat them: after making them parties in the war with America, they leave them without a pilot, to be robbed and ill-treated by their natural and sworn enemies, the Americans. When the English officer, Colonel Nicholls, left Prospect Bluff, on the Appalachicola river, he left particular orders with Cappachimico and the other chiefs not on any account to enter on the territory of the Americans; while, at the same time, he informed them the Americans were to give up that territory they had taken possession of during the war; but, while he informed the Indians how they should act, and what the Americans were to do in compliance with the treaty, he left no person to guide them in their conduct in case the latter should not comply, or continue to extend their encroachments and commit aggressions. When such was the case, they had none to represent their case to the British Government but William Hambly, the clerk of John Forbes, and Doyle, another of his clerks, both of whom had long before the conclusion of the war sold themselves to the American Government, and, while they were receiving British pay, acted as spies to the Americans. These persons were not likely to represent the conduct and encroachment of the Americans in their true light. No, they attempted to influence the chiefs to join the Americans. Doyle stated, in a talk at St. Mark's, that in four years no Englishman durst set his foot in the Floridas; yet these were the only persons to whom the poor untutored Indian could apply to represent their grievances to the British Government, or any governor of their islands; and it was not likely they, the tools of the Americans, would give a just and true account of the Indian grievances. Hambly, the Indian interpreter, was ordered to write to the Governor of New Providence, demanding his interference; and, by an intercepted letter from his brother, dated at Regla, in February last, it appears he had written a letter to New Providence; but to whom?

OCHLOCHNEE SOUND, March 3, 1817.

SIR: I am desired by Peter McQueen, an unfortunate chief, who was some years since obliged to fly from his town of Tuckabatchee, on the Tallapoohatche river, to claim of your friendship the delivery of a negro man named Joe, (taken away from him since the peace,) whom he states to be in Fort Gaines. When McQueen left Tuckabatchee, his property was considerable, both in negroes and cattle; of the former, ten grown negroes were taken by a half-breed man named Barney; nine of whom he learns were sold, and one, a girl, is still in possession of said Barney. Twenty able-bodied negroes were taken by a chief named Colonel, or Auchi Hatche, who acts also as an interpreter; and, as he never had possession of any of those persons' property, nor ever did them any injury, to his knowledge, he claims a further proof of your friendship, that you will use your influence in procuring these negroes for him; and, should they be given up by the persons holding them, there is one faithful negro among them, named Charle, who will bring them to him at Ochlochnee river.

The American headmen and officers, that were accustomed to live near him, can testify to his civility and good fellowship with them; and there are none of them, he is convinced, that would not serve him if in their power. As he owes nothing, nor ever took any person's property, none have a right to retain him; and he hopes that, through your influence, those persons now holding his negroes will be induced to give them up.

While I am thus advocating the cause of one unfortunate individual, allow me to claim an extension of your philanthropy to all the Indians within your circle, by your representing to them the folly of their quarrels, and that they ought to live quietly and peaceably with each other.

The Lower Creeks seem to wish to live peaceably and quietly, and in good friendship with the others; but there are some designing and evil-minded persons, self-interested, who are endeavoring to create quarrels between the Upper and Lower Creek Indians, contrary to their interest, their happiness, and welfare. Such people belong to no nation, and ought not to be countenanced by any Government.

The head chiefs request I will inquire of you why American settlers are descending the Chatahoochee, driving the poor Indian from his habitation, and taking possession of his home and cultivated fields.

Without authority, I can claim nothing of you; but a humane and philanthropic principle guiding me, I hope the same will influence you, and, if such is really the case, and that the line marked out by the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, respecting the Indian nations, has been infringed upon by the subjects of the latter, that you will represent to them their improper conduct, and prevent its continuance.

I hold in my possession a letter received from the Governor of New Providence, addressed to him by His Britannic Majesty's chief Secretary of State, informing him of the orders given to the British Ambassador at Washington to watch over the interests of the Indian nations, and see that their rights are faithfully attended to and protected, agreeably to the treaty of peace between the British and Americans.

I am in hopes that ere this there is arrived at

New Providence a person from Great Britain with authority to act as agent for the Indian nations; and, if so, it will devolve on him to see that the boundary lines, as marked out by the treaty, are not infringed upon.

I hope you will not think these observations, made by desire of the chiefs, any improper interference; and requesting the favor of an answer, I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

P. S. McQueen states that the offspring of the negroes when he left Tuckabatchee were seven of those taken by Barney, and nine of those taken by Auchi Hatche, and he supposes they have increased.

FORT GAINES, May 1, 1817.

DEAR SIR: On being informed by the commanding officer that you had written, in behalf of Peter McQueen, for a negro man once in the possession of myself at this place, requiring the return of said negro to (as you said) the rightful owner, I take the liberty of informing you that the said negro is now at Fort Hawkins, Oakmulgee river, claimed by an American citizen by the name of Bowen White. He remained with us; he was a deposite of some of the Indians, to be given to the said Bowen when called for. Further of his origin, or manner in which he was claimed as property, I cannot tell anything. You inquired why citizens were descending this river. In answer, I say in right of and conformably to a late treaty between the United States and the Creek nation; for this part of the territory was ceded to us as a compensation for expenses and aid furnished and incurred by the friendly Creek Indians against McQueen and his party, not having any reference or touching any article or part of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain. As to McQueen's having any claims on the good feeling and philanthropy of any citizen of the United States, it is a mockery and a farce; on the contrary, he has incurred both the ill-will and hatred of his own people and them, and has, in fact, been the cause of the destruction and loss of his native country.

Your obedient servant,

AM. CULLOH.

SUWANEE, LOWER CREEK NATION,
January 19, 1818.

SIR: Kenhagee, head chief of the Lower Creek nation, has called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and the American people; but, far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side but both troops and settlers ascending the Appalachicola river in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders.

Your known philanthropy and good-will towards the Indians in general induce the chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands and paternal birthright, and also order that those who have already seized on their fields may retire therefrom. The Indians have seized two persons known to have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans down on their lands, and they are now in their possession as prisoners; and they have it in report that sales of their lands have been made by those two people, without consent, approbation, or knowledge of the chiefs; and, from their long residence in the nation, and the one having enjoyed great confidence in the nation and with the chiefs, as English interpreter, there is some reason to believe those reports, when leagued with the swarms of Americans coming from Mobile and other places seizing the best of the Indian lands. Such improper sales have actually been made.

In taking this liberty of addressing you, sir, in behalf of the unfortunate Indians, believe me I have no wish but to see an end put to a war which, if persisted in, I foresee must eventually be their ruin; and as they were not the aggressor, if, in the height of their rage, they commit any excesses, that you will overlook them as the just ebullitions of an indignant spirit against an invading foe. I have the honor to be, &c.

A. ARBUTHNOT,

MR. ARBUTHNOT.

The following letters, in addition to those already made public, tend to show the deep interest which this unfortunate gentleman took in procuring redress for what he conceived to be the unprovoked aggressions of the American back settlers on the Indian boundary line.

A. Arbuthnot to the commanding officer at Fort Gaines.

[This is an extract from the letter No. 69 in this collection, consisting of the four paragraphs before the last, which is omitted. See the document No. 69, and the answer to it, No. 70.]

Copy of a talk sent from the British agents in East Florida to the Big Warrior, head chief of the Creek nation of Indians.*

OCHLOCHNEE RIVER, March 3, 1817.

When the English made peace with the Americans, they included the whole of the Indian nations, viz: Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee. Those nations were guaranteed in the quiet possession of their lands, and the Americans engaged to give up such lands of the Indians as they had taken possession of during the war.

If they have not done so, or if they have been making further encroachments, the chiefs have only to represent their complaints and the aggressions of the Americans to the Governor of New Providence, who will forward them to England, or get them conveyed to the British Minister at Washington, who has orders from the King of England to see that the rights of the nations above mentioned are protected, and the stipulations contained in the treaty, in their favor, are faithfully carried into execution.

The Americans have no wish to go to war; they will not, therefore, do anything contrary to the treaty; and what encroachments have been made must be without the knowledge of the chief of the American Government; and, so soon as he is informed thereof by the British Minister at Washington, he will order the American people who have taken possession of Indian lands to draw back to their own possessions.

The Indian nations are all one great family; they possess lands their great forefathers handed down to them, and they ought to hand them down entire to their children. If they sell their land, what do they receive for it? Nothing that will last. It is wasted away in a few years. Whether, therefore, they sell, or give it away, they are robbing their children of the inheritance they had a right to expect. As a great family, they ought to live as such with each other. Let the four nations join in bonds of brotherly love; let them smoke the pipe of peace; let the cultivation of their lands be their chief object during Spring and Summer, and hunting their diversion during Winter; and the produce of their labor will be bought by good people, who will come and deal with them when they know there is anything to be purchased for goods or money.

If the Americans or other nations live near them, let them live in friendship with them, and keep up a good understanding, but on no account sell or give away any of their lands. I recommend this as a friend of humanity and of good order.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

The head chiefs of the Upper Creek nation have desired me, Opony, to get the straight talk for them; what is written in the foregoing I believe to be the true and straight talk received from an Englishman,* who carried two deputies to New Providence, and returned with them to Ochlochnee. I, Opony, have been sent by you, the head chiefs of the Upper Creek nation, to see the Seminole Indians. I have done so; they live quietly and peaceably, and wish to do so, with all their red brethren, in every part of the nation.

Opony Hatcho has desired me to see those things; I have done so; and see all quiet, and had the talk I now send you, and shaken hands with the friend who gave it me.

That the friend I have met came over with goods by desire of the chiefs of the lower towns, and is a true friend to the Indians. The various and untrue talks that you sent me from time to time must be made by some person an enemy to us, all red brethren, and ought not to be listened to; let me know who they are, and send me an answer as soon as possible to the present talk.

OPONY, his X mark.

Written by order of the aforesaid Opony, the 11th of March, 1817.

Don Luis de Onis to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 12, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 30th ultimo, in reply to mine of the 24th of the same month, by which I perceive, with great concern, the failure of the flattering hope I had formed of seeing a speedy and amicable termination of the differences existing between our respective Governments. But I leave to those who may impartially inquire into the state of things, their origin, nature, and all the circumstances hitherto attending them—to those who form their judgments upon the principles of justice, the dictates of conscience, and the most established rules of human reason, whether, on my part, I have not done even more than could be hoped for at once to terminate a controversy no less unpleasant than it is injurious to the interest of both nations.

It was painful to His Catholic Majesty's Government to find that the differences which originated in the pretensions first formed by the United States in the year 1805 were not then definitively settled; but the tenaciousness of the American Plenipotentiaries in maintaining them, and their refusal to accede to those advanced by His Majesty, in conformity with the most inviolable duties of his Royal Crown, as a preliminary to the ratification of the convention of 1802, threw insurmountable obstacles in the way of both; these obstacles still existed on the part of the United States at the period of the revolution in Spain, in 1808. From that time, and until the latter part of 1815, you are aware, sir, that the Government of the United States declined to acknowledge His Catholic Majesty's Minister, and that the diplomatic intercourse between the two Powers was interrupted. From the moment your Government resolved on changing its course, and receiving the Minister of Spain, my Government has employed the most unceasing efforts to adjust all existing differences, and establish on a just and solid basis the most perfect harmony and lasting friendship. For this I appeal to the correspondence between His Catholic Majesty's Minister of State and the Plenipotentiaries of the United States at Madrid, and to that I have had the honor to carry on here with yourself and your predecessor. I leave it to the judgment of any impartial person who may be disposed to analyze it, rejecting whatsoever is irrelevant or unfounded, to determine who has reason and justice on his side, and decide whether it is possible that any nation in the world, similarly situated, could act with greater generosity and good faith than Spain, or offer greater sacrifices to meet the wishes of the United States, with a view to putting an end to the controversy between them.

As you stated to me, in your note of 31st of October last, that the proposals you then made me by order of your Government comprehended everything which the President conceived it possible, within the compass of his powers and duty, to offer for the final arrangement of the pending differences, I endeavored, in my letter of the 16th of November last, to modify the proposals made in yours of the 31st of October, and approximate them to yours to the utmost extent of my powers. I even expressed my earnest desire to conclude the negotiation, so far as to admit the removal of the boundary line from the Gulf of Mexico, on the river Sabine, as proposed by you; and I only added that it should run more or less obliquely to the Missouri, thereby still keeping in view the consideration of conciliating the wish that your Government might have of retaining such other settlement as might have been formed on the bank of that river, and observing, nevertheless, that it was not to pass by New Mexico, or any other provinces or dominions of the Crown of Spain. Notwithstanding this, and the further advantages offered in the said proposals, I now observe that they still appear insufficient to meet the wishes and views of your Government; which is the more a subject of regret to me, as the reasons and grounds on which I founded a hope of a different result were, and still are, of the greatest weight.

What you now state, namely, that your proposal relative to the western boundary between the two Powers involved a great sacrifice on the part of the United States in favor of Spain, appears incomprehensible to me. That proposal, even modified and adapted to that which I made to you on the 24th of last month, included in favor of the United States a considerable extent of territory to the right and left of the Mississippi, to which they neither had nor can have any right whatever; and that fact being, as assuredly it is, beyond all contradiction or doubt, I cannot conceive in what consists the sacrifice made by the United States to Spain in the proposal offered by you. In fact, how can it be denied that Spain has ever been in the peaceable possession of all the countries lying to the westward of the Mermento, the boundary between the Spanish dominions and those of France, in that quarter, being a line running due north from the said river to the Rio Roxo (Red river) between the Adaes and Natchitoches, and thence to the Missouri, although it was not exactly determined whether it was to ascend until that river emptied into the Mississippi, or to some other point? Has the Government of France, peradventure, ever taken any step or contested with His Catholic Majesty's Crown, or carried her pretensions beyond those limits? Is it not universally notorious that this dividing line was always respected by both nations; and that, even after the acquisition of Louisiana by the United States, the different Governors of Louisiana and Texas, with a view to avoid disputes, came to an agreement to consider the territory between the Mermento and the Sabine as neutral, and that it should remain unsettled? Is there the least probability that the United States would propose such an arrangement if they conceived themselves to be the owners of the immense country lying between that river and the Rio del Norte? I cannot but think you must admit these facts. As to the other points of the frontier separating the possessions of both Powers, they are equally well known, being accurately determined and defined in solemn treaties, and particularly in that of 1795, between Spain and the United States. The dividing line between the dominions of the two Powers to the eastward of the Mississippi was fixed on that river to the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude, running thence due east to the mid-stream of the river Appalachicola or Chatahochee; thence along the mid-stream of that river to its junction with the Flint; thence in a right line to the head-waters of the St. Mary's river, and following the course of the same to the Atlantic ocean. On the side of the Gulf of Mexico the line has also been accurately determined, so as to prevent its ever being confounded or misunderstood. It follows the course of the Mississippi to the Iberville, running through it, and the lakes Maurepas, Pontchartrain, and Borgne, to the Gulf of Mexico. In opposition to facts of such notoriety, unfounded assertions can have no weight. The offer of the United States, made through the medium of the French Government, to require of Spain the territory lying between the Mississippi and the Perdido, at the time the United States were already in possession of Louisiana, is an additional proof tending to demonstrate the certainty and notoriety of the boundaries I have just alluded to. And the French Government, which sold Louisiana to the United States, solemnly declared to this Government, in a note addressed to Mr. Monroe, dated the 21st December, 1804, not only what was its extent, but that it had delivered that province to the United States, such as Spain had retroceded it to France; and that, so far from having sold to this Republic any part of the territory east of the Mississippi, known and possessed by England and by Spain under the name of West Florida, His Imperial Majesty, with a full knowledge of what belonged to His Catholic Majesty, early in the eleventh year of the Republic, authorized General Bournonville, his Ambassador at Madrid, to open a negotiation with Spain for the purchase or cession of the Floridas. From what I have just pointed out, as well as from what I have repeatedly stated in the course of my correspondence, it evidently follows that the real and unquestionable sacrifice was that made by His Catholic Majesty in favor of the United States, as expressed in the above-mentioned proposal.

The continued persistence of your Government in its pretensions to all the territory lying between the Mermento and the river Bravo del Norte is not sufficient to invalidate the titles of property and possession which establish the right and dominion of Spain therein, when the English colonies composing the Republic of the United States were not yet in existence, nor the French settlements, which serve as the pretext for the amazing pretensions of your Government. For, what titles and proofs have been produced to justify them? The disastrous expedition of M. de la Salle; the absurd grant in favor of Crozat; and the erroneous narratives of travellers with maps formed at pleasure, by uninformed and interested geographers—such as Melish and others—who ran their lines as they were dictated to them, and thus disposed of the dominions of Spain as suited their wishes. When did La Salle enter the Rio Bravo, and take possession of the extensive countries between it and the Sabine? Was not his expedition, the sole object of which was to discover the mouths of the Mississippi, lost on the coast of the province of Texas? Did not the Spanish troops immediately advance from Mexico to expel these adventurers? What establishment did France, or any other nation, ever hold on the Bravo or the Colorado? The grant of Louis XIV., no less contemptible than the tales and fables of the missionary Hennepin—will it perchance name the river Bravo, the Colorado, or the Columbia? It only makes mention of the Mississippi, or river of St. Louis, and of the waters emptying therein; and if, under the sanction of that grant, it were allowable to include, without reserve, all the lands washed by those waters, or all those which might come in contact with them, it would perhaps be no difficult matter to extend that pretension to the remotest rocks of Patagonia, and even to the South pole.

I have demonstrated, by the most abundant evidence, what are the unquestionable boundaries which divide the Spanish possessions from those of this Republic; and notwithstanding nothing has been produced by the United States to establish their pretensions, and that the rights of Spain have hitherto been acknowledged and notorious, without any Power ever having disputed the property which she has, and always has had, since the sixteenth century, in the aforesaid territories, the Government of His Catholic Majesty is, and at all times has been, ready to produce the titles and documents in support of its rights, for the greater conviction and satisfaction of your Government, and for the impartial comparison of them with those which may be presented by the United States. You have declined these, in consequence, as you inform me, of the order you have received from the President, which only requires that I should subscribe to what he has been pleased to decide on; and, in case I do not agree to this, nothing further is wished to be heard in support of the rights of Spain; and that your Government retracts the proposals it has made for the adjustment of the question of boundaries. In consequence of so peremptory and categorical a declaration, and of proposals which have never been advanced in the course of the present negotiation, until your letter of 31st October last, to which it is impossible I should yet have received an answer from my Court, I had no other alternative than to transmit a copy of your letter to my Sovereign, which I have done by the Secretary of this Legation; and it will be very satisfactory to me to learn that His Majesty, animated as he is by the most lively desire to terminate these matters amicably, and on being informed that we are already agreed upon all the other points, may, in his wisdom, find means to conciliate the wishes of the United States with the interests and dignity of his Crown. In the meanwhile, it is necessary I should inform you that as the proposals made to me in the name of the President are, as you signify, no longer obligatory, in like manner do those cease to be obligatory which I have made to you by the order of my Government; and that, consequently, the rights of the Crown of Spain are entirely free as to whatsoever appertains to it.

I cannot, however, refrain from expressing to you my inability to comprehend upon what grounds the United States decline the proposal of submitting the pending differences, in their actual state, to the judgment and decision of one or more friendly Powers in whom the United States may place full confidence. I have read with the greatest attention the note referred to by you, and I candidly confess that I have continued in the same uncertainty. When two nations cannot meet on points upon which they may disagree, a spirit of equity and the love of justice require, and the law of nations points out, a recourse to the arbitrament of an impartial third party. This maxim, so deserving of respect, was adopted by the United States themselves on the occasion of their acceptance of the mediation of Russia in their differences with Great Britain; and also on that of their agreement with the latter Power to submit to arbitrament whatever difficulties might arise in the settlement of their boundaries. A similar course has been adopted by all nations under similar circumstances; and, in fact, what mode is there, when two nations (or two individuals in particular cases) cannot agree upon a certain point, each one conceiving they have reason and justice on their side, but to submit the question to the impartial judgment and decision of a third party, chosen to their mutual satisfaction? Spain, convinced that this mode was the fairest and most expeditious, was anxious to adopt it, with all the sincerity and good faith which have characterized her; and in the event of its not being adopted, through the unalterable opposition of your Government, there can be no room for apprehension or regret as to the opinion which will be formed by the impartial world on this point.

In reference to what you state respecting the transmission, by order of the President, to the Minister of the United States at Madrid, of all the evidence and documents relative to the conduct of the Governor of Pensacola and the Commandant of St. Marks, with instructions to lay them before His Catholic Majesty's Government; and the demand, in consequence of the nature of the facts therein exhibited, of the condign punishment of those officers, I abstain from offering further proofs in addition to those I have already presented of the good conduct, honorable proceeding, and strict discharge of duty, on the part of those individuals acting under the authority of the King, my master, and in conformity with the existing treaty between the two nations, as the opportunity will be afforded of examining and comparing at Madrid the evidence adduced by Mr. Erving with that which my Government has received, or may receive, from the authorities whose duty it is to transmit it. If, upon such examination and comparison, it should appear that the Governor of West Florida and his officers have conducted themselves improperly, I am confident that due punishment will be inflicted on them; and if, on the other hand, the American General and his officers should be found to have acted in an unjustifiable manner, the United States cannot hesitate to proceed against them, nor to indemnify Spain for the losses and injuries sustained in consequence of the aggression complained of.

With respect to the conduct of General Jackson in the invasion of Florida, and the excesses committed there in violation of the sovereignty and dignity of a friendly Power, as they are pub-lie and notorious, and sufficiently reprobated by public opinion, and as they are identified with the subject which has just been referred to, I likewise abstain from answering the arguments by which you have endeavored to justify that officer in the note I have the honor to reply to. Whatever may be the causes which, in the view of your Government, justified the war against the Seminoles, you cannot fail to admit how improbable it is that those miserable Indians, feeble, and wholly destitute as they are, could have provoked it. In the letter of the chief Boleck to the Governor of St. Augustine, of the 20th December, 1816, a copy of which I had the honor to transmit to you on the 27th March last, you must have remarked that he speaks of assassinations, carrying off of men and cattle, usurpations of his territory, and even forging of treaties for the cession of lands, signed or marked by the names of persons unknown to the chiefs of the Creek nation, who, he adds, are alone authorized to transfer the general property; of all which he accuses the Americans. Besides, the friendship and good understanding existing between the two nations, and the treaty itself, on the authority of which the measures of General Jackson are supported, decisively required that any complaints which there might be against the Indians should be laid before His Majesty's Government, or before his Ministry near this Republic, previous to the adoption of violent measures; as it was scarcely possible that those excesses could be restrained by His Majesty so long as he remained ignorant of them, and was only informed of the complaints of the continual vexations exercised towards the miserable Indians by the citizens of this Union.

I refrain from attempting any refutation of your remarks on the admission, by the Spanish Governor of Florida, of two English traders into that province, without orders from His Catholic Majesty's Government, or without notifying General Jackson thereof. It is evident that, if he admitted them by order of the King's Government, he was under no obligation to notify the American General of it; and if he admitted them without the necessary order, he was solely responsible to his Sovereign for his conduct. The unquestionable fact is, that General Jackson, at the head of his army, fell upon Florida as a haughty invader and conqueror, regardless of the laws of humanity and the feelings of nature, and put to a cruel death two foreigners, who there enjoyed the protection of Spain, and an asylum which has ever been held sacred by all civilized nations; thereby offering an unexampled insult to the sovereignty and independence of Spain; trampling under foot the most solemn compacts, founded on the laws of nations; and contemptuously driving from that province the Spanish commandants and troops in garrison there. Your further remarks on the restrictive system of the Spanish Government are not strictly conformable to the fact; since you cannot be ignorant that explorations, travellers, and even American officers with troops, have, at different periods, traversed the provinces and territories of the Crown of Spain in that part of America; and that only such persons have been arrested as have been found violating the laws of the country, or aiding, with arms in their hands, banditti and rebels, for the purpose of subverting good order and public tranquillity.

Before I conclude this note, I have to state that, if the project of the definitive adjustment of all the differences pending between the two Governments, which I presented to you on the part of mine, also included the claims for American captures made by the French on the coasts of Spain, or carried by them into Spanish ports, and there condemned in the first instance by French consuls, it was a sacrifice agreed to by Spain, with a view to terminate, once for all, these unpleasant disputes, and, by this additional proof of her condescension and generous friendship for the United States, to conciliate a correspondent proceeding on the part of your Government, from a respect to national law and the solemn principles of justice and equity, as it regards Spain. But this sacrifice, as well as that offered by me on the subject of boundaries and the cession of the Floridas, ceased to have any effect or force from the moment your Government refused to admit the said project, and, consequently, His Catholic Majesty relinquishes to the United States all the rights they may have to claim of France for the said prizes condemned by her consuls and tribunals. Whilst that nation exists, no recourse can in equity be had on Spain for indemnity for those spoliations. The recourse on Spain can in nowise be considered but as secondary. France, being the aggressor, comes under the obligation as a principal. It was she who derived the benefit of those prizes, and on her devolves the responsibility for their amount; and Spain has only become accountable in this concern as the security or caution of France. In conformity with this principle, an opinion has been given by three of the most eminent advocates of this country, who were consulted on the subject. It is also in strict conformity with the principles of natural law, and the venerable canons of common justice. It is in vain that reference is had to the letter of the existing treaty to suppose and insist on the contrary. That treaty can never receive an interpretation contradictory of those principles and the dictates of human reason.

The obligation of Spain cannot extend farther than to claiming of France, in behalf of the United States, and employing her best endeavors to obtain for them a settlement and satisfaction from that nation; which, however, is to be understood only in case the United States have not already been indemnified by France, as has been repeatedly declared by the French Government, or may have adjusted or abandoned that right by the treaty of 1800, and in subsequent conventions, as I have seen it stated in several public writings in this country.

Until I receive fresh orders, it is my duty to insist on the adoption of such measures by your Government as will promptly and effectually put a stop to the piracies which, for a series of years have been carried on in various parts of this Union against the commerce of Spain. This system of plunder has been carried to a height unexampled in history; and the clamors of the reflecting part of the people of the United States denounce it to the whole world as a public calamity.

As to the exchange of the ratifications of the convention of 1802, I am ready to proceed to execute it with you, whenever you will be pleased to name a time for that purpose.

In the mean while, I renew to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God, &c.

LUIS DE ONIS.

WASHINGTON, January 11, 1819.

SIR: I have just received a courier extraordinary of my Government; and, by the despatches he has brought me, I am authorized by His Majesty to give a greater extent to the proposals which I made to you for adjusting and terminating amicably all the subjects in dispute between the two Powers.

As the great difficulty which has hitherto opposed this desirable arrangement is the exact demarcation of the line which divides, or should divide, the dominions of the Crown of Spain from the territory of the United States westward of the Mississippi, and as you were pleased to state to me, in your note of the 30th September last, that the principal motive which induced the President to withdraw the proposals which you had made to me by his direction, was the want of instructions authorizing me to extend the boundary line to the Pacific ocean, I have the honor to inform you that His Majesty, although then unacquainted with the proposals made by you to me in your note of the 31st October, with a view to give an eminent proof of his sincere and generous friendship for this Republic, has been pleased to authorize me to settle this point and others embraced by former proposals. If the President should agree to your entering into an amicable arrangement of them, and also to modify on his part the proposals you have made to me, I do not doubt that, either by correspondence or in conference, we may speedily attain the desired object—the termination of this interesting affair. I flatter myself that the President, as well as the whole American people, cannot but fail to acknowledge, in this disposition of His Majesty, (before he had a knowledge of the exorbitant pretensions of your Government,) the good faith and generosity of his proceeding, and to admit that a measure at once so frank and so decided claims a correspondent feeling on the part of this Republic; the maintenance of perfect amity and good correspondence between the two Powers being obviously calculated to promote the best interests of both.

In the expectation of being soon favored with the decision of the President, I beg leave to renew to you the assurances of my high respect; and I pray God to preserve you many years.

WASHINGTON, January 16, 1819.

SIR: In consequence of the wish expressed by you yesterday, in the interview to which you were pleased to invite me, that I would state the proposals for which I am authorized by the fresh instructions I have received by a special messenger from my Government, and relying on your assurances that, notwithstanding the proposals you had made to me, the President would take those into consideration which I might make anew for the purpose of settling amicably all pending differences, I have the honor to confirm to you those which I made in my note of the 16th of November last, and to add thereto that His Majesty will agree that the boundary line between the two States shall extend from the source of the Missouri, westward, to the Columbia river, and along the middle thereof to the Pacific ocean. If this basis should be accepted by the President, (as I trust it will, inasmuch as it presents the means of realizing his great plan of extending a navigation from the Pacific to the remotest points of the Northern States and of the ocean, and of enlarging the dominions of the Republic by the acquisition of both the Floridas,) I will have no hesitation in agreeing to an arrangement honorable and satisfactory to both nations, upon the point on which we differ, relating to the indemnity claimed for the injuries resulting from the occupation of the territories of the King by the forces of this Union.

I conceive that you, as well as the President and the whole American people, cannot but see, in this evidence of the spirit of conciliation by which His Catholic Majesty is actuated, a certain pledge of his desire to strengthen and cement the ties of friendship with this Republic; and I trust that the answer of the President will correspond with the sacrifices made by His Majesty, as well with a view to the prompt satisfaction of the citizens of the United States for whatever injuries they may have sustained, as to the complete removal of every cause of future disagreement between the two nations. But if, contrary to my expectations, this should not be the case, I shall feel a sincere regret in seeing this desirable arrangement protracted until His Majesty, on being made acquainted with the extraordinary pretensions of your Government by the despatches of which Don Luis Noeli, the secretary of this legation, was the bearer, may transmit to me such orders as he may deem expedient.

I renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONIS.

The Secretary of State to Don Luis de Onis.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, January 29, 1819.

SIR: Your letter of the 16th instant has been submitted to the consideration of the President of the United States by whose directions I have the honor of informing you that the proposal to draw the western boundary line between the United States and the Spanish territories on this continent, from the source of the Missouri to the Columbia river, cannot be admitted. I have to add, that, for the purpose of an immediate arrangement of affairs with Spain, this Government repeats the proposal contained in my letter to you of the 31st October last;* and if you are not authorized to agree to it, we are willing to adjust the other subjects of difference, leaving that to be settled hereafter. But if your powers are incompetent to accept either of these offers, the President thinks it useless to pursue the discussion any further of subjects upon which there can be no hope entertained of concluding an agreement between us.

Be pleased to accept the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, February 1, 1819.

SIR: I have received your note of the 29th January, in which you are pleased to state to me, that, having laid before the President my note of the 16th, he has directed you to inform me that my proposal to fix the boundary between the two States, by a line from the source of the river Missouri to the Columbia, and along the course of the latter to the Pacific, is inadmissible; but that, with a view to an immediate arrangement of affairs with Spain, you repeat to me the proposal contained in your note of the 31st October last, and add, that, if I am not authorized to agree to it, we may adjust the other subjects of difference, leaving that to be settled hereafter.

My powers authorize me to adjust all such differences as His Majesty was apprized of at the date of my last despatches, which are the 4th November. The proposal referred to by you is of the 31st October preceding, and in all probability no answer to it can be expected before the middle or end of March. Taking into consideration, however, on the one hand, the earnest desire of His Catholic Majesty to terminate these matters before the rising of Congress, and thereby to avoid a further delay of a twelvemonth in settling the indemnities claimed by citizens of the Union, and, on the other, the probable anxiety of your Government to carry into execution the establishments contemplated in the Floridas, I am prepared to take upon myself the definitive settlement of the points in controversy, provided the President, animated by correspondent feelings, is willing to modify the proposals made to me, so as to render them consistent and compatible with the interests of both Powers.

I have proved to you, in the most satisfactory manner, that neither the Red river of Natchitoches nor the Columbia, ever formed the boundary of Louisiana; but, as you have intimated to me that it is useless to pursue the discussion any further, I acquiesce with you therein; and I agree that, keeping out of view the rights which either Power may have to the territory in dispute, we should confine ourselves to the settlement of those points which may be for the mutual interest and convenience of both.

Upon this view, therefore, of the subject, and considering that the motive for declining to admit my proposal of extending the boundary line from the Missouri to the Columbia, and along that river to the Pacific, appears to be the wish of the President to include within the limits of the Union all the branches and rivers emptying into the said river Columbia, I will adapt my proposals on this point so as fully to satisfy the demand of the United States, without losing sight of the essential object, namely, that the boundary line shall, as far as possible, be natural and clearly defined, and leave no room for dispute to the inhabitants on either side.

Having thus declared to you my readiness to meet the views of the United States in the essential point of their demand, I have to state to you that His Majesty is unable to agree to the admission of the Red river to its source, as proposed by you. This river rises within a few leagues of Santa Fe, the capital of New Mexico; and as I flatter myself the United States have no hostile intentions towards Spain, at the moment we are using all our efforts to strengthen the existing friendship between the two nations, it must be indifferent to them to accept the Arkansas instead of the Red river as the boundary. This opinion is strengthened by the well-known fact, that the intermediate space between those two rivers is so much impregnated with nitre as scarcely to be susceptible of improvement.

In consideration of these obvious reasons, I propose to you, that, drawing the boundary line from the Gulf of Mexico, by the river Sabine, as laid down by you, it shall follow the course of that river to its source; thence, by the ninety-fourth degree of longitude, to the Red river of Natchitoches, and along the same to the ninety-fifth degree; and crossing it at that point, to run by a line due north to the Arkansas, and along it to its source; thence, by a line due west, till it strikes the source of the river San Clemente, or Multnomah, in latitude 41°, and along that river to the Pacific ocean; the whole agreeably to Melish's map.

In case this basis, which not only approximates your proposals, but fulfils, in every essential point, the wishes you have stated to me, be admitted by the President, His Majesty, with a view to give the United States a more convincing proof of his generosity, and his desire to strengthen the bonds of amity with this Republic, consents to relinquish the claim of indemnity for the injuries sustained by his treasury in consequence of the invasion of the Floridas, reserving only to the inhabitants of the same their right to what may appear to be justly due to them for their losses by that event.

It is understood that the convention of 1802, lately ratified, is annulled as far as it relates to the indemnity for injuries and losses claimed by the United States or their citizens of Spain; inasmuch as full compensation for the same is to be made to them from the sales of the lands in the two Floridas, and of the immense possessions westward of the Mississippi, ceded by His Majesty in virtue of that treaty; and that the United States, actuated by the most sincere desire to remove every cause of difference between the two nations in future, will take into consideration the necessity of establishing such regulations as, in their wisdom, they may deem most expedient to prevent the evasion of the laws of the Republic, to the injury of the commerce of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty.

I renew to you, sir, the assurances of my distinguished consideration, and I pray God to preserve you many years.

LUIS DE ONÍS.

HON. JOHN Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Project of an article describing the western boundary, communicated to Don Luis de Onís by the Secretary of State, February 6, 1819.

ARTICLE.—It is agreed that the western boundary between the United States and the territories of Spain shall be as follows: Beginning at the mouth of the river Sabine, on the Gulf of Mexico; following the course of said river to the thirty-second degree of latitude, the eastern bank and all the islands in the river to belong to the United States, and the western bank to Spain; thence, due north, to the northernmost part of the thirty-third degree of north latitude, and until it strikes the Rio Roxo, or Red river; thence, following the course of said river, to the northernmost point of the bend, between longitude 101 and 102 degrees; thence, by the shortest line, to the southernmost point of the bend of the river Arkansas, between the same degrees of longitude 101 and 102; thence, following the course of the river Arkansas, to its source, in latitude 41 degrees north; thence, following the same parallel of latitude 41 degrees, to the South sea. The northern banks and all the islands in the said Red and Arkansas rivers, on the said boundary line, to belong to the United States, and their southern banks to Spain; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But, if the source of the Arkansas river should fall south or north of latitude 41 degrees, then the line from the said source shall run due north or south, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude, and thence, as aforesaid, to the South sea. And it is further agreed that no Spanish settlement shall be made on any part of the said Red or Arkansas rivers, nor on any of the waters flowing into the same, nor any east of the chain of Snow mountains between the latitudes 31 and 41 degrees, inclusively; and that the navigation of said rivers shall belong exclusively to the United States forever.

15th CON. 2d SESS.—67

Project of a treaty delivered by Don Luis de Onís to the Secretary of State, February 9, 1819.

[Translation sent by Don Luis de Onís.]

His Catholic Majesty and the United States of America, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions by a treaty, which shall designate with precision the limits of the one and the other, the settlement whereof will be productive of general advantage and reciprocal utility to both nations.

With this intention, His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Don Luis de Onís Gonzales y Vara, Lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third, member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States of America; and the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of their Senate, has appointed Mr. John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States. And the Plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, and the United States and their citizens, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty, desiring to give a distinguished proof of his friendship to the United States, cedes to them, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida, such as they were ceded to him by Great Britain in 1783, and with the limits by which they are designated in the treaty of limits and navigation concluded between Spain and the United States on the 27th October, 1795.

ART. 3. The adjacent islands dependent on said provinces, places, public squares, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings which are not the property of some private individual, archives and documents which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article.

ART. 4. That at no time whatever there may be any dispute or mistake in the boundaries which shall separate in future the territories of His Catholic Majesty and those of the United States to the westward of the Mississippi, the two high contracting parties have agreed to fix them in the following manner: The boundary line between the two countries shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea, continuing north, along the middle of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the thirty-third degree of latitude, where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, (Red river,) following the course of the Rio Roxo, to the westward, to the hundredth degree of longitude, and thirty-three and one-fourth degree of latitude, where it crosses that river; thence, by a line due north, by the said one hundredth degree of longitude from London, according to Melish's map, till it enters the river Arkansas; thence, along the middle of the Arkansas, to the forty-second degree of latitude; thence, a line shall be drawn to the westward, by the same parallel of latitude, to the source of the river San Clemente, or Multnomah, following the course of that river to the forty-third degree of latitude; and thence, by a line due west, to the Pacific ocean. All the country belonging to His Catholic Majesty, included in the said line to the eastward, His Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, forever; as also the islands in the rivers Sabine, Red river of Natchitoches, Arkansas, and Multnomah, that may be situated within the limits which are here pointed out: both parties to maintain the navigation of all of them free as respects the parts thereof which constitute their frontiers.

ART. 5. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to these persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject in either case to duties.

ART. 7. The inhabitants of the two provinces aforesaid, and those in all the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty, shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as possible, agreeably to the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the other States.

ART. 8. The territories of the two Floridas, which, at the time of the delivery which is to be made of them to the United States, should be occupied by the troops or authorities of the Republic, shall be delivered to the commissioners which His Catholic Majesty or the Captain General of the Havana may send for that purpose, in order that the said territories may be delivered up in a regular manner to the commissioners or officers appointed by the United States to receive them.

ART. 9. All the grants of lands made by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, in the aforesaid territories of the two Floridas, and others which His Majesty cedes to the United States, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid, excepting those grants which may have been made after the 24th of January of last year, the date that the first proposals were made for the cession of these provinces, which shall be held null, in consideration of the grantees not having complied with the conditions of the cession.

ART. 10. The two contracting parties, animated by the most sincere desire of conciliation, and with a view of eradicating all the dissensions which have existed between them, and to secure that good harmony which they desire perpetually to maintain with each other, reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective subjects and citizens, may have suffered until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To all claims of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French Consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans.

4. And to all the claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, in which the interposition of the Government of the United States may have been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, and which may have been made to the Department of State of this Republic, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain.

The renunciation of His Catholic Majesty extends—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, fitted out and equipped at New York.

4. To the revenue collected by the United States in the territories of Florida that have been occupied by their troops, and to the indemnities which His Catholic Majesty is entitled to for the injuries caused to his Royal Crown by those invasions.

Finally, to all claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his Minister in the United States.

ART. 11. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th August, 1802, ratifications of which were exchanged on the 21st December, 1818, is annulled in that part which relates to the payment of the injuries which the United States and their citizens claim; it being agreed between the two high contracting parties that these injuries shall be paid integrally by the United States from the proceeds of the public or crown lands of the two Floridas and other territories ceded by His Majesty in this treaty; so that both Governments consider all their claims, and those of their subjects and citizens, as cancelled from this date, excepting those claims which the citizens of the United States may have against Spanish individuals, or which the latter may have upon the citizens of this Republic.

ART. 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article, which, having been altered by this treaty, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this may be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle; but, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ART. 13. In order to avoid frauds, and the great evils which arise from concealing the destination of vessels by clearing out, in general terms, for the West Indies, Spanish main, Europe, &c., the two high contracting parties have agreed that, in future, all merchant vessels belonging to their respective subjects or citizens shall be cleared out for a special port, either at their respective custom-houses or in those of other Powers, from whose ports said vessels may depart in continuation of their primitive voyage, or in case they should undertake a new one; and the merchant vessels of either of the two nations that, in violation of their clearances, should enter other ports, without justifying the motives which induced them to it, or should be met with on the high seas by their vessels of war or privateers cleared out in violation of this article, shall be detained, proceeded against, and, upon conviction, forfeited.

ART. 14. In case there shall be just cause to suspect the character of the vessels, or which should not be cleared out for a specified port, as is stipulated in the preceding article, or that the cargo belongs to enemies of either of the contracting parties whose Governments do not recognise the principle that the flag covers the property, or which shall consist of articles contraband of war, such vessels may be detained and sent to the nearest and most convenient port to which the ship of war or privateer that may have detained such a vessel belongs, where she shall be adjudged agreeably to the law of nations, and the practice established by other maritime Powers. And it is agreed that adjudication shall be had with the least delay possible; and if it shall be proved that the detention or capture was unjust, it shall not only be the duty of the tribunal where the case was tried to release the vessel and cargo, but it shall decide the corresponding indemnity for the damages and injuries that may have been sustained, to be paid by the captors, and, in their defect, by the Government by whom they shall be commissioned.

ART. 15. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up at the instance of the Consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belong to the vessels that claim them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, that the Spanish Consul in an American port shall exhibit the roll of the vessel, and the American Consul in a Spanish port the document known by the name of articles; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel which they shall belong.

ART. 16. His Catholic Majesty having condescended to make the cessions to the United States which are specified in the present treaty, in compliment to the United States, with the object of cancelling all the claims they have demanded of the Royal Crown, the United States will certify, in due form, that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, Consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may claim from France the return of this amount.

ART. 17. It being mutually advantageous to the commerce of Spain and of the United States to facilitate the communication between both nations for a limited time in the territories ceded by this treaty, until they can agree upon the regulations relating to commerce which may be best adapted to favor the same, the two high contracting parties agree that Spanish vessels which may arrive loaded solely with the produce or manufactures of Spain, directly from the ports or colonies, shall be admitted into all the ports of the two Floridas that may be lawfully open to the trade of other nations, for the space of twelve years, without paying more duties for their produce or merchandise, or greater tonnage duty, than what are paid by vessels of the United States.

During said time no other nation shall be entitled to the same privileges in the ceded territories. The twelve years shall begin three months after exchanging the ratifications of the present treaty; at the expiration of said time, Spanish vessels shall be received in said territories on the same footing as the most favored nations.

ART. 9. The present treaty shall not be in force until ratified in due form by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of His Catholic Majesty and of the United States of America, have signed, by virtue of our powers, the present treaty of friendship and limits, and have thereunto affixed our seals, respectively.

Done at Washington, this — day of February, 1819.

Counter-projet of a treaty, communicated by Mr. Adams to Don Luis de Onís the 12th of February, 1819.

The United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions, by a treaty, which shall designate with precision the limits of their respective bordering territories in North America.

With this intention, the President of the United States has furnished with their full powers John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the said United States; and His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Lord Don Luis de Onís, Gonzales Lopez y Vara, Lord of the town of Rayces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished Spanish order of Charles the Third, member of the Supreme Assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his Secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States of America.

And the said Plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States and their citizens, and His Catholic Majesty, his successors and subjects, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida. The adjacent islands, dependent on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, archives and documents, which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them.

ART. 3. The boundary line between the two countries, west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea; continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, or Red river; thence, following the course of the Rio Roxo westward, to the degree of longitude one hundred and two degrees west from London, and twenty-five degrees from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas, to its source, in latitude forty-one degrees north; and thence, by the parallel of latitude, to the South sea: the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published in Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But, if the source of the Arkansas river should be found to fall north or south of latitude forty-one degrees, then the line shall run from the said source due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude forty-one degrees; and thence, along the said parallel, to the South sea; the Sabine and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, and all the islands in the same, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; and the western bank of the Sabine, and the southern banks of the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the line thus described, to belong to Spain. And the United States hereby cede to His Catholic Majesty all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories lying west and south of the above described line; and His Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line, and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ART. 4. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet, before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of this treaty, at Natchitoches, on the Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas, in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and all those who desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject, in either cases, to duties.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States.

ART. 7. The officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty in the territories hereby ceded by him to the United States shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given, within six months after the ratification of this treaty, or sooner if possible, by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them.

ART. 8. All grants of land made by or in the name of His Catholic Majesty in the aforesaid territories, after the 24th of January, 1818, shall be held null, the conditions of the said grants not having been performed by the grantees. All grants made before that date by His Catholic Majesty, or by his legitimate authorities, in the said territories, the conditions of which shall have been performed by the grantees according to the tenor of the respective grants, and none other, shall be confirmed and acknowledged as valid.

ART. 9. The two contracting parties reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective citizens and subjects, may have suffered, until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To all claims on account of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French Consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans in 1802.

4. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, arising from the unlawful seizures at sea, and from the unlawful seizure of vessels or cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States in the ports and territories of Spain or the Spanish colonies.

The renunciation of His Catholic Majesty extends—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, that was fitted out and equipped at New York.

Finally, to all the claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his Minister in the United States.

And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

ART. 10. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged on the 21st December, 1818, is annulled.

ART. 11. The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future on account of the claims of their citizens to which the renunciations herein contained extend, undertake to make satisfaction for the same to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of these claims, a commission, to consist of three commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which commission shall meet at the city of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the descriptions above mentioned. The said commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings; for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties; and, in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any such commissioner, his place may be supplied by the appointment as aforesaid, or by the President of the United States during the recess of the Senate, of another commissioner in his stead. The said commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same; and the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners.

The payment of such claims as may be admitted and adjusted by the said commissioners, or the major part of them, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, shall be made by the United States, either immediately at their Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per centum per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of public lands within the territories hereby ceded to the United States, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law.

The records of the proceedings of the said commissioners, together with vouchers and documents produced before them, relative to the claims to be adjusted and decided upon by them, shall, after the close of their transactions, be deposited in the Department of State of the United States, and copies of them, or any part of them, shall be furnished to the Spanish Government, if required, at the demand of the Spanish Minister in the United States.

ART. 13. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article; which, having been altered by this treaty, or having received their entire execution, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle. But, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Governments acknowledge this principle, and not of others.

ART. 14. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up at the instance of the Consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belong to the vessels that claim them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, the American Consul in a Spanish port shall exhibit the document known by the name of artículo, and the Spanish Consul in an American port the roll of the vessel; and if the name of the deserter or deserters who are claimed shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and be delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ART. 14. The United States hereby certify that they have not received any compensation from France for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, for the satisfaction of which provision is made by this treaty; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may avail herself of the same, in such manner as she may deem just and proper.

ART. 15. The present treaty shall be ratified, in due form, by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, the underwritten Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of His Catholic Majesty have signed, by virtue of their powers, the present treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, and have thereunto affixed their seals, respectively.

Remarks of the Secretary of State.

ART. 1. Agreed to.*

ART. 2. Requires a more explicit explanation.*

ART. 3. The Chevalier de Onis requires that the boundary between the two countries shall be the middle of the rivers, and that the navigation of the said rivers shall be common to both nations.

The Secretary of State maintains that the United States have always intended that the property of the river should belong to them. He insists on this point, as an essential condition, as the means of avoiding all collision, and as a prin-

† Mr. De Onis being at this time confined by indisposition, at his request Mr. Hyde de Neuville had a personal interview with the Secretary of State on the 15th of February, at which there was a full and free discussion of the projet of Mr. De Onis, delivered February 9th, and of the counter-projet communicated by him to Mr. De Onis, February 13th. Immediately after this interview, Mr. De Neuville reduced to writing this paper, in which are noted the objections of Mr. De Onis to parts of the counter-projet, the replies to those objections by the Secretary of State, and the points to which both parties were agreed. He sent a copy of the paper the next morning to the Secretary of State, and another copy to Mr. De Onis. Being intended merely as a private minute, that both parties might be satisfied of the correctness in which their respective remarks were stated, it was drawn up partly in French, and partly in our own language. The passages here marked with asterisks are in English in the original paper. The rest is translated.

The minutes upon the eighth article, compared with the draught in the projet of Mr. De Onis, with that of the counter-projet by the Secretary of State, and with the article as finally expressed in the treaty, fully elucidate the understanding of the parties that the grants of land dated before, as well as after the 24th January, 1818, were annulled, excepting those upon which settlements had been commenced, the completion of which had been prevented by the circumstances of Spain, and the recent revolutions in Europe.

Relations with Spain.

ciple adopted henceforth by the Union in its treaties with its neighbors. He agrees, however, that the navigation of the said rivers to the sea shall be common to both people. The Secretary of State conceives that in this clause there is nothing humiliating to Spain, as seemed to be thought; since it is not intended to impose on her an onerous stipulation, but to fix a territorial limit, which, in fact, might be extended beyond the rivers mentioned. He considers this clause as indispensable, and as eminently calculated to preserve a good understanding between the two people.

Agreed.

The Minister of Spain agrees to the one hundredth degree of longitude, and to remove all difficulties, to admit the forty-second instead of the forty-third degree of latitude, from the Arkansas to the Pacific ocean.

ART. 4. Agreed, as proposed by the Secretary of State.

ART. 5. Agreed.

ART. 6. Agreed.

ART. 7. Agreed, with the addition that the United States shall furnish transports and the necessary escort for conveying the aforesaid troops of His Catholic Majesty, and their baggage, to the Havana.*

ART. 8. This article cannot be varied from what is contained in the Chevalier's projet, as the object of the last clause therein is merely to save the honor and dignity of the sovereignty of His Catholic Majesty.*

Agreed.

Agreed, with the following explanation: that all grants of land which shall not be annulled by this convention are valid to the same extent as they are binding on His Catholic Majesty.*

REMARKS.—The Secretary of State observed to me that the Federal Government would most assuredly never entertain the idea of disturbing individuals who were vested with a bona fide title to their property; but, as a treaty ought not to cover fraudulent practices, so no more could be asked of the United States than could be offered by His Catholic Majesty; that, being in this case substituted for His Majesty, they would scrupulously fulfil their engagements; but that more could not be expected of them.

The Secretary of State even proposes, if Mr. De Onis wishes it, that the article shall be inserted in the treaty, as proposed by the Minister of Spain, on condition that the above explanation shall be given in the form of a note. The Federal Government, unwilling to leave anything in a state of doubt or uncertainty, only wishes to place on the most secure footing whatever is just and honorable, and is, at the same time, perfectly satisfied that His Catholic Majesty neither asks nor wishes more.

ART. 9. Mr. De Onis requires that the article should run thus:

"To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain arising from [un] lawful seizures at sea, and in the ports or territories of His Catholic Majesty in Spain or in his colonies."*

Agreed.*

And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claims to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.*

To the above claim Mr. De Onis adds that the United States will satisfy all the just claims which the inhabitants and Spanish officers of the Floridas may have upon them in consequence of the damages they may have sustained by the operations and proceedings of the American army, as is customary with the citizens of the United States under similar circumstances.*

ART. 10. Agreed, as it is proposed by the Secretary of State.*

Agreed.*

Relations with Spain.

ART. 11. The Chevalier desires that the stipulation of five millions of dollars contained in this article may be stricken out, for he is aware that the territories ceded are sufficient to pay triple that sum; and, by agreeing to that stipulation, it would appear that Spain, in consideration only of the said amount, has ceded the two Floridas and other territories, when she would not have ceded them for twenty millions were it not her desire to arrange and terminate all differences with the United States.

The remaining parts of this article are agreed to.*

ARTS. 12, 13, 14, and 15. Agreed.*

ART. 16.

REMARKS.—This article, which I have not before me, is I believe, that in which Mr. De Onis requires that American vessels shall only receive clearances for a specified port. It appears that this article cannot be assented to by the Federal Government, and is, therefore, as observed by Mr. Adams, wholly inadmissible in the present treaty.

ART. 17. Mr. De Onis requires that Spanish vessels shall be admitted for twelve years into all the ports of the ceded territories upon the same footing as the vessels of the United States.

2. That no nation shall enjoy the like privilege during the said term of twelve years.

3. That, at the expiration of the said term, Spanish vessels shall be received in said territories on the same footing as the most favored nations.

N. B. It is agreed by both parties that the articles stipulating the cession of the Floridas shall be so framed as to cover the honor of both countries, and prove that the treaty is an amicable transaction, divested of all mental reservations, disguise, or recrimination.

The writer of these hasty notes believes that he perfectly comprehended, and has faithfully stated, the conversation he had this morning with the Secretary of State.

He will be equally attentive in stating to-morrow the answer of the Minister of Spain. He flatters himself that all obstacles are nearly removed, and he deems it no small satisfaction in having been invited, by the confidence manifested in him by both parties, to co-operate, however feebly, in an event which cannot fail to have a powerful influence on the peace and happiness of both hemispheres.

WASHINGTON, February 15, 1819.

Mr. De Neuville to the Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, February 16, 1819.

Mr. De Neuville has the honor to present his respects to Mr. Adams, and to enclose the statement hastily drawn up by him yesterday evening. Mr. De Neuville believes he has omitted nothing of what Mr. Adams did him the honor to communicate to him. He will see Mr. De Onis to-day at one o'clock, and afterwards, that is, between two and three, he will call at the office of the Department, and hand to Mr. Adams the projet sent by him to Mr. De Onis. Mr. De N. hopes that Mr. De Onis will remove the remaining unimportant difficulties, for which nothing on the part of Mr. De N. will be omitted. He avails himself with pleasure of this occasion to offer to Mr. Adams the renewed assurances of his high consideration.

The Secretary of State does not appear to find a positive objection to agreeing to the alteration required. However, as he conceives this article to be more important to the United States than to Spain, he will examine the question, and see whether the request of the Minister of Spain may or may not be agreed to.

Agreed.*

Agreed, as to the ports of St. Augustine and Pensacola.

Agreed.

Refused.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America, to all whom these presents shall concern, Greeting:

Know ye, that I have given and granted, and do hereby give and grant, to John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the United States, full power and authority, and also a general and special command, to meet and confer with the Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Catholic Majesty residing in the United States, being furnished with the like full powers of and concerning the limits between the territories of the United States and those of his said Catholic Majesty in North America, and any mutual cessions of part of the same; of and concerning all matters of difference between the said United States and His Catholic Majesty, and concerning the relations of navigation and commerce between the said United States and His Catholic Majesty; and to conclude a treaty touching the premises, for the final ratification of the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, if such advice and consent be given.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand at the City of [L. S.] Washington, the sixteenth day of February, A. D. 1819, and of the independence of the United States the forty-third.

JAMES MONROE.

By the President:

JOHN Q. ADAMS,
Secretary of State.

Full power of the King of Spain to Don Luis de Onís.

Don Ferdinand, by the grace of God, King, &c., &c., &c., desiring to consolidate the friendship and good understanding which happily prevail between my kingdoms and the United States of America, through the mutual interests existing between the two Governments, and reposing full confidence in you, Don Luis de Onís, Knight of the royal and distinguished order of Charles III., and my Minister Plenipotentiary to the United States of America, by reason of your fidelity, distinguished zeal, and approved capacity, in the arduous concerns committed to you, have granted, and by these presents do grant, to you full power, in the most ample form, to treat, of yourself, and without other intermediate authority, with such person or persons as may be authorized by the President of the United States, and on the principles of the most perfect equality and fitness, to conclude and sign a treaty of amity, whereby past differences may be adjusted, and a firm and lasting peace established between the two Governments; obliging ourselves, as we do hereby oblige ourselves and promise, on the faith and word of a King, to approve, ratify, and fulfil, and to cause to be inviolably observed and fulfilled, whatsoever may be stipulated and signed by you; to which intent and purpose I grant you all authority and full power, in the most ample form, thereby and of right required.

In faith whereof, we have given command to issue the present, signed with our royal hand, sealed with our privy seal, and countersigned by our underwritten first Secretary of State, and of universal despatch.

Given at Madrid, the 10th day of September, 1816.

FERDINAND.
PEDRO CEVALLOS.

Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty.

The United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, desiring to consolidate, on a permanent basis, the friendship and good correspondence which happily prevail between the two parties, have determined to settle and terminate all their differences and pretensions by a treaty, which shall designate, with precision, the limits of their respective bordering territories in North America.

With this intention, the President of the United States has furnished with their full powers John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State of the said United States, and His Catholic Majesty has appointed the most excellent Lord Don Luis de Onís Gonzales Lopez y Vara, Lord of the town of Rayaces, perpetual regidor of the corporation of the city of Salamanca, Knight grand cross of the royal American order of Isabella, the Catholic, decorated with the lys of La Vendée, knight-pensioner of the royal and distinguished order of Charles III., member of the supreme assembly of the said royal order, of the council of His Catholic Majesty, his secretary, with exercise of decrees, and his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the United States of America.

And the said plenipotentiaries, after having exchanged their powers, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE 1. There shall be a firm and inviolable peace and sincere friendship between the United States and their citizens, and His Catholic Majesty and subjects, without exception of persons or places.

ART. 2. His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States, in full property and sovereignty, all the territories which belong to him, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the names of East and West Florida. The adjacent islands dependent on said provinces, all public lots and squares, vacant lands, public edifices, fortifications, barracks, and other buildings, which are not private property, archives, and documents, which relate directly to the property and sovereignty of said provinces, are included in this article. The said archives and documents shall be left in possession of the commissioners or officers of the United States duly authorized to receive them.

ART. 3. The boundary line between the two countries west of the Mississippi, shall begin on the Gulf of Mexico, at the mouth of the river Sabine, in the sea; continuing north, along the western bank of that river, to the thirty-second degree of latitude; thence, by a line due north, to the degree of latitude where it strikes the Rio Roxo of Natchitoches, or Red river; then, following the course of the Rio Roxo, westward, to the degree of longitude one hundred west from London, and twenty-three from Washington; then, crossing the said Red river, and running thence, by a line due north, to the river Arkansas; thence, following the course of the southern bank of the Arkansas to its source, in latitude forty-two degrees north; and thence, by that parallel of latitude, to the South sea; the whole being as laid down in Melish's map of the United States, published at Philadelphia, improved to the 1st of January, 1818. But if the source of the Arkansas river shall be found to fall north or south of latitude forty-two degrees, then the line shall run from the said source, due south or north, as the case may be, till it meets the said parallel of latitude of forty-two degrees; and thence, along the said parallel, to the South sea; all the islands in the Sabine, and the said Red and Arkansas rivers, throughout the course thus described, to belong to the United States; but the use of the waters, and the navigation of the Sabine to the sea, and of the said rivers Roxo and Arkansas, throughout the extent of the said boundary, on their respective banks, shall be common to the respective inhabitants of both nations. The two high contracting parties agree to cede and renounce all their rights, claims, and pretensions to the territories described by the said line, that is to say: The United States hereby cede to His Catholic Majesty, and renounce forever, all the rights, claims, and pretensions, to the territories lying west and south of the above described line; and, in like manner, His Catholic Majesty cedes to the said United States all his rights, claims, and pretensions to any territories east and north of the said line, and, for himself, his heirs, and successors, renounces all claim to the said territories forever.

ART. 4. To fix this line with more precision, and to place the landmarks which shall designate exactly the limits of both nations, each of the contracting parties shall appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who shall meet, before the termination of one year from the date of the ratification of the treaty, at Natchitoches, on Red river, and proceed to run and mark the said line, from the mouth of the Sabine to the Red river, and from the Red river to the river Arkansas, and to ascertain the latitude of the source of the said river Arkansas, in conformity to what is above agreed upon and stipulated, and the line of latitude forty-two degrees, to the South sea; they shall make out plans and keep journals of their proceedings, and the result agreed upon by them shall be considered as part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two Governments will amicably agree respecting the necessary articles to be furnished to those persons, and also to their respective escorts, should such be deemed necessary.

ART. 5. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction; and all those who may desire to remove to the Spanish dominions shall be permitted to sell or export their effects at any time whatever, without being subject, in either case, to duties.

ART. 6. The inhabitants of the territories which His Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by this treaty, shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities, of the citizens of the United States.

ART. 7. The officers and troops of His Catholic Majesty in the territories hereby ceded by him to the United States shall be withdrawn, and possession of the places occupied by them shall be given within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or sooner if possible, by the officers of His Catholic Majesty, to the commissioners or officers of the United States duly appointed to receive them; and the United States shall furnish the transports and escort necessary to convey the Spanish officers and troops and their baggage to the Havana.

ART. 8. All the grants of land made before the 24th of January, 1818, by His Catholic Majesty, or by his lawful authorities, in the said territories ceded by His Majesty to the United States, shall be ratified and confirmed to the persons in possession of the lands, to the same extent that the same grants would be valid if the territories had remained under the dominion of His Catholic Majesty. But the owners in possession of such lands, who, by reason of the recent circumstances of the Spanish nation, and the revolutions in Europe, have been prevented from fulfilling all the conditions of their grants, shall complete them within the terms limited for the same, respectively, from the date of this treaty; in default of which the said grants shall be null and void. All grants made since the 24th day of January, 1818, when the first proposal, on the part of His Catholic Majesty, for the cession of the Floridas was made, are hereby declared and agreed to be null and void.

ART. 9. The two high contracting parties, animated with the most earnest desire of conciliation, and with the object of putting an end to all the differences which have existed between them, and of confirming the good understanding which they wish forever to be maintained between them, reciprocally renounce all claims for damages or injuries which they themselves, as well as their respective citizens and subjects, may have suffered, until the time of signing this treaty.

The renunciation of the United States will extend—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To all claims on account of prizes made by French privateers, and condemned by French consuls, within the territory and jurisdiction of Spain.

3. To all claims of indemnities on account of the suspension of the right of deposit at New Orleans, in 1802.

4. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of Spain, arising from the unlawful seizures at sea, and in the ports and territories of Spain or the Spanish colonies.

5. To all claims of citizens of the United States upon the Spanish Government, statements of which, soliciting the interposition of the Government of the United States, have been presented to the Department of State, or to the Minister of the United States in Spain, since the date of the convention of 1802, and until the signature of this treaty.

The renunciation of His Catholic Majesty extends—

1. To all the injuries mentioned in the convention of the 11th of August, 1802.

2. To the sums which His Catholic Majesty advanced for the return of Captain Pike from the Provincias Internas.

3. To all injuries caused by the expedition of Miranda, that was fitted out and equipped at New York.

4. To all claims of Spanish subjects upon the Government of the United States, arising from unlawful seizures at sea, or within the ports and territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Finally to all the claims of subjects of His Catholic Majesty upon the Government of the United States, in which the interposition of His Catholic Majesty's Government has been solicited before the date of this treaty, and since the date of the convention of 1802, or which may have been made to the Department of Foreign Affairs of His Majesty, or to his Minister in the United States.

And the high contracting parties respectively renounce all claim to indemnities for any of the recent events or transactions of their respective commanders and officers in the Floridas.

The United States will cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which, by process of law, shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers, and individual Spanish inhabitants, by the late operations of the American army in Florida.

ART. 10. The convention entered into between the two Governments on the 11th of August, 1802, the ratifications of which were exchanged the 21st December, 1818, is annulled.

ART. 11. The United States, exonerating Spain from all demands in future, on account of the claims of their citizens, to which the renunciations herein contained extend, and considering them entirely cancelled, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars. To ascertain the full amount and validity of those claims, a commission, to consist of three commissioners, citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; which commission shall meet at the City of Washington, and, within the space of three years from the time of their first meeting, shall receive, examine, and decide upon the amount and validity of all the claims included within the descriptions above mentioned. The said commissioners shall take an oath or affirmation, to be entered on the record of their proceedings, for the faithful and diligent discharge of their duties; and in case of the death, sickness, or necessary absence of any such commissioner, his place may be supplied by the appointment as aforesaid, or by the President of the United States during the recess of the Senate, of another commissioner in his stead. The said commissioners shall be authorized to hear and examine, on oath, every question relative to the said claims, and to receive all suitable authentic testimony concerning the same. And the Spanish Government shall furnish all such documents and elucidations as may be in their possession, for the adjustment of the said claims, according to the principles of justice, the laws of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty between the two parties, of 27th October, 1795; the said documents to be specified when demanded at the instance of the said commissioners.

The payment of such claims as may be admitted and adjusted by the said commissioners, or the major part of them, to an amount not exceeding five millions of dollars, shall be made by the United States, either immediately at their Treasury, or by the creation of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable from the proceeds of sales of public lands within the territories hereby ceded to the United States, or in such other manner as the Congress of the United States may prescribe by law.

The records of the proceedings of the said commissioners, together with the vouchers and documents produced before them, relative to the claims to be adjusted and decided upon by them, shall, after the close of their transactions, be deposited in the Department of State of the United States; and copies of them, or any part of them, shall be furnished to the Spanish Government, if required, at the demand of the Spanish Minister in the United States.

ART. 12. The treaty of limits and navigation of 1795 remains confirmed in all and each one of its articles, excepting the second, third, fourth, and twenty-first, and the second clause of the twenty-second article, which, having been altered by this treaty, or having received their entire execution, are no longer valid.

With respect to the fifteenth article of the same treaty of friendship, limits, and navigation, of 1795, in which it is stipulated that the flag shall cover the property, the two high contracting parties agree that this shall be so understood with respect to those Powers who recognise this principle; but, if either of the two contracting parties shall be at war with a third party, and the other neutral, the flag of the neutral shall cover the property of enemies whose Government acknowledges this principle, and not of others.

ART. 13. Both contracting parties, wishing to favor their mutual commerce, by affording in their ports every necessary assistance to their respective merchant vessels, have agreed that the sailors who shall desert from their vessels in the ports of the other shall be arrested and delivered up, at the instance of the consul, who shall prove, nevertheless, that the deserters belonged to the vessels that claimed them, exhibiting the document that is customary in their nation; that is to say, the American Consul in a Spanish port shall exhibit the document known by the name of articles, and the Spanish Consul in American ports the roll of the vessel; and if the name of the deserter or deserters, who are claimed, shall appear in the one or the other, they shall be arrested, held in custody, and delivered to the vessel to which they shall belong.

ART. 14. The United States hereby certify that they have not received any compensation from

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

France; for the injuries they suffered from her privateers, consuls, and tribunals, on the coasts and in the ports of Spain, for the satisfaction of which provision is made by this treaty; and they will present an authentic statement of the prizes made, and of their true value, that Spain may avail herself of the same in such manner as she may deem just and proper.

ART. 15. The United States, to give His Catholic Majesty a proof of their desire to cement the relations of amity subsisting between the two nations, and to favor the commerce of the subjects of His Catholic Majesty, agree that Spanish vessels, coming laden only with productions of Spanish growth or manufactures, directly from the ports of Spain or of her colonies, shall be admitted, for the term of twelve years, to the ports of Pensacola and St. Augustine, in the Florida, without paying other or higher duties on their cargoes, or of tonnage, than will be paid by the vessels of the United States. During the said term, no other nation shall enjoy the same privileges within the ceded territories. The twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

ART. 16. The present treaty shall be ratified, in due form, by the contracting parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months from this time, or sooner if possible.

In witness whereof, we, the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and of His Catholic Majesty, have signed, by virtue of our powers, the present treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, and have thereunto affixed our seals, respectively. Done at Washington, this twenty-second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen.

Resolution of the Senate advising ratification.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 24, 1819.

Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein,) That the Senate do advise and consent to the ratification of the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, made and concluded at Washington, on the 22d day of February, 1819, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty.

Attest: CHARLES CUTTS,
Secretary.

Ratification by the President of the United States.

JAMES MONROE, President of the United States of America: To all, and singular, who shall see these presents, greeting:

Whereas a treaty of amity, settlement, and limits, between the United States of America and His Catholic Majesty, was concluded and signed between their plenipotentiaries in this city, on the twenty-second day of the present month of February, which treaty is word for word as follows: [Here follows the treaty, as before.] And whereas the Senate of the United States, by their resolution of the twenty-fourth day of the same month, (two-thirds of the Senators then present concurring,) did advise and consent to the ratification of the said treaty:

Now, therefore, I, James Monroe, President of the United States of America, having seen and considered the treaty above recited, do, in pursuance of the aforesaid advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, by these presents accept, ratify, and confirm the said treaty, and every clause and article thereof, as the same are hereinbefore set forth.

In faith whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereto affixed. Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, [L. S.] this twenty-fifth day of February, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and of the independence of the said States the forty-third.

JAMES MONROE.

DEFEAT OF THE SEMINOLE INDIANS—CAPTURE OF SPANISH POSTS IN FLORIDA—ARBUTHNOT AND AMBRISTER.

[Communicated to Congress, by the President of the United States, with his opening Message of the 17th of November, 1818.]

Extract of a letter from R. Sands, commanding Fort Gaines, to the officer of Fort Hawkins, dated

FEBRUARY 2, 1817.

When the Colonel, with the troops, left Fort Scott, he gave the buildings in charge of one of the Perrymans, from whom I have just received a letter, handed me by his brother, who arrived here after I had commenced writing this.

Perryman states in his letter that the Red Sticks, (or hostiles,) after we had left the fort, came in companies, and carried off everything we had left with him, and what he had purchased of Butler, burnt three houses, and threatened, if he did not leave the place, to burn it over his head. He got what few articles he could, with his family, in a canoe, and came to his brother's, who informs me that there is at present about three hundred Indians imbodyed at the Forks, and others constantly joining them. He does not know their intentions, but understood a party was going out to steal horses, &c.

This morning, (3d,) one of the settlers waited on me to advise in what manner to act, as eight or ten Indians had been at his house, and ordered him off; telling him that in six days they would come back, and, if he was not gone, they would drive him away.

Extract of a letter from the Governor of Georgia to General Gaines, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

You, no doubt, have already been informed that the notorious Woodbine has recently made his appearance again at the mouth of the Appalachicola, and that he has an agent now among the Seminole Indians and negroes in that quarter, stirring them up to acts of hostility against this country; and that Woodbine himself has gone in an armed vessel to some part of the West Indies for supplies. Connected with this fact is another, which may serve as an intimation of the future conduct of these people, when once in possession of the supplies which it is said they expect on the return of Woodbine. About ten or twelve days ago, a small party of those Indians entered the frontier of Wayne county, and stole two horses and some cattle. They were pursued by some of the inhabitants, who peaceably demanded a restoration of the stolen property; and, instead of a compliance on the part of the Indians, they immediately fired upon the whites, who retired without returning a shot. One of the whites was mortally wounded.

MILLEDGEVILLE, February 5, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of this date.

The facts which you have been pleased to communicate, in relation to the late hostile conduct of the Seminole Indians, must and shall receive my immediate and particular attention. I am not authorized to change the destination of the 4th infantry, but, should I receive no authority to recall a part of that corps, I shall order one or two companies of artillery (to do duty as infantry) from Charleston to the southern frontier of this State, with instructions to check Indian hostilities, and at the same time to remove from Indian land such intruders as may remain, after being duly notified to remove.

Extract of a letter from George Perryman to Lieutenant Sands, dated

FEBRUARY 24, 1817.

The charge given me by Colonel Clinch and yourself, and other officers of the United States, induces me to believe there is a confidence placed in me which I ought not to deceive. I therefore think it my duty, as well as my inclination, to give you the following information:

There was a friend of mine not long since in the Fowltown, on Flint, and he saw many horses, cattle, and hogs, that had come immediately from the State of Georgia, and they are bringing them away continually. They speak in the most contemptuous manner of the Americans, and threaten to have satisfaction for what has been done—meaning the destruction of the negro fort. There is another of my acquaintances returned immediately from the Seminole towns, and saw the negroes on parade there. He counted about six hundred that bore arms. They have chosen officers of every description, and endeavor to keep up a regular discipline, and are very strict in punishing violators of their military rules. There is said to be about the same number of Indians belonging to their party, and there are both negroes and Indians daily going to their standard. They say they are in complete fix for fighting, and wish an engagement with the Americans, or McIntosh's troops; they would let them know they had something more to do than they had at Appalachicola. They have chosen Bowlegs for their head, and nominated him King, and pay him all kind of monarchical respect, almost to idolatry, keeping a picket guard at the distance of five miles. They have a number of the likeliest American horses; but there are one or two chiefs who are not of the choir. Kenhijah, the Missioukey chief, is one that is an exception.

Copy of a letter from Archibald Clarke, Intendant, St. Mary's, Georgia, to General Gaines, dated

FEBRUARY 26, 1817.

SIR: In consequence of a recent and most obnoxious act perpetrated by a party of Indians, (supposed to be of the Lower Creeks,) in this county, in the murder of an unfortunate white woman and her two infant children, by which the defenceless inhabitants on our frontier have been thrown into a distressing state of alarm, I avail myself of the earliest opportunity in giving information that may be relied on, under the fullest assurance that immediate measures will be adopted to guard and prevent a repetition of such cruel and barbarous acts.

On the 24th instant, the house of a Mr. Garret, residing in the upper part of this county, near the boundary of Wayne county, was attacked during his absence, near the middle of the day, by this party, consisting of about fifteen, who shot Mrs. Garret in two places, and then despatched her by stabbing and scalping. Her two children (one about three years, the other two months) were also murdered, and the eldest scalped. The house was then plundered of every article of value, and set on fire. A young man in this neighborhood, hearing the report of guns, went immediately towards the house, where he discovered the murdered family. The flames having only commenced, they were extinguished, and he spread the alarm. The workmen from my mills and a few others assembled to pursue; but, having but few arms, and not otherwise equipped, their pursuit proved fruitless. The Indians were attacked as far as the men dared venture. Their course was parallel with the western branch of Spanish creek, which induces the belief of their being Indians of the lower tribes.

On this open, extensive, and entirely unprotected frontier, the poor and innocent inhabitants have ever been exposed to these calamities. Representation after representation to the several Governors of this State, of cruel and unprovoked murders in this quarter by the Indians, have been made. A momentary disposition was manifested to afford relief; but a little time, however, would elapse before the alarm would subside, and the subject never more thought of, until again revived by an occurrence such as I have just related.

To you, sir, therefore, the inhabitants on the frontier, as well as others, through me, appeal for some protection. A small detachment of troops upon the head of the St. Mary's would answer a most valuable purpose, by at once checking the inroads of the savages, and preventing our abandoned and unprotected citizens from adventuring into the Indian country, and driving in herds of cattle.

Copy of a letter from R. Arbuthnot to the officer commanding at Fort Gaines, dated OKOLOKNE SOUND, March 3, 1817.

SIR: I am desired by Peter McQueen, an unfortunate Indian chief, who was some years since obliged to fly from the town of Tucky Batche, on the Tallapoohatch river, to claim of your friendship the delivery of a negro man named Joe, (taken away from him since the peace,) whom he stated to be in Fort Gaines. When McQueen left Tucky Batche, his property was considerable, both in negroes and cattle; of the former, ten grown negroes were taken by a half-breed man named Barney, nine of which, he learns, were sold, and one (a girl) is still in possession of said Barney. Twenty able negroes were taken by a chief named Colonel, or Auchi Hache, who acts also as an interpreter; and as he never had possession of any of those persons' property, nor ever did them an injury to his knowledge, he claims, as a further proof of your friendship, that you will use your influence in procuring those negroes for him; and, should they be given up by the persons holding them, there is one faithful negro among them, named Charles, who will bring them to him at Okolokne river.

The American headmen and officers that were accustomed to live near him can testify to his civility and good fellowship with them, and there are none of them, he is convinced, that would not serve him if in their power. As he owes nothing, nor ever took any person's property, none have a right to retain him; and he hopes that, through your influence, those persons now holding his negroes will be induced to give them up.

While I am thus advocating the cause of an unfortunate individual, allow me to claim an extension of your philanthropy to all the Indians within your circle, by your representing to them the folly of their quarrels, and that they ought to live quietly and peaceably with each other.

The Lower Creeks seem to wish to live peaceably and quietly, and in good friendship with the others; but there are some designing and evil-minded persons, self-interested, who are endeavoring to create quarrels between the Upper and Lower Creek Indians, contrary to their interest, their happiness, and welfare. Such people belong to no nation, and ought not to be countenanced by any Government.

The head chiefs request I will inquire of you why American settlers are descending the Chatahoochee, driving the poor Indian from his habitation, and taking possession of his home and cultivated fields?

Without authority, I can claim nothing of you; but a humane and philanthropic spirit guiding me, I hope the same will influence you; and if such is really the case, and that the line marked out by the treaty between Great Britain and the United States respecting the Indian nations has been infringed upon by the subjects of the latter, that you will represent to them their improper conduct, and prevent its continuance.

I hold in my possession a letter received from the Governor of New Providence, addressed to him by His Britannic Majesty's chief Secretary, informing him of the orders given to the British Ambassador at Washington, to watch over the interests of the Indian nations, and see that their rights are faithfully attended to and protected, agreeably to the treaty of peace made between the British and Americans.

I am in hopes that ere this there is arrived at New Providence a person from Great Britain with authority to act as agent for the Indian nation; and, if so, it will devolve on him to see that the boundary lines, as marked out by the treaty, are not infringed upon.

I hope you will not think these observations, made by desire of the chiefs, any improper interference, and requesting the favor of an answer, I am, respectfully, &c.

P. S. McQueen states that the offspring of the negroes, when he left Tucky Batche, were seven of those taken by Barney, and nine of those taken by Auchi Hache, and he supposes they have increased.

Copy of a letter from Lieutenant Richard M. Sands, fourth infantry, commanding at Fort Gaines, Georgia, to Colonel William King, or officer commanding the fourth regiment of infantry, dated

MARCH 15, 1817.

SIR: I enclose for your information two letters which I received a few days since. Yesterday, William Perryman, accompanied by two of the lower chiefs, arrived here. He informs me that McQueen, the chief mentioned in one of the enclosed letters, is at present one of the heads of the hostiles; that they are anxious for war, and have lately murdered a woman and two children. He likewise says that he expects the news in George Perryman's letter is true; for there are talks going through the towns that the English are to be at Okoloking river in three months.

I have sent an Indian runner to Okoloking, to ascertain what preparations the hostiles are making. I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from David B. Mitchell, Indian agent to the Secretary of War, dated

MILLEDGEVILLE, GEORGIA.

March 30, 1817.

By yesterday's mail I received a letter from Mr. Timothy Barnard, who resides on Flint river, in the Indian country, a considerable distance below the agency, in which he observes: "I have been informed two days past, from below, where the Red Stick class reside, that a party has been down near St. Mary's, and murdered a woman and two children, and brought off some horses. I have heard for some time past that the Red Stick party have commenced their Red Stick dances again, which is a proof that they mean to commence hostilities. Our forts, Crawford and Gaines, having been evacuated, I believe, has been the cause of the Red Stick class beginning again to commence hostilities. They think that our troops were afraid to continue there."

The murder of the woman and two children, spoken of by Mr. Barnard, had been previously communicated to me by the magistrates of Camden county; and I have no doubt but it was perpetrated in retaliation for the killing of an Indian about three or four weeks previous, on the Florida side of the St. Mary's river, by some worthless white men who reside on the frontiers of East Florida, and who live by plunder. They have for some time past been a perfect nuisance to the frontier of Georgia in that quarter; and although repeated complaints of their bad conduct have been made to the Governor of the province, yet, either from the want of ability or inclination, they have not been suppressed; but I believe that their impunity is attributable to the first, viz: inability on his part to apprehend and punish them.

The single fact of this murder being easily accounted for on the Indian principle of retaliation, I should dread no further bad consequences from it; but the other facts stated by Mr. Barnard can only be attributed to a settled plan of hostility on the part of the Indians, and that such a disposition has been encouraged by the removal of the troops from Camp Crawford. And I have the more reliance upon the intelligence as coming from Mr. Barnard, who has resided nearly fifty years in the Indian country, and is perfectly well acquainted with their habits and customs, and whose family connexion gives him the best and surest means of correct information.

As an additional inducement to this measure, I will further state that I have received information from other persons at and near Fort Gaines, that a British agent is now among these hostile Indians, and that he has been sending insolent messages to the friendly Indians and white men settled above the Spanish line. He is also charged with stimulating the Indians to their present hostile aspect; but, whether he is an acknowledged agent of any foreign Power, or a mere adventurer, I do not pretend to determine, but am disposed to believe him the latter. But be that as it may, and let the hostile disposition of the Indians proceed from what it may, a moderate regular force stationed at Camp Crawford, or any other suitable position in that quarter, will I am confident keep all quiet, and without it some serious mischief will result.

Extract—Gen. Gaines to the Secretary of War.

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T., April 3, 1817.

I received by the last mail a letter from Archibald Clarke, Esq., intendant of the town of St. Mary's, by which it appears that another outrage of uncommon cruelty has recently been perpetrated by a party of Indians upon the Southern frontier, near the boundary of Wayne county. They have massacred a woman (Mrs. Garrett) and two of her children; the mother and eldest child were scalped, the house plundered and burnt.

MONTGOMERY, April 3, 1817.

SIR: The enclosed letter contains some additional information upon the subject of my communication of this date.

Most respectfully, &c.

EDMUND P. GAINES.

HON. SECRETARY OF WAR.

FORT GAINES.

GENERAL GAINES: I am requested by all the citizens to inform you of our situation, believing that no communication has been forwarded giving a detail of the information received, our distress, and the prospect of approaching destruction.

We are hourly told, by every source of information, by the friendly Indians, by letters from William Hambly and Edmund Doyle, who reside low down on the Appalachicola, that all the lower tribes of Indians are imbedded, and are drying their meats to come on to the attack of this post. The British agent at Okelocknes Sound is giving presents to the Indians. We have among us Indians who have been down, and received powder, lead, tomahawks, knives, and a drum for each town, with the royal coat of arms painted on it. We have, at this time, at least five hundred Indians skulking in this neighborhood, within three or four miles of us, who will not act for themselves, and who are evidently waiting the signal to strike an effectual blow. They have stolen almost every horse belonging to the citizens. They have scared them from the fields which they have cleared, and have taken possession of their houses. They are now stealing horses, cattle, and hogs, from the Georgia lines, and have killed one or two families on the St. Tillas.

The citizens have all assembled near the fort, not able to return to the States, nor no prospect of making crops. The Indians have all returned to their towns below the line, and this post is unable to remove them. The troops are scarce of provisions, and no prospect of the early arrival of more.

Nothing but speedy relief, by troops, can quiet the people, or save this country from destruction. Respectfully, yours, &c.

A. CULLOH.

Copy of a letter from G. Leftwich, adjutant seventh infantry, to General Gaines, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T.,

July 28, 1817.

SIR: Agreeably to your instructions of the 26th instant, I proceeded to the Burnt Corn spring, near the place where the recent murder was committed by an Indian; and, from the best information received, I have the honor to make the following report:

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

1. It does not appear that any misunderstanding existed between the Indians and the citizen killed, (Mr. Glass.)

2. It appears that the Indians made the first assault, and that without any provocation on the part of the citizens.

3. From the information received, it appears that Mr. Glass heard four or five guns fire some short distance from his house. He was under the impression that the Indians were doing some mischief, and went out for the purpose of ascertaining what the firing was at. He had proceeded but a short distance when he discovered an Indian woman; he went towards her, and inquired if she knew who it was that was shooting; she made him no answer; he asked her several times and received no answer. She said something, and an Indian that was concealed in the bushes, not more than fifteen steps from Mr. Glass, rose up and shot him through the body. He snatched his gun at the Indian, who immediately ran off. He then fired at the woman as she was running after the man, but does not know whether he killed her or not. His wound being very painful, he dropped his gun and shot-bag, and attempted to return home. He had not proceeded more than three hundred yards when he fainted, and remained until found by a traveller. This was on Saturday, and he died Sunday morning, leaving a widow and eight children to lament his untimely death. He was a man who supported a good character in his neighborhood, though in limited circumstances. On the following day there was a cow found near the place where Mr. Glass was shot, with four balls shot through her.

4. There was only one Indian man seen by Mr. Glass; but from the circumstances of his hearing four guns, and the cow being found near that place with four balls shot through her, induces a belief that he had several companions with him, although they were not seen by Mr. Glass. From the report of the friendly Indians, it is believed they are fifty or sixty in number, and that they have returned to the camp on Pine Barren creek, occupied by them at the time they murdered Johnson and Magasky, as a part of them were met by several persons near the Pine Barren spring a few days after the murder was committed.

Colonel Dale's party pursued them to their camp on the Sappallogas, but found it deserted apparently several days. They have several small fields of corn growing at the place. From the sign left, it is believed they have a number of horses, and some of the largest description. The Indian who acted as guide states they have at this time a negro boy and a horse belonging to Johnson and Magasky. It appears to be the prevailing opinion among the inhabitants that they may be found on Pine Barren creek.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T.,
August 25, 1817.

Having received several communications from persons settled upon the public land, within the tract acquired by the treaty at Fort Jackson, containing general accusations against the Indians; that they had killed cattle and hogs, and stolen corn, &c., from the inhabitants, and requesting the interposition of military authority, I have uniformly referred them to the civil magistrates, because I have in no instance during the present year heard of anything like an assemblage of force among the Indians in this part of the Territory. Nor could I see any reason why persons who had obtruded themselves upon the public land, and contrary to law, should be allowed military protection against the petty offences of which these people complained, especially as it did not appear that the civil authority had been opposed nor even resorted to by the complainants.

The enclosure, marked A, contains a copy of my reply to the inhabitants of Murder Creek, and in this you will find the substance of my other replies, both written and verbal. Since the date of this reply, and, as I have reason to believe, some days after it reached the settlement of Murder Creek, a Mr. Glass, near that place, was killed by an Indian, who was said to be accompanied by three others.

On receiving this information, I immediately despatched a discreet officer, Lieutenant Leftwich, to ascertain the particulars of the outrage, with a view to send a party in pursuit of the offenders, in case they should not have been arrested by the civil authority.

A.

HEADQUARTERS, CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T.,
July 12, 1817.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your communication of the 21st of last month, stating that the Indians residing upon the Conaka had killed cattle and hogs belonging to the inhabitants of Murder Creek, and had broke into their houses, and taken from them some provisions, corn, &c.

In reply, I have to observe, that all Indians within the lately acquired territory are amenable to our laws, and may be prosecuted for the offences of which you complain, in the same manner as if they were white inhabitants.

The lands cultivated by friendly Indians within the ceded territory have been reserved and guaranteed to them by treaty; and by a late act of Congress, the agent of Indian affairs has been authorized to settle the respective claims to such reservations. Until this is effected, there exists no where any sort of authority to drive off such Indians settled upon the public land.

Governor Mitchell, the agent, will in a short time enter upon the examination and adjustment of those claims.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

The disposition which you have manifested to abstain from "rash measures" towards those Indians, affords ground to hope that, viewing them as a part of the human family, possessing the right of residing among us, you will make allowance for their ignorance and their wants, which are calculated rather to awaken our commiseration than to excite in us a spirit of hostility towards them.

That you may have peace and prosperity throughout your settlement, is the sincere wish of your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES.

Extract of a letter from Major Twiggs to General Gaines, dated

FORT SCOTT, September 17, 1817.

Your communication to the Indians on the east side of Flint river was read and explained to the principal chief of the Mickasukles, the 6th of this month. He promised to give an answer in ten days at furthest. I have detained the express until this time, in expectation of sending it on by him, but have been disappointed. I have not heard from them since. The interpreter informed me the principal warriors were absent when he was there, but what were present said they never heard of Indians being given up to be punished by the whites; that they had heard of their being sometimes killed by themselves, for offences committed, but seemed to think that giving them up was out of the question; but said they would have a meeting, and would answer the letter in a few days. As they have not done so, I think but one construction can be put on their conduct. The young seemed to dislike the communication very much; and when Gregory was about leaving the town, he offered his hand to an Indian, who held out his with a knife in it, and refused to shake hands with him. He staid so short a time among them, that it was impossible for him to give much information respecting them. Captain Donoho has returned; he has been sick in Hartford, which was the cause of his delay. On his return the Indians were very rude to him, and frequently threatened his guide, and once caught hold of the Captain's bridle in a threatening manner.

CAMP MONTGOMERY, M. T.,
October 1, 1817.

I have the honor to lay before you a copy of a letter which I have received from the chiefs of ten of the Seminole towns, in reply to my demand for the delivery of the murderers of our citizens.

By this communication it appears that, instead of a compliance with my demand, the chiefs have set up a claim against us for the lives of three Indians, for whom they allege they have not yet taken satisfaction. They charge us with having killed ten of their warriors, and, claiming a balance of three to be due them, they admit, by necessary implication, that they have killed seven of our citizens.

* The inhabitants promised not to resort to "rash measures."

They acknowledge the murder of a woman (Mrs. Garret) and her two children. But the chiefs attempt to justify this act upon the ground that the warriors who committed the outrage had just before lost some friends; had entered our settlements to take satisfaction; found at the house of Garret a kettle belonging to the Indians who had been killed, and from this circumstance supposed the murder had been committed by the "husband of the woman;" they therefore killed her and her two children!

By a letter from Major Twiggs, the commandant of Fort Scott, I learn that he had been warned, some weeks past, by the principal chiefs of the Fowltown, (fifteen miles above the fort, and twenty above the national boundary,) not to cut another stick on the east side of the Flint river; adding, that the land was his, and he was directed by the Powers above to protect and defend it, and should do so; and it would be seen talking could not frighten him. Major Twiggs adds, he had not seen the chief, nor any of his people, since he made this threat. The Major states, in another letter, that this town had been detected in stealing one hundred head of cattle in one drove, all of which they had killed.

FORT SCOTT, September 18, 1817.

Since I started the express this morning, the Indians have delivered the enclosed letter to me.

I have the honor to be, &c.

To the commanding officer at Fort Hawkins.

SEPTEMBER, the 11th day, 1817.

DEAR SIR: Since the last war, after you sent word we must quit the war, we, the red people, have come over on this side. The white people have carried all the red people's cattle off. After the war, I sent to all my people to let white people alone, and stay on this side of the river and they did so; but the white people still continue to carry off their cattle. Barnard's son was here, and I inquired of him what was to be done; and he said we must go to the head man of the white people, and complain. I did so, and there was no head white man, and there was no law in this case. The whites first began, and there is nothing said about that, but great complaint made about what the Indians do. This is now three years since the white people killed three Indians. Since that they have killed three other Indians, and taken their horses, and what they had; and this Summer they killed three more; and very lately they killed one more. We sent word to the white people that these murders were done, and the answer was, that they were people that were outlaws, and we ought to go and kill them. The white people killed our people first, the Indians then took satisfaction. There are yet three men that the red people have never taken satisfaction for. You have wrote that there were houses burnt, but we know of no such thing being done; the truth, in such cases, ought to be told; but this appears otherwise. On that side of the river the white people have killed five Indians; but there is nothing said about that, and all that the Indians have done is brought up. All the mischief the white people have done ought to be told to their head man. When there is anything done you write to us, but never write to your head man what the white people do. When the red people send talks, or write, they always send the truth. You have sent to us for your horses, and we sent all that we could find; but there were some dead; it appears that all the mischief is laid on this town, but all the mischief that has been done by this town is two horses; one of them is dead, and the other was sent back. The cattle that we were accused of taking, were cattle that the white people took from us; our young men went out and brought them back, with the same marks and brands. There were some of our young men out hunting, and they were killed; others went to take satisfaction, and the kettle of one of the men that was killed was found in the house where the woman and two children were killed; and they supposed it had been her husband who had killed the Indians, and took their satisfaction there. We are accused of killing up Americans, and so on; but since the word was sent to us that peace was made, we stay steady at home, and meddle with no person. You have sent to us respecting the black people on the Suwannee river; we have nothing to do with them. They were put there by the English, and to them you ought to apply for anything about them. We do not wish our country desolated by an army passing through it, for the concern of other people. The Indians have slaves there also—a great many of them. When we have an opportunity we shall apply to the English for them, but we cannot get them now. This is what we have to say at present.

Sir, I conclude by subscribing myself, &c.

P. S. There are ten towns have read this letter, and this is the answer.

Extract of a letter from George Graham, acting Secretary of War, to Brevet Major General Edmund P. Gaines, Fort Hawkins, Georgia, dated
OCTOBER 30, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, covering a copy of the reply which was made by ten of the Seminole towns, to the demand made by you on them for the surrender of the murderers of some of our citizens.

These papers have been submitted to the President, and I am instructed by him to inform you that he approves of the movement of the troops from Fort Montgomery to Fort Scott; the appearance of this additional force, he flatters himself, will at least have the effect of restraining the Seminoles from committing further depredations, and perhaps of inducing them to make reparation for the murders which they have committed. Should they, however, persevere in their refusal to make such reparation, it is the wish of the President that you should not, on that account, pass the line, and make an attack upon them within the limits of Florida, until you shall have received instructions from this Department.

You are authorized to remove the Indians still remaining on the lands ceded by the treaty made by General Jackson with the Creeks; and, in doing so, it may be proper to retain some of them as hostages until reparation may be made for the depredations which have been committed. On this subject, however, as well as to the manner of removing them, you will exercise your discretion. McIntosh, and the other chiefs of the Creek nation, who were here some time since, expressed then, decidedly, their unwillingness to permit any of the hostile Indians to return to their nation.

P. S. The authority to remove the Indians will, of course, not extend to those Indians and their families who have claims to reservations of lands under the treaty.

Extract of letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War.

CHATAHOOCHEE, November 9, 1817.

From various reports from the Seminole Indians I can only learn that they are determined to deliver up none of their offenders; nor will they restore stolen property, except one town, the Mickasukees, the chief of which professes to be friendly. By the enclosed letter from Major Twiggs it appears that they are determined to attack us as soon as we pass Flint river; and that they have two thousand seven hundred warriors. Although I feel little faith in their threats, and believe their numbers to be overrated, yet I deem it proper to be provided with additional force. I have therefore requested of his excellency the Governor of Georgia a regiment of infantry and a squadron of cavalry, which, he has informed me, are held in readiness to march.

Extract of a letter from General Edmund P. Gaines to Major General Andrew Jackson.

HEADQUARTERS, FORT GAINES, GEORGIA,
November 9, 1817.

Previous to my leaving the Coroka I ascertained that the accounts I had received respecting the Seminole Indians being at Pensacola were incorrect, and that the number of Indians of different tribes there did not exceed what had been usual at this season of the year. This statement was soon after confirmed by Mr. Denson and the interpreter Cornels. The latter, however, states that he had seen and conversed with the hostile party of Ochu warriors, part of whom killed Johnston, and Magasky, and Mr. Glass. They now consist of about thirty warriors, or thirty-five. They were, a few days past, at the mouth of Yellow Water; had several stolen horses which they offered for sale, and declared their determination to be always hostile towards our citizens.

From Major Twiggs I learn that he has received information, upon which he places reliance, that the Indians have recently had a meeting at the Mickasukee town, of near two thousand seven hundred warriors, when it was determined they would attack us as soon as we should cross the Flint river. Although I put little faith in these threats, and believe their numbers to be overrated, yet I deem it proper, keeping an eye to the safe side, to be provided with additional force; and have therefore desired the Governor of Georgia to send me the regiment of infantry and squadron of cavalry held in readiness for that purpose: for, in a war with savages, I think little should be hazarded; as every little advantage which we suffer them to acquire tends to add, in an extraordinary degree, to their strength and confidence.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to Major General Andrew Jackson.

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA,
November 21, 1817.

The first brigade arrived at this place on the 19th instant. I had previously sent an Indian runner to notify the first town chief, E-me-hemaut-by, of my arrival, and with a view to ascertain whether his hostile temper had abated, requested him to visit me. He replied, that he had already said to the commanding officer here all he had to say, and he would not come.

He had warned Major Twiggs not to cross or cut a stick of wood on the east side of Flint river, alleging that the land was his; that he was directed, by the Powers above and below, to protect and defend it, and should do so. This being the talk referred to, and his town having continued to be hostile ever since the last war, having participated, as the friendly Indians assert, in the predatory war carried on for some time past against the Georgia frontier, I yesterday detached two hundred and fifty men, (supposed to be about the strength of the town,) under the command of Major Twiggs, with orders to bring me the chief and warriors, and, in the event of resistance, to treat them as enemies.

The detachment arrived at the town early this morning, and were instantly fired upon, but without effect. The fire was briskly returned by the detachment, and the Indians put to flight, with the loss of four warriors slain; and, as there is reason to believe, many were wounded.

It is with deep regret I have to add, that a woman was accidentally shot, with some warriors, in the act of forcing their way through our line, formed for the purpose of arresting their flight. The unfortunate woman had a blanket fastened around her, (as many of the warriors had,) which, amidst the smoke in which they were enveloped, rendered it impossible, as I am assured by the officers present, to distinguish her from the warriors.

Among the articles found in the house of the chief, was a British uniform coat, (scarlet,) with a pair of gold epaulettes, and a certificate signed by a British captain of marines, "Robert White, in the absence of Colonel Nicholls," stating that the chief had always been a true and faithful friend to the British.

The reports of friendly Indians concur in estimating the number of hostile warriors, including the Red Sticks and Seminoles, at more than two thousand, besides the blacks, amounting to near four hundred men, and increasing by runaways from Georgia. They have been promised, as several Indians inform me, assistance from the British at New Providence. This promise, though made by Woodbine, is relied on by most of the Seminole Indians. I have not a doubt but they will sue for peace, as soon as they find their hopes of British aid to be without foundation.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War.

FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA,
November 26, 1817.

With a view to ascertain the strength of the hostile Indians in the vicinity of Fowl Town, and to reconnoitre the adjacent country, I, a few days past, detached Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle, with three hundred officers and men. The colonel reports that the Indians had placed themselves in a swamp, out of which about sixty warriors made their appearance near the town, and, with the war-whoop, commenced a brisk fire upon our troops, which they returned in a spirited manner. The fire continued but fifteen or twenty minutes, when the Indians were silenced, and retired into the swamp, with a loss, which the colonel estimates at six or eight killed, and a greater number wounded. We had one man killed, and two wounded.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 2, 1817.

SIR: Your letter of the 9th ult. advising of the call on the Governor of Georgia to assemble the auxiliary force, which had been previously required by you, at Fort Hawkins, on the 25th ultimo, has been received.

It is hoped that the letter addressed to you from this Department, on the 30th of October, will have been received, and that you will confine your operations to the objects stated in that communication, and to such a disposition of the regular force under your command as will deter the Seminole Indians from making further depredations on the frontiers of Georgia.

The state of our negotiations with Spain, and the temper manifested by the principal European Powers, make it impolitic, in the opinion of the President, to move a force at this time, into the Spanish possessions, for the mere purpose of chastising the Seminoles for depredations which have heretofore been committed by them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

GEO. GRAHAM.
Major Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES.

*Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.General Gaines to the Secretary of War.*HEADQUARTERS, FORT SCOTT, GEORGIA, December 2, 1817.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on the 26th ultimo, your communication of the 30th October. I am very happy to find that the President approves of my movement. But I much regret that his just expectations, as to the effect there was reason to believe would be produced on the minds of the Indians, by this movement, have not been realized. I am now quite convinced that the hostility of these Indians is, and has long been, of so deep a character, as to leave no ground to calculate upon tranquillity, or the future security of our frontier settlements, until the towns south and east of this place shall receive a signal proof of ability and willingness to retaliate for every outrage. It is now my painful duty to report an affair of a more serious and decisive nature than has heretofore occurred, and which leaves no doubt of the necessity of an immediate application of force and active measures on our part. A large party of Seminole Indians, on the 30th ultimo, formed in ambuscade, upon the Appalachicola river, a mile below the junction of the Flint and Chatahoochee, attacked one of our boats, ascending the river near the shore, and killed, wounded, and took, the greater part of the detachment consisting of forty men, commanded by Lieutenant R. W. Scott of the 7th infantry. There were also on board, killed or taken, seven women, the wives of soldiers. Six men of the detachment only escaped, four of whom were wounded. They report that the strength of the current, at the point of attack, had obliged the Lieutenant to keep his boat near the shore; that the Indians had formed along the bank of the river, and were not discovered until their fire commenced; in the first volley of which Lieutenant Scott and his most valuable men fell. The Lieutenant and his party had been sent from this place, some days before, to assist Major Muhlenburg in ascending the river with three vessels laden with military stores, brought from Montgomery and Mobile. The Major, instead of retaining the party to assist him, as I had advised, (see the enclosure No. 1,) retained only about twenty men; and, in their place, put a like number of sick, with the women, and some regimental clothing. The boat thus laden was detached alone for this place. It is due to Major Muhlenburg to observe, that, at the time he detached the boat, I have reason to believe, he was not apprized of any recent hostilities having taken place in this quarter. It appears, however, from Lieutenant Scott's letter, received about the hour he was attacked, (enclosure No. 2,) that he had been warned of the danger. Upon the receipt of this letter, I had two boats filled up with covers, and with port-holes for defence; and detached Capt. Clinch, with an officer and forty men, with an order to secure the movement of Lieut. Scott, and then to assist Major Muhlenburg; this detachment embarked late in the evening of the 30th, and must have passed the scene of action below at night, and some hours after the affair terminated. I have not yet heard from Captain Clinch; I shall immediately strengthen the detachment under Major Muhlenburg with another boat secured against the enemy's fire. He will, therefore, move up with safety, keeping near the middle of the river; I shall, moreover, take a position, with my principal force, at the junction of the rivers, near the line; and shall attack any force that may attempt to intercept our vessels and supplies below; as I feel persuaded the order of the President, prohibiting an attack upon the Indians below the line, has reference only to the past, and not to the present or future outrages, such as the one just now perpetrated, and such as shall place our troops strictly within the pale of natural law, when self defence is sanctioned by the privilege of self preservation. The wounded men who made their escape concur in the opinion, that they had seen upwards of five hundred hostile Indian warriors at different places below the point of attack; of the force engaged, they differ in opinion, but all agree that the number was very considerable, extending about one hundred and fifty yards along the shore, in the edge of a swamp or thick woods. I am assured by the friendly chief, that the hostile warriors of every town upon the Chatahoochee prepared canoes and pushed off down the river to join the Seminoles, as soon as the account of my movement from the Alabama reached them.

The Indians, now remaining upon the Chatahoochee, I have reason to believe, are well disposed. One of the new settlers, however, has recently been killed; but it has been clearly proved that the murderer had belonged to the hostile party. The friendly chiefs in the neighborhood, when apprized of the murder, assembled a party and sent in pursuit of the offender; and followed him to Flint river, on the route to Mickasukee, whither he escaped. Orrishajo, and several other friendly chiefs, have offered me their services, with their warriors, to go against the Seminoles. I have promised to give them notice of the time that may be fixed for my departure, and then to accept their services. The enclosure (No 3) contains the substance of what I have said to the chiefs who have visited me, several of whom reside south of the Spanish line and west of the Appalachicola river. It was expected by the chiefs, that I should communicate to them my views and wishes. I felt authorized to say but little, and I deemed it necessary, in what I should say, to endeavor to counteract the erroneous impressions by which they have been misled by pretended British agents. I hope the President will see, in what I have said, nothing to disapprove. I feel persuaded a report of the various talks, which I received from the chiefs, would show the propriety of what I have said to them; such a report I have not a moment's time now to make. The Indians are, at this moment, firing at our camp from the opposite line of the river. I have the honor to be, &c.

FORT SCOTT, NOV. 1817.

SIR: The waters having risen sufficiently high to enable you to ascend the river with all the vessels, I wish you to do so, though it should take longer than I had anticipated. You can avail yourself of the aid of Lieutenant Scott's detachment to expedite your movements hither. Keep your vessels near to each other; and should you meet with any insuperable obstacle, endeavor to apprise me thereof, and you shall have additional relief. Wishing to see you soon with your fleet, I remain yours, &c. E. P. GAINES.

SPANISH BLUFF, NOV. 28, 1817.

SIR: Enclosed you will receive Major Muhlenburg's communication, which he directs me to forward to you by express from this place. Mr. Hambly informs me that Indians are assembling at the junction of the river, where they intend to make a stand against those vessels coming up the river; should this be the case, I am not able to make a stand against them. My command does not exceed forty men, and one half sick, and without arms. I leave this immediately. I am, &c.

R. W. SCOTT,
Lieutenant 7th Infantry.

NOTE.—The bearer of this is entitled to three dollars on delivering this letter. The Indians have a report here that the Indians have beaten the white people.

CHIEFS AND WARRIORS: The President of the United States has been informed of the murders and thefts committed by the hostile Indians in this part of the country. He has authorized General Jackson to arrest the offenders, and cause justice to be done. The Indians have been required to deliver up the murderers of our citizens, and the stolen property, but they refused to deliver either; they have had a council at Mickasukee, in which they have determined upon war; they have been at war on helpless women and children, let them now calculate upon fighting men. We have long known that we had enemies east of this river: we likewise know we have some friends; but they are so mixed together we cannot always distinguish the one from the other. The President, wishing to do justice to his red friends and children, has given orders for the bad to be separated from the good. Those who have taken up arms against him, and such as have listened to the bad talks of the people beyond the sea, must go to Mickasukee Suwany, where we wish to find them together. But all those who were our friends in the war will sit at their homes in peace; we will pay them for what corn and meat they have to sell us; we will be their friends, and when they are hungry we will give them meat. The hostile party pretend to calculate upon help from the British! they may as well look for soldiers from the moon to help them. Their warriors were beaten, and driven from our country by American troops. The English are not able to help themselves; how, then, should they help the old "Red Sticks," whom they have ruined by pretended friendship?

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT SCOTT, GEO., DEC. 4, 1817.

I would much more willingly devote my time and humble faculties in the delightful occupation of bringing over savage man to the walks of civil life, where this is practicable without force, than to contribute to the destruction of any one of the human race; but every effort in the work of civilization, to be effectual, must accord with the immutable principles of justice. The savage must be taught and compelled to do that which is right, and to abstain from doing that which is wrong. The poisonous cup of barbarism cannot be taken from the lips of the savage by the mild voice of reason alone; the strong mandate of justice must be resorted to and enforced.

After all that the wisdom and philanthropy of our country and Government, aided by millions of money, have yet been able to effect, it is a melancholy truth, that in no Indian nation within my knowledge, (the Chickasaws excepted,) has the scalping knife been laid aside for any considerable length of time, until their every hope of using it with impunity had been defeated.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, DEC. 9, 1817.

SIR: Your letter, bearing date the 21st ultimo, advising of the first brigade at Fort Scott on the 19th ultimo, and of the subsequent attack with the Indians at Fowltown, has been received. Although the necessity of this attack, and the consequent effusion of blood, is exceedingly to be regretted, yet it is hoped that the prompt measures which were taken by you on your arrival at Fort Scott, and the display of such an efficient force in that quarter, will induce the Indians to abstain from further depredations, and sue for peace.

Referring to the letters addressed to you from this Department on the 30th of October and 2d of December, as manifesting the views of the President, I have to request that you conform to instructions therein given. Should the Indians, however, assemble in force on the Spanish side of the line, and persevere in committing hostilities within the limits of the United States, you will, in that event, exercise a sound discretion as to the propriety of crossing the line for the purpose of attacking them, and breaking up their town. I have the honor to be, &c.

CREEK AGENCY, DEC. 14, 1817.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two letters of the 31st of October, and 3d

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

November last. Before the receipt of those letters, a meeting of the principal chiefs had been called by the Little Prince, at the town of Thla-tah-cau, on the Chatahoochee river, near Fort Mitchell, at which I attended; the object of which was to take into consideration the state of the nation, and particularly the measures which it could be proper for them to take in relation to those Indians residing between Fort Gaines and the Spanish line; and also the conduct they could pursue with regard to the war with the Seminoles. They unanimously confessed much regret that hostilities should have commenced between the troops under General Gaines and the Seminole Indians, who reside within our boundaries; because these Indians, although they did not unite with the friendly ones during the late war, neither did they join the Red Sticks, and had recently expressed a great desire to become decidedly friendly. They were, however, perfectly willing that their warriors should join General Gaines against the Seminoles. I stated to them that it was not the desire of the President to go to war with the Seminoles, but he could honorably avoid it; and, at the present moment, he would not consent to their going against the Seminoles within the Spanish territory, under authority of the United States; that they must wait, therefore, until I gave them the order to march. At the same time, I advised them to send a confidential and trusty chief down to the Indians living between Fort Gaines and the Spanish line, and desired them immediately to remove above the line of Jackson's treaty; and that the same chief should then proceed directly to the Micasukee town, the headquarters of the Seminoles and Red Sticks of the late war, and propose to them certain terms of peace, and a cessation of their force to go against the negro camp. The objects which this chief was instructed to hold out to those Indians as attainable, by adopting this course, were various, and of sufficient importance, in the view of those making the proposition, to induce a belief that they would be favorably received; in which event, I should proceed to Fort Scott to adjust their differences. This course of proceeding was immediately adopted, and the head man of the Osoc-hes, Hopoi-Haijo, set out on the same day, charged with the mission. To afford time to ascertain the result of this plan, and that I might be able to communicate with the War Department, another meeting was assigned for the 11th of next month, at this place, when all the friendly warriors, with McIntosh at their head, will attend to receive their final orders. But, on my return to this place, I fortunately fell in with General Gaines, on his way to Fort Hawkins, from whom I learned the fatal disaster which had befallen a detachment of his troops, under Lieutenant Scott, on the 30th of last month; the particulars of which he informed me he had communicated, which renders a detail from me unnecessary.

In speaking with General Gaines upon the subject of the road from Fort Hawkins to Fort Stoddert, he informed me that it was not this road to which he referred in his communication to the War Department, but ninety miles of new road, which he had made between Fort Montgomery and Fort Scott, and by which he recently marched the troops from the former to the latter post. As soon as I receive the five thousand dollars which you have ordered to be remitted to me, I shall endeavor to lay it out to the very best advantage in repairing the bridges and roads; and General Gaines has assured me that, as soon as the troops can be spared, a detachment shall be ordered to assist.

Copy of a letter from Major General E. P. Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQ'RS, FORT HAWKINS, GEORGIA,
December 15, 1817.

SIR: I arrived at this place the day before yesterday morning. In the afternoon of the same day, I reviewed the detachment of Georgia militia, under the command of Brigadier General Glascock. They look well, and are ready to march; but the inattention on the part of the contractor's agent to the requisitions for a supply of rations will, I apprehend, according to custom, delay the movement of the militia until some part of the frontier settlements suffer by the Indians, who, I have no doubt, will detach considerable parties for this purpose as soon as they find themselves unable to succeed in any attempt against the regular troops at Fort Scott; and I think it cannot be long before they are convinced of this. But, although I consider the regular troops secure in the positions they occupy, yet I am satisfied their numbers will not warrant their being detached, or leaving their places of defence, except to a very small extent.

I have just now received Mr. Graham's letter of the 2d instant.

The views of the President, so far as may depend on me, shall be scrupulously observed. I should instantly discharge the Georgia militia, were I not strongly impressed with a belief that such a step would hazard the safety of the frontier settlements. The Seminole Indians, however strange and absurd it may appear to those who understand little of their real character and extreme ignorance, entertain a notion that they cannot be beaten by our troops. They confidently assert that we have never beaten them, or any of their people, except when we have been assisted by "red people." This will appear the less extraordinary when it is recollected that they have little or no means of knowing the strength and resources of our country; they have not travelled through it; they read neither books nor newspapers; nor have they opportunities of conversing with persons able to inform them. I feel warranted, from all I know of these savages, in saying that they do not believe we can beat them. This error of theirs has led them, from time to time, for many years past, to massacre our frontier citizens, often the unoffending and helpless mother and babes. I felt myself fully authorized to adopt the only measures which long experience has proved to be adequate to put a stop to these outrages. I was pleased with the prospect of being instrumental in effecting an object of so much importance to our exposed frontier settlements, and which I felt, and still feel, persuaded would, in the end, benefit the Indians. The steps I have taken are known to the Department of War. You can more readily conceive than I can describe the mortification and disappointment I have experienced in being compelled to suspend or abandon my measures at a moment when the loss of Lieutenant Scott and his party had given the enemy an occasion of triumph, and a certain prospect of increasing his strength, by enlisting against us all who had before wavered or hesitated. Permit me, then, to repeat my request that I may be permitted to return.

There is little ground to apprehend that we shall find it necessary to follow the Indians far beyond the national boundary. They are now to be found in very considerable parties on our side of the line.

I have not a doubt of the necessity of sending to Flint river, by way of Hartford, the detachment of militia under General Glascock. My endeavors to put the detachment in motion will delay my own movement until the 17th instant, at which time I shall resume my march to Point Petre.

An opinion prevails among the well-informed of this part of the country (who have, by some means unknown to me, been advised of our intention to take Amelia Island) that our troops there will meet with no opposition. Should this be the case, I shall return to Fort Scott without delay. I have the honor, &c.

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Maj. Gen. commanding.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from Major General Andrew Jackson to George Graham, Acting Secretary of War, dated

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, December 16, 1817.

I am in hopes that this check to the savages may incline them to peace. Should it not, and their hostility continue, the protection of our citizens will require that the wolf be struck in his den; for, rest assured, if ever the Indians find out that the territorial boundary of Spain is to be a sanctuary, their murders will be multiplied to a degree that our citizens on the southern frontier cannot bear. Spain is bound by treaties to keep the Indians, within her territory, at peace with us; having failed to do this, necessity will justify the measure, after giving her due notice, to follow the marauders and punish them in their retreat. The war hatchet having been raised, unless the Indians sue for peace, your frontier cannot be protected without entering their country; from long experience, this result has been fully established.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 16, 1817.

SIR: On the receipt of this letter, should the Seminole Indians still refuse to make reparation for their outrages and depredations on the citizens of the United States, it is the wish of the President that you consider yourself at liberty to march across the Florida line and to attack them within its limits, should it be found necessary, unless they should shelter themselves under a Spanish post. In the last event, you will immediately notify this department.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES,
Fort Scott, Georgia.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 26, 1817.

SIR: Your letters of November the 26th, and of the 2d and 3d instant, were received by this morning's mail. The fate of the detachment under Lieutenant Scott is much to be regretted; but, under all the circumstances, no blame can attach to yourself or the officers immediately concerned. When the order of the 12th November was given, directing you to repair to Amelia Island, it was hoped that the Seminoles would have been brought to their reason without an actual use of force, and that their hostility would not assume so serious an aspect. It is now a subject of much regret, that the service in that quarter has been deprived of your well known skill and vigilance.

Before this will reach you, it is hoped that the views of the President in relation to the settlement on Amelia Island will have been effected. Should that be the case, it is his wish that you should immediately repair to Fort Scott, and resume the command till General Jackson's arrival, to whom orders have this day been sent to command there; or, if you should think the force under your command sufficient, and other circumstances will admit, to penetrate through Florida, and co-operate in the attack on the Seminoles. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the topography of the country between Amelia and their towns, to say whether it is practicable, or what would be the best route; but it is not improbable that some advantage might be taken of the St. John's river, to effect the object. Should it be practicable, it is probable efficient aid might be given to the attack on them, as the attention of their warriors must be wholly directed towards Fort Scott. Should you think it practicable and advisable to co-operate, with the force under your command, you will leave a sufficient number at Amelia Island to retain the possession of that place.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Major Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 26, 1817.

SIR: You will repair, with as little delay as practicable, to Fort Scott, and assume the immediate command of the forces in that section of the Southern division.

The increasing display of hostile intentions, by the Seminole Indians, may render it necessary to concentrate all the contiguous and disposable force of your division upon that quarter. The regular force now there is about eight hundred strong, and one thousand militia of the State of Georgia are called into service. General Gaines estimates the strength of the Indians at a thousand seven hundred. Should you be of opinion that your numbers are too small to meet the enemy, you will call on the Executives of adjacent States for such an additional militia force as you may deem requisite.

General Gaines had been ordered, early in last month, to repair to Amelia Island. It is presumed that he has, therefore, relinquished the command at Fort Scott. Subsequent orders have been given to General Gaines, (copies of which will be furnished you,) advising him that you would be directed to take command, and directing him to reassume, should he deem the public interest to require it, the command at Fort Scott, until you should arrive there. If, however, the General should have progressed to Florida before these subsequent orders may have reached him, he was instructed to penetrate to the Seminole towns through the Floridas, provided the strength of his command at Amelia could justify his engaging in offensive operations.

With this view, you may be prepared to concentrate your forces, and to adopt the necessary measures to terminate a conflict which it has been the desire of the President, from considerations of humanity, to avoid, but which is now made necessary by their settled hostilities.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Major Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

Extract of a letter from General Gaines to the Secretary of War, dated

HENRYS, HARTFORD, GEORGIA,
January 9, 1818.

SIR: I had the honor to receive, on my way to this place, the 5th instant, by express, from Fort Hawkins, your very acceptable letters of the 9th and 16th of last month.

The instructions they contain shall be regarded with the attention which their importance demands.

I received, by the same express several reports, up to the 21st December, from Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle and Major Muhlenburg, copies of which I enclose herewith, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4.

By these reports it appears that the principal force of the enemy (between eight hundred and twelve hundred) has been assembled on the Apalachicola, with a view to cut off our supplies ordered up that river, and that the detachment with the vessels has suffered severe annoyance and some loss.

I do not apprehend that we shall lose a vessel, or that any serious consequences to the troops at Fort Scott will result from the delay and difficulty of obtaining supplies by that channel. The supply of flour is more than sufficient for the present month, and there is likewise a considerable supply of corn at the fort, and beef cattle in the neighborhood. Of salted pork there can be but little until the arrival in the river of thirty thousand rations, and with every other requisite supply ordered in the early part of last month from Mobile, and which may be brought up the river in the covered ball-proof boats which have been prepared for the purpose. But to guard against every untoward obstacle in that quarter, I have ordered supplies from this place and Fort Hawkins, part of which are now on the way, and will be deposited at a work now constructing by the detachment under General Glasscock, on Flint river, at the Chehaw village, sixty miles above Fort Scott, whence the supplies will be taken in ball-proof boats; and I have strong ground to believe they will be at Fort Scott by the 24th of the present month, at which time I calculate upon being able to concentrate my force, and shall lose no time in attempting a decisive blow, which I trust will terminate the war.

I have received information, that a party of Indians entered the settlement near Traders' Hill, a few days past, killed a woman, and took off some three or four negroes. I had previously ordered a detachment of artillery from Amelia Island, with two companies of militia taken from General Floyd's division, to take post at Traders' Hill, for the defence of that settlement. I have reason to believe the artillery arrived at the Hill about the time the murder was committed, and the militia soon after, and that the Indians were pursued.

The residue of militia taken from General Floyd's division (five companies) are ordered to this place to reinforce General Glasscock's command, excepting one company, which will be posted near the big bend of Oakmulgee.

The detachment under General Glasscock, delayed by rainy weather, bad roads, and want of punctuality in the contractor's department, may not be able to form a junction with the United States troops in time to put an end to the war before their term of service expires, which will be early in next month. I have therefore requested of his Excellency the Governor of this State an additional force, to assemble at this place the first of next month, to consist of four battalions of infantry and four companies of riflemen, for three months, which I hope will meet your approbation.

No. 1.

FORT SCOTT, December 20, 1817.

SIR: Since the day of your departure I have not received the least information, except by Indians, from Fort Gaines, and I have no information whatever of the Georgia militia or McIntosh's Indians.

You will herewith receive a copy of Brevet

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

Major Muhlenburg's letter to me, of the 16th instant, which will apprise you of his situation. The armed boat I sent down yesterday, under the command of Captain Blackstone, with a supply of fifteen days' provisions for the men on board the vessel, and some materials to better secure them from the fire of the enemy. I had the boat so altered as to make her convenient to carry forward an anchor, by which means the vessels will be enabled to progress slowly, and I think will reach this in eight or ten days, unassisted by the wind; they are about thirty miles below.

I shall do everything the force under my command will permit, without hazarding too much, to draw the attention of the enemy from the vessels, whose force, from the best information I have been able to obtain, is between eight hundred and twelve hundred Indians and negroes, and increasing daily. On the 13th instant, Hamby and Doyle were made prisoners by this party, and I presume killed, and their property of every description taken possession of. The chief, William Perryman, who had gone down with a party to protect Hamby and Doyle, was killed, and his men forced to join the opposite party. All the Indians on the Chattahoochee, below Fort Gaines, who are not disposed to go to war, I fear will be compelled to remove above for security.

The present war with these Indians will require a much greater force than was contemplated to bring it to a speedy and favorable conclusion. Capechinico, or the principal chief of the Mickasukee town, is in command of all the hostile Indians.

I have a large keel-boat on the stocks, and should I not be deceived will have her in a condition for service in twenty days at farthest; she will transport from three to four hundred barrels, and will be constructed to navigate the Apalachicola river with safety and despatch.

In consequence of the situation of our vessels, and the difficulty of supplying Fort Hughes, I have thought it best to recall the command. During the time Captain McIntosh commanded that post, he was surrounded by a large force, and his arrangements were such as to do him much credit; he did the enemy some injury, and had no men killed or wounded.

There is but about twenty days' rations of meat on hand at this post. I have sent the contractor's agent to Fort Gaines to forward beef, and, if he should be disappointed there, have directed him to proceed further. I am, sir, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE,
Lieut. Col. com'g.

Major Gen. GAINES.

No. 2.

FORT SCOTT, Dec. 21, 1817.

SIR: Since closing my letter, the keel-boat arrived from the vessels below with some wounded.

Major Muhlenburg states it is impossible for the vessels to get up, the shore being lined on both sides of the river with Indians and negroes who keep up a constant fire on them. He has determined, if the boat does not return to him this evening, to drop down, and try to get to the bay. The boat will leave this under the command of Major Twiggs at 12 o'clock to-day, and will reach them by sundown, provided it is not interrupted in its descent.

I shall endeavor to keep up an intercourse with them (by means of the keel-boat) until we can get the ammunition from on board, and, in the last extremity, they will be compelled to drop down to the bay; in doing which, I am apprehensive they will suffer severely.

You have, herewith, a copy of Brevet Major Muhlenburg's letter of the 19th instant. He appears dissatisfied that more has not been done for his relief; in this nothing shall be omitted that the force here can effect.

Should I attempt to march against the enemy with all the force here, with the intention of removing him from the river, I am confident I should not succeed, and, at least, would sustain a very considerable loss.

Men and means of every description are greatly wanting here, and should any misfortune happen to the vessels we have not half a supply of ammunition, and not a single stand of spare arms.

I have not heard a word from you since your departure. I am, sir, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE,
Lieut. Col. com'g.

Major Gen. E. P. GAINES.

NEAR THE OCHESEE TOWN,
Tuesday evening, Dec. 16, 1817.

SIR: On Monday morning the transports were attacked by the Indians from both sides of the river, with a heavy fire of small arms. We returned their fire; the firing has continued ever since. We have lost two killed and thirteen wounded, most of them severely; whether we have injured them any, I am unable to say. We are now compelled to remain here, as it is impossible for us to carry out a warp, as a man cannot show himself above the bulwark without being fired on. I can assure you that our present situation is not the most pleasant, not knowing how soon, or whether, we are to receive succor from above.

The wounded are in but a bad situation, owing to the vessels being much crowded, and it is impossible to make them any ways comfortable on board. Not having any other means to communicate to you, I am compelled to despatch the keel-boat under the command of Captain Clinch, with instructions to make the best of his way to Fort Scott.

I hope to hear from you soon with instructions how I am to proceed in my present situation.

With respect, &c.

P. MUHLENBURG, Major.

P. S. We have but a few days' provision on hand; the men have been on half allowance for some time.

No. 4.

NEW OCHESEE TOWN, Dec. 19, 1817.

SIR: Yours by Captain Blackston was received at 12 o'clock this morning, and was in hopes that you would have been able to afford some relief to the command, as our situation demanded that something should have been done immediately. That we are not able to progress is evident, as we have the enemy on both sides of the river, and, therefore, impracticable to carry out a warp. Had we not heard from you by the keel-boat this morning, it was decided that we should have attempted to return to the bay this evening. I shall now despatch the keel-boat under the command of Lieutenant Gray, and try to retain our present position until the night of the 21st.

In case we should not hear from you, or be reinforced by land, we shall make the attempt to reach the bay. For further particulars, I refer you to Lieutenant Gray. With respect, &c.

P. MUHLENBURG, Major.

Lieut. Colonel ARBUCKLE.

Extract of a letter to Brevet Major General Edmund P. Gaines, dated

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 16, 1818.

The honor of the United States requires that the war with the Seminoles should be terminated speedily, and with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked. Orders were issued soon after my arrival here, directing the war to be carried on within the limits of Florida, should it be necessary to its speedy and effectual termination. The orders, I presume, have been received.

As soon as it was known that you had repaired to Amelia Island, in obedience to orders, and it being uncertain how long you might be detained there, the state of things at Fort Scott made it necessary to order General Jackson to take command there. From his known promptitude, it is presumable that his arrival may be soon expected; and, in the meantime, full confidence is placed in your well established military talents. I hope the junction of the militia will enable you to carry on offensive operations, and to restrain the enemy from depredations on the frontier.

J. C. CALHOUN.

HEADQ'RS, HARTFORD, GEORGIA,
January 23, 1818.

SIR: I have received this day from Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle reports of the state of his command, up to the 18th of the present month, and from Brigadier General Glascock up to yesterday's date, copies of which I have the honor to enclose herewith, No. 1 to 6.

By these communications you will perceive that, whatever has been or can be said of the desire of the Seminole Indians to lay down their arms and make peace, there is in reality no prospect of peace, without beating them into a conviction of the danger and evil effects of a war with us; and I feel persuaded that a peace made with them at this time would be followed by scenes of more daring outrage than those which our frontier settlements have heretofore suffered.

I have learned from an officer lately at Fort Hawkins, that there is in the post-office at that place a letter from the Department of War to Major General Jackson. The hope of seeing him, and ascertaining his views upon the subject of our operations in this quarter, and to provide for supplying the additional detachment of militia ordered to this place, I have delayed my movement to Fort Scott until I see or hear from the General, or from the Department of War.

I have, &amp;c.

FORT GAINES, Dec. 23, 1817.

SIR: I received yours by Mr. Laycock last evening, expressing a wish to hear from this post. This is the third attempt that I have made to give you news from here; this same man was made prisoner on his way to your post, and a second time compelled to return back.

You are anxious to know of the movements of the militia and Indians. I will give you what I have heard on that subject; it was brought from Fort Mitchell by an Indian on express; he received it from Sam Sells, direct from Fort Hawkins; he states that the militia were to leave the Agency on last Thursday; no word of them here yet. He stated that there was considerable confusion amongst them about marching, and that some had refused to march; and that the agent had told the Indians that General Gaines had no business to go to the Indian towns and fire on them in the night; that he had acted like the Indians themselves in doing so. McIntosh had come as far as Fort Mitchell on his way, and the agent has sent him home, and told him to meet him at the Agency for a talk, in thirty days, eighteen of which yet remains, and that he should not move until the General Government should give the order. This I expect is the case; for they have sent Onis Horyo a talk that he was doing wrong to be in service in this country, till the agent should give him orders. He further states that the agent has sent a talk in Seminole, to the chiefs to meet him, and he would make peace for them, and the white people should have no satisfaction for what was done. This is the news here as it respects the Indians. I am induced to believe that they are not coming; nothing new here since you heard from this post. After all that I have said to the citizens, they are going from the fort to their houses. General Gaines directed me to send you the census of the people at this post. A few days since there were two hundred and eighty-five persons in the fort, sixty of which have left it. The General directed me to have a large corn house built for the reception of the people's corn; I have done so, but they have no disposition to do so. I am constantly advising the people to secure their provisions, but they will not take advice till it will be too late. So soon as they are done with the schooner, I shall expect a visit in this neighborhood. Six — will be sufficient to destroy all the corn in this part of the country, as it all remains at the people's houses without any protection.

An Indian report here says that Mr. Arbuthnot's son is with the Indians, giving them instructions, and that it was his doings that Doyle and Hambly were taken; they state that he is with Kenhija, and that his orders were to take them to him. The chiefs below here sent word to those above that they have heard that they were in the white people's service, and that they will pay them a visit after a little, and reward them for their conduct. Finding that those above are not coming down soon, they are considerably alarmed for fear they will fall on them.

ROBERT IRVIN.

Col. ARBUCKLE, com'g Fort Scott.

No. 2.

FORT SCOTT, Dec. 27, 1817.

SIR: Enclosed you will receive a copy of a letter I received yesterday from Captain Irvin. Can the information given by the Indian express be true?

The armed boat returned from the vessel in the Appalachicola river yesterday; and, although they have not progressed much, I was greatly gratified to be informed that no men had been killed or wounded on board of them, except those I informed you of in my communications of the 20th and 21st instant.

I consider the situation of those vessels much more safe than when I wrote to you last, and have little doubt I shall have them here in ten days from this time, or, if not, I can unload them with safety below, and have them returned to the bay.

I have had no information respecting the Georgia militia, or McIntosh and his Indians, except what is contained in the enclosed.

I have not heard of provisions being on the way from Fort Hawkins, nor have I received a line from you since your departure from this post. I am, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE, Lieut. Col. Com.

FORT MITCHELL, Dec. 30, 1817.

MY FRIEND: The messenger which was sent to the Mickasukeys has returned with an answer to our talk. The Mickasukeys say it was not them that began the war; they were sitting down in peace, and the white people came on them in the night and fired on them. The Mickasukeys are all sitting in their town and doing no mischief, and waiting to see if the white people will make peace with them. The people that shot at the boat, and killed all the white people, were the old Red Sticks from the Upper town—those that turned hostile last war. The man that was sent to the Mickasukeys (Hoopie Haija) with a peace-talk met the Mickasukeys at the half-way ground, coming with a peace-talk to us.

Mr. Hambly and Mr. Doyle were taken prisoners; Hoopie Haija saw them; Tustennogee Chepeo has gone to release them, and carry them to the fort at St. Mark's. I have sent you this little talk now; our meeting that you appointed will soon be, and then every thing will be made straight.

The Chehaws have received two letters from the army, and they had nobody to read them, and they do not know the contents, and wish the army could be stopped until our meeting is over.

TUSTENOGEE HOPOIE, HOPOIE HAIJA.

CAMP CUMMING, January 10, 1818.

SIR: Yours of the 8th is just received, and I am extremely gratified to hear of your arrival at Hartford, as I already feel considerably relieved. The many difficulties which have occurred since you left us, from contractors, together with the want of experience, I can assure you, has caused me to feel the responsibility attached to my command; but, with your instructions, I flatter myself I shall now be able to get on.

We are now encamped about four miles from Fort Blackshear, on a very beautiful and commanding spot, with a considerable creek on each side, about four miles distant, neither of which can be crossed with wagons. A bridge was erected on the one in our rear, but it is entirely gone; so soon as the one in our front falls sufficiently, it will be bridged. I have thought it advisable to have the roads repaired, which will be done immediately.

Upolicha, a confidential Indian, has just arrived with a talk from Conard, the purport of which is as follows: He states, that since the principal chiefs left home for the Agency, the whole of the property of one of them was taken off by some of the Fowltown Indians, and that Conard is considerably alarmed for his own property. He has advised us to be on our guard, particularly so far as it relates to the soldiers strolling from the camp, which, for fear of danger, will be attended to. We have not now on hand ten bushels of corn. Brockman is of opinion that it will be dangerous to go again to the Chehaw, in consequence of which I have, at his particular request, sent him with this express. I must refer you to him for further information as to the corn and provisions to be procured in the nation.

I am almost fearful, when I recollect for a moment, that the time of service for which this detachment has been called on, will expire before your object can be accomplished, as the officers, with a few exceptions, are governed by the men, and not the men by the officers. I am in hopes, however, that should your object not be accomplished by the first of next month, I shall be able to render you an essential service, by volunteers from my command, should it be deemed necessary. I will, however, have a personal interview with you on the subject, on your arrival at our camp.

Not having calculated on moving from this place for six or seven days, for want of provisions, &c., I gave a furlough to Captain Melvin; should you deem it necessary for us to move before that time, I would be glad that he would return. I am yours, &c.

CEDAR CREEK, 5 o'clock, Jan. 22, 1818.

SIR: I was ordered this evening by General Glasscock to take five men, and proceed immediately to meet Captain Leigh, who was packed from Hartford with provisions. I proceeded accordingly, and met him about two miles on the east side of this creek, and Captain Leigh, five men and myself, proceeded on to Blackshear's works, in considerable haste; when we reached the creek, we made a halt to fix on a pack, which was likely to fall, before we crossed. During this stay, Captain Leigh and a private of Captain Avery's company, by the name of Samuel Loftis, started to cross. I called to the Captain, and observed that he was probably going into danger; he replied not. As my party and self had crossed not more than half an hour before, I proceeded, and accompanied by this man Loftis, they had not gotten entirely across the creek, when they were fired on by a party of Indians, the number I suppose to be twenty or thirty, from the report of their guns, and both shot dead on the spot; I immediately rode back and ordered the provisions, together with Cornet Isaac Brown's command, consisting of twenty men, to a corner of General Blackshear's old works, on the east side of the creek, where we took shelter in a small breastwork, determined to secure the provisions if possible: this was the only alternative, as they were planted on the swamp, which was at least one hundred yards across, and I not having more than twenty-seven men under my command with guns. When we completed our works, Captain Snother and Mr. John Bridges proceeded down the creek, in order to make their way across to the army, that General Glasscock might be informed of the murder, and we reinforced: that reinforcement has just reached our works, commanded by Major Joseph Morgan. I, with Captain Donnelly's company, will proceed with the provisions to the army, and Major Morgan will pursue the trail.

I hope, sir, as this was written by a torch, that you will excuse, or correct, any mistake.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

F. E. HEARD, Brigade Major.

HEADQ'RS, HARTFORD, GEORGIA,
January 26, 1818.

SIR: In obedience to your order to me of the 2d instant, I proceeded to Savannah, when, to my great mortification, I found the draught little further advanced than when the order first issued from the Executive department. In a conference with Lieutenant Colonel Marshall, I learned that the draught has been made, but that a number of desertions had since taken place, which, with forty-seven determined exempt from duty, have reduced the quota one-half, and that he knows of no steps that can be adopted, without a flagrant violation of the civil law, to cause their attendance at the general rendezvous, if they refuse to go, which they do, almost unanimously. The draught from the 35th regiment have progressed further in their preparations for the service, though I was informed by Lieutenant Colonel Harrison that it would be some days before they could leave their homes, as an inquiry into exemption, and a second draught, would be necessary to fill their ranks.

On my leaving Savannah, Colonel Marshall assured me, that as soon as a second draught had been effected, and the necessary arrangements made for their movements, he would address to me a report to that effect, at Fort Hawkins, which has not been received, and I am left to conclude that the arrangements referred to have not been carried into effect. Captain Russell reported to me that he was prepared to furnish the transportation necessary for their movements, if it should be required. I have the honor, &c.

CLINTON WRIGHT,

Major United States Army.

General E. P. GAINES.

HEADQ'RS, HARTFORD, GEORGIA,
January 30, 1818.

SIR: I had the honor to receive yesterday your letters of the 26th December, and 16th of the present month, the first having followed me from Amelia Island.

I have, for some months past, endeavored to inform myself of the topography of the country between the Appalachicola and St. John's; but have received only the apparently imperfect accounts of some half-blooded blacks, and Indians, as to the western part of that tract of country. The eastern part is well known to many of the inhabitants of this State, with whom I have conversed. From Amelia Island to the Lochway, the country is, for the most part, what is here called pine barren, nearly level, intersected with creeks and ponds, bordered in many places with rich hammock land, which increases in quantity and quality as you approach the Lochway towns. From thence to St. Mark's and Appalachicola, the hammock land is found in very considerable bodies; much the largest portion of the country, however, is poor, sandy, pine barren. The hammock lands afford great quantities of live oak, some cedar, and other valuable timber. There are several large swamps on the route between the Lochway and St. Mark's, which, during a season of rainy weather, are impracticable, without the aid of boats; but the country being generally open, will admit of good roads, when the weather is moderately dry. I have not a doubt but the army may march with considerable facility, from the Appalachicola to St. John's, or Amelia Island, with the aid of a few vessels to send provisions, &c., from Fort Scott down the river, and thence coastwise to the mouth of the Suwanee river, 130 miles east of the Appalachicola, and about 140 miles west, southwest from Amelia Island. The last mentioned distance may be marched in eight days, without wagons or baggage, the troops carrying their own provisions in their haversacks. A movement from Amelia Island, by the way of St. John's and Lochway, as you have suggested, would, I think, produce the desired effect, in co-operation with the troops from Fort Scott; upon this subject, I shall confer with the commander-in-chief of the division.

By a letter from Major Bankhead, dated the 17th of this month, I learn that two thousand Spanish troops are reported to have arrived at St. Augustine. Although little reliance can be placed in the report received by Major Bankhead, yet, whether it be true or not, I am satisfied his command (220 men) is quite too small to admit of any detachment, other than that at Trader's Hill. There should, indeed, be not less than this number stationed at and in the immediate vicinity of the Hill, and a much greater number upon the frontier between that point and this. By a letter from W. Harris, Esq., of Telfair, I am informed that a party of Indians killed a Mr. Daniel Dikes and his family, a few days past, on the St. Tilla, about forty miles from the town of Jackson, Telfair court-house. I immediately detached a troop of cavalry in pursuit of the Indians, and at the same time sent out a detachment of infantry to reconnoitre the country, and secure the intermediate frontier from a similar outrage.

Accompanying this I enclose a monthly return of the detachment of Georgia militia under Brigadier General Glasscock, which was not received until this day; I had confidently believed that the proper returns of this detachment had been duly forwarded by Major Nicks, who mustered and inspected the same, to the Adjutant and Inspector General's office.

With extreme regret, I have to state that the expected co-operation on the part of that detachment has entirely failed. An attempt to obtain volunteers to continue in service until the arrival of the detachment from Major General Floyd's division, produced but forty men. The enclosed report of Major Wright, assistant adjutant general, contains a discouraging picture of that detachment. It cannot be expected at this place before the 10th of next month, nor is it probable that more than two hundred and fifty or three hundred out of the five hundred called for, can be got into service.

The enclosed papers, No. 1 to 4, contain copies of my last correspondence with the contractor's agent.

The acting quartermaster, Lieutenant Keiser, has purchased the greater part of the provisions issued during the present month, and is now engaged in the purchase of thirty thousand rations, the greater part of which is now on the way to Fort Scott, by the way of Flint river. To pay for these supplies, I have been under the necessity of borrowing ten thousand dollars from the Governor of Georgia, upon a promise to replace the amount in three months from the 23d instant. I had taken the liberty to send to Augusta a draft upon the Department of War for fifteen thousand dollars, but could not obtain money on the draft without suffering a discount of 2½ per cent. which was totally inadmissible.

The fifteen thousand dollars, forwarded by your order, being required to pay the expense of transportation, for which this sum will be insufficient, I have to request that you will be pleased to order the sum of ten thousand dollars, on account of the supply of rations to be forwarded to his excellency Governor Rabun, to replace that sum advanced by him. I have, &c.

EDMUND P. GAINES.

No. 1.

HEADQ'RS, HARTFORD, GEORGIA,
January 12, 1818.

SIR: I have received your report, in which you state that you have some rations "on the way," but you do not state where, or in what quantities, they are to be found. Let me be informed upon this subject without delay.

Having been informed by Brigadier General Glasscock that he has not been regularly supplied with rations by you; that he had advanced you two thousand dollars to purchase pork for the detachment of Georgia militia under his command, (which I directed you to forward to this place for that detachment,) I learn that you have not complied with my requisition or order. Should this apparent neglect remain longer unexplained, your continuance as contractor's agent, or as sutler, within the limits of my command, will be no longer tolerated.

EDMUND P. GAINES,

Major General commanding.

Captain O. W. CALLIS,
Contractor's Agent, Fort Hawkins.

No. 2.

HARTFORD, January 24, 1818.

SIR: Your communication of the 12th is received. To the several subjects therein referred, and to others, I have the honor to reply as follows:

The rations reported to have been on hand were at Fort Hawkins, Creek Agency, Fort Mitchell, and Fort Gaines; estimated, at Fort Hawkins, say ten or fifteen thousand rations of pork and beef, and of flour four or five thousand rations; at the agency, nine thousand rations of flour, with a considerable quantity of the smaller parts; at Fort Mitchell, ten thousand rations of flour, with a very small quantity of vinegar; and at Fort Gaines, say six or seven thousand rations of flour.

The two thousand dollars received of General Glasscock I did not understand were to be applied exclusively to the purchase of pork. My disbursements in the purchase of provision have considerably exceeded that sum since the receipt of it, which was on the 10th of December last. Of this fact I shall be able to convince the General, by a reference to my books, and other vouchers on that subject. It is true that the balance of pork left at Fort Hawkins was not forwarded to this place in compliance with your orders; this non-compliance proceeded from no disposition to evade or treat with indifference the orders of the General, but for want of immediate means of transporting it. In short, allow me to assure you, sir, this if I have, or if I may disobey your orders, it is alone ascribable to the want of the means for compliance. With regard to the flour refused at Fort Hawkins, afterwards transported to and sold at this place to the troops, by Mr. Lavake, I report that it was never the property of the contractor; that it was inspected and refused as his; that it was transported and sold by him, without the knowledge or consent of the contractor or his agent.

I have the honor to be, &c.

O. W. CALLIS,

Contractor's Agent.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your requisition, under date of the 19th, and to report that the contractor cannot comply with it in full; but that there is engaged to the contract to have been delivered at Fort Hawkins, on the 20th of this month, seventy thousand rations of pork, which, together with the provisions the money I have, or may have, will procure, shall be furnished the troops.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major General GAINES.

FORT SCOTT, January 12, 1818.

SIR: On the 16th instant I had the honor to inform you of the arrival of the vessels in charge of Brevet Major Muhlenburg, and to enclose to you the resignation of 1st Lieutenant Sharp, of the corps of artillery, the acceptance of which I recommended, on account of his intemperate habits. Since that period, Lieutenant Johnson, of the same corps, has tendered his resignation, which is herewith enclosed. I would also recommend that his wish to leave the service should be gratified, as his conduct in a skirmish with the Indians some time since was not such as to evidence his being well qualified for the profession of arms.

I have permitted him and Lieutenant Sharp to be absent until the acceptance of their resignations may be published, unless otherwise ordered; and herewith enclosed is a copy of Lieutenant Sharp's letter of resignation.

On the 4th instant I crossed the Flint river, about fourteen miles above this post, and proceeded to Fowltown, which had been deserted. I burnt it, and on the next day arrived at Allapulgus, a small town about fourteen miles southeast of this post. It had also been abandoned, and the cattle and stock of every kind removed, as had been the case at Fowltown. I am informed they have gone to or beyond the Okolokne river, there to place their women and property in greater security, and better prepare themselves for war. They continue to have considerable intercourse with the Indians at Chatahoochee, many of whom were with them, and assisted in the destruction of Lieutenant Scott and his party, and in the attack on our vessels ascending the river, under the command of Brevet Major Muhlenburg. You have herewith a copy of a letter from Mr. Irving, commanding at Fort Gaines. I cannot believe the information it contains, yet I have been informed, a few days since, that the Indians on the Chatahoochee, below Fort Gaines, have received information from the agent of the Creek nation that they are to use their pleasure in joining us, as we are the aggressors. But few of them require great inducement to act in the war, but most if on our side; and should the war with the Lower Creeks terminate on the terms represented by Mr. Irvin, it will be risking but little to say the peace will be of short duration. The force of this place is much too small to advance against the enemy, and I have not received the least information of the Georgia militia or McIntosh's Indians, except what is contained in Mr. Irvin's letter, or a line from General Gaines since his departure.

I have but about two days' rations of meat, and something upwards of thirty days' rations of flour on hand, and without advice of additional supplies being on the way; and should Captain Birch, who is now at Fort Gaines with a command of one hundred and twenty men, for the purpose of obtaining beef, not succeed, and the contractor's agents persist in neglecting their duty much longer, the consequences must be greatly disastrous to the inhabitants of the Chatahoochee.

I have sent Captain Cummings to the bay, for the purpose of obtaining information should any vessel arrive there with provision, and will do all in my power to maintain my position; yet I do greatly fear my best exertions to do so will fail. I detached a sergeant and four mounted men, on express, to Fort Hawkins, on the 21st ultimo, and have not since heard of them. I shall write to the Creek agent by the present opportunity, and enclose to him a copy of Mr. Irvin's letter.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE,

Lieut. Col. 7th Inf. commanding.

Major Gen. ANDREW JACKSON,
Nashville, Tennessee.

N. B. Since writing the above, I have received a letter from General Gaines, dated on the 20th ultimo, at Hartford. The contractor's agent in that quarter, I am informed, has failed, and the militia are now about thirty miles above this, badly supplied with provision. Captain Birch has informed me that he will be able to obtain thirty or forty head of beef cattle at Fort Gaines; he will be compelled to take them, as the people refuse to sell.

M. A.

FORT SCOTT, January 13, 1818.

SIR: I received your letter of the 20th ultimo, yesterday, after writing to Major General Jackson; a copy of my letter to him is enclosed, which will exhibit to you the state of things in this quarter.

I have heard nothing more of Colonel Brearly or the militia, except that they were within twenty-five miles of the Flint river on the 4th instant. Brockman wrote to me on that date, and informed me that he was engaged procuring provisions for the militia, the contractor having failed to supply. This, with the information you gave on that subject, has induced me to contract with Mr. McCulloh to deliver fifteen thousand rations of meat at this post, in twenty days from this time, at twelve and a half cents per ration. Should he fulfil his agreement, and Captain Birch succeed in procuring thirty or forty head of beef cattle, I think that supply will last the troops until provisions are received from New Orleans. Our horses have a distemper among them, which I fear will destroy a great number of them.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE, Lt. Col. Com'g.

Major Gen. E. P. GAINES,
St. Mary's, Georgia.

FORT SCOTT, January 18, 1818.

SIR: I have received information this evening, which I have no doubt may be relied on, that the whole or the greater portion of the hostile Indians are to have a meeting somewhere near the mouth of Flint river, on the 21st instant, for the purpose of concerting measures for the destruction of the inhabitants on the Chatahoochee, and the reduction of this post. In the latter object they expect to succeed, owing to our want of supplies; and their calculations are not without a reasonable prospect of success, should not uncommon exertions be made to supply us from your quarter, as this command has been without meat at this time for five or six days, and have barely a hope of receiving a temporary supply, by a command sent to Fort Gaines for the purpose of collecting a few beef cattle.

I have heard from the bay this evening; one vessel has arrived there with clothing and military stores, having on board very little, if any, more provisions than will be required by the command on board of her, and without certain information of other vessels being on the way.

I have to request you will let me hear from you without loss of time, and that you will inform me of a prospect of supplies from your quarter.

I am, sir, most respectfully, &c.

M. ARBUCKLE, Lt. Col. Com'g.

Brigadier General GLASSCOCK,
Chehaw town, Flint river.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Aug. 14, 1818.

SIR: The President having determined to restore St. Marks and Pensacola, with the Barancas, to the Spanish authority, I am directed to issue orders to carry this determination into effect. You will, accordingly, give the necessary orders to the commandant at Pensacola to surrender that place, with the Barancas, to any Spanish officer properly authorized to receive them. Authority from the Governor General at the Havana, or the Spanish Minister, Don Oniz, is considered sufficient; or, in case the Governor, late in possession of West Florida, Don Jose Mazot, should himself appear to receive possession, it will be restored to him on his own authority. St. Marks will be restored to the late Spanish commandant, should he appear to receive it, or to any officer having similar authority, as in the case of Pensacola; provided he is accompanied with a sufficient force to garrison it, so as to prevent the post from being seized by the hostile Indians. Its situation in the midst of the hostile Indians renders this precaution necessary. You, who have an accurate knowledge of the strength of the Indians, and of the post, will be able to give precise instructions on this point. It is sufficient that the Spanish force be so considerable as will probably prevent any attempt by the Indians to occupy it.

Public property will be restored in the condition, as far as practicable, in which it was taken possession of. On evacuating these posts, you will make such arrangements as will be the best calculated to hold the Indians, still remaining hostile, in check, and to cover our frontier. To effect these objects, it is thought that it will not be necessary to take post to the west of the Apalachicola, within the Florida line, as the Indians in that quarter are said to be very inconsiderable. You will, accordingly, station the troops which may be thought to be necessary for the protection of that portion of the frontier on our side of the line, unless your impression should be decidedly different from that I have stated; in which event, you will take post at any point which you may judge proper within the country possessed by the Indians. On the east of the Appalachicola you may station the troops on either side of the line, as you may judge proper. Fort Gadsden, besides admitting of great facility for supplies, appears to be a very commanding position, and ought not to be evacuated. Should you think so, you will retain it, and garrison it with a sufficient force.

I trust you will be able to make such a distribution of your command as to afford, with vigilance, effectual protection to the frontier, without resorting to the militia. It is of great importance, if the militia can be dispensed with, not to call them into actual service, as it is harassing to them and exhausting to the Treasury. Protection is the first object, and the second is protection by the regular force. I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Brevet Major Gen. E. P. GAINES,
Fort Hawkins, Georgia.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
August 19, 1818.

SIR: I send the enclosed extract from the letter of the Secretary of State to the Spanish Minister, in relation to St. Mark's and Pensacola. My instructions to you, of the 14th instant, contained the substance of this extract; and my object in communicating it now, is, that you may be in possession of the precise ideas communicated to the Spanish Minister, in case any difficulty should occur. I have, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

General E. P. GAINES.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 20, 1818.

SIR: In a communication to you of the 12th instant, I acknowledged the receipt of your order of the 26th ultimo, and advised you of the appeal I had made to the patriotism of the West Tennesseans. On yesterday, the officers who had so gallantly headed the Tennessee mounted volunteers, during the Creek campaigns, met me at this place, and gave every assurance of their ability to assemble two regiments of mounted gun-men by the 31st instant, at any designated point within the western part of this State. I have ordered them to rendezvous at Fayetteville, and as many as may appear on the 31st instant, or the 1st of February, to be mustered and received into service for six months (if not sooner discharged) by my inspector general. The contractor has instructions to issue to these troops twenty days' rations, and every measure has been adopted to facilitate their march, via Fort Jackson, by the most practicable route, to Fort Scott. These troops will be well supplied as far as Fort Jackson, and there the necessary provisions may be obtained and packed to answer their immediate wants, until they are intercepted by supplies from below. Major Fanning has been despatched to Fort Hawkins to purchase and forward on these supplies to the most convenient point of interception. I have advanced to him two thousand dollars, with authority to draw on the quartermaster general for any additional sums wanted, and imposed upon him the temporary duties of deputy quartermaster general. I am compelled to this arrangement from an impression that there can be no officer of the quartermaster's department in the vicinity of Fort Hawkins, and Colonel Gibson could not possibly reach that neighborhood to effect the objects wished.

My inspector general, Colonel Hayne, (no brigadier general having volunteered his services,) is charged with conducting the march of the two regiments of Tennessee volunteers to the southern frontier.

From the contents of Colonel Arbuckle's and Major Muhlenburg's letters, copies of which are herewith enclosed, you will readily perceive that the former must remain inactive, and that the latter is in a dangerous situation. Every information from our southern frontier justifies the decisive measures I have taken, and urges the prompt movement of the volunteers called into service. I trust you will view the subject in the same light, and that my arrangements may meet with your entire approbation.

The troops now assembled on our southern boundary, reinforced with the Tennessee volunteers called into service, will enable me to inflict speedy and merited chastisement on the deluded Seminoles. I remain here to facilitate every arrangement for the prompt movement of the Tennessee detachment, but will leave this on the 22d instant for Fort Scott, via Fort Hawkins.

From Colonel Arbuckle's letter I am advised of the departure of General Gaines from Fort Scott; and the newspapers communicate the information of the Georgia contingency being commanded by a Brigadier General. As he must, consequently, be the commanding officer of the forces in the neighborhood of Fort Scott, I have this day directed instructions to him by no means to precipitate himself into a general engagement with the Seminoles, but at all hazards to relieve, if possible, Major Muhlenburg from his present situation, and cover his ascent up the Appalachicola river. I have further advised him of my movements, and directed that he should remain on the defensive, collect all the necessary supplies, and have every preparation made for an active campaign as soon as reinforced by the Tennesseans.

General Gaines has been notified of this order. I have no later advices from him than that of the 2d of December, informing me of the catastrophe of Lieutenant Scott and party.

Your letter, enclosing your general order of the 29th ultimo, has been received. Like yourself, I have no other feelings to gratify than those connected with the public good, and it gives me pleasure to find that we coincide in those opinions calculated to produce it. Responsibility now rests where it should, on the officer issuing the order; and the principle acknowledged is calculated to insure that subordination so necessary to the harmonious movement of every part of the military machine.

It would afford me much pleasure to communicate with you on all military points which my experience may enable me to elucidate.

With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

Major General commanding.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

Extract of a letter from J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

JANUARY 29, 1818.

Your letters of the 12th and 13th instant are received. The measures you have taken to bring an efficient force into the field are approbated; and a confident hope is entertained that a speedy and successful termination of the Indian war will follow your exertions.

Extract of of a letter from the Secretary of War to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 6, 1818.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, and to acquaint you with the entire approbation of the President of all the measures which you have adopted to terminate the rupture with the Indians. The honor of our arms, as well as the interest of our country, requires that it should be as speedily terminated as practicable; and the confidence reposed in your skill and promptitude assures us that peace will be restored on such conditions as will make it honorable and permanent.

Extract of a letter from General Andrew Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

FORT HAWKINS, February 10, 1818.

I reached this place last evening, when I learned, by sundry communications received from Brevet Major General Gaines, that the Georgia militia, under General Glascock, had all returned home, leaving the frontier in a very exposed situation. The regular troops at Fort Scott have been out of provisions, but the means adopted by Major General Gaines to remedy that evil, induces a strong presumption that they are by this time supplied; which, with the stores ordered by me from New Orleans, will, I trust, afford us an ample supply for the campaign.

The contractor having failed, General Gaines has, by my order, directed the quartermaster to purchase provisions, in which he has succeeded so far as to procure one thousand one hundred hogs, and a sufficiency of bread stuff; this will march the troops to and from the seat of war.

I am without any official advice as to the preparation and march of the late requisition from the State of Georgia.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—69

Extract of a letter from General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

HARTFORD, GEORGIA, Feb. 14, 1818.

I arrived at this place on the evening of the 12th, and here met with General Gaines. From a letter received from the Governor of Georgia, advising of the movement of the militia from the several counties to the designated point of rendezvous, as well as the punctuality with which the troops have assembled here under General Gaines's requisition, has induced a hope that I shall be enabled to make a prompt and speedy march for the relief of Fort Scott.

I enclose you a copy of a letter from Colonel B. G. Orr to Captain Callis, contractor's agent at Fort Hawkins. From the sum with which he states to have furnished his agents in this country, you can judge how far efficient means have been adopted to insure the necessary supplies to the troops heretofore in service, as well as those summoned to the field under the late requisition. The mode of provisioning an army by contract is not adapted to the prompt and efficient movement of troops. It may answer in time of profound peace, where a failure or delay cannot produce any serious ill consequences; but where active operations are necessary, and success dependent on prompt and quick movements, there is no dependence to be placed on the contractor. His views are purely mercenary; and where the supplies will not insure him a profit, he hesitates not on a failure, never regarding how far it may defeat the best devised plans of the commander-in-chief. Experience has confirmed me in this opinion, and the recent failure has prompted me again to express it.

The plan which has been adopted to procure the necessary supplies for the army, to transport them to Fort Scott, and the quantity otherwise ordered to that point, will, I hope, relieve me from any embarrassment on that account, until a decisive blow has been struck upon the enemy. I have been so frequently embarrassed from the failures of contractors, that I cannot but express a hope that some other more efficient and certain mode of supplying our army may be adopted: such a plan as will render those charged with the execution of so important a trust responsible to military authority, and exposed to severe and merited chastisements, whenever defaulters, at the discretion of a court-martial.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Early, February 26, 1818.

SIR: In my last letter from Hartford, Georgia, of the 14th instant, I expressed a hope that the plans adopted to procure supplies for the detachment from Georgia to transport them to Fort Scott, together with the quantity ordered to that point, would relieve me from many embarrassments on that account, until a decisive blow could be struck upon the enemy.

The Georgia detachment marched from their encampment near Hartford on the 19th instant, and on that night General Gaines received a let-er from Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle, commanding at Fort Scott, containing such intelligence of his intention to abandon that post, in the event of not receiving supplies in a short given time, as induced him (General Gaines) to set out that night, and if possible, by reaching the place in time to prevent such a disastrous movement.

The General has, as he communicated to me, ordered a large supply of provisions to the Creek Agency to be transported in boats to Fort Scott and this place, which would serve until that ordered from Mobile (by himself) should arrive; and under that order did calculate on meeting two boats loaded with flour, on his reaching this place, but was deceived, having arrived here on the night of the 20th, which he left on the evening of the 21st, in a small boat with twelve men. On the night of the 22d I received by express a letter directed to General Gaines, and dated the 19th instant, from Captain Melvin, of the 4th infantry, who had been charged by General Gaines to build the boats at the agency, and have the provisions transported thence, stating that two boats would be finished in two days which would transport upwards of one hundred barrels of flour each; these I had strongly calculated on, but they have not arrived. The excessive rains have rendered the roads so bad that I ordered the troops, on their march here, to take their baggage on the wagon horses, and abandon the wagons; this facilitated their march to this place, which they reached to-day; and eleven hundred men are now here without a barrel of flour or bushel of corn. We have pork on foot; and to-morrow I shall proceed to Fort Scott, and endeavor to procure from the Indians a supply of corn that will aid in subsisting the detachment until we reach that place. How those failures have happened under the superintendence of regular officers I cannot imagine, but blame must rest somewhere, and it shall be strictly investigated as soon as circumstances will permit.

The waters are unusually high, and the ground so rotten that it is with much difficulty that even pack-horses can pass. Every stream we are compelled either to bridge or swim.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.
Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

HEADQUARTERS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Gadsden, March 25, 1818.

SIR: At 7 o'clock P. M., on the 9th instant, I reached Fort Scott, with the brigade of Georgia militia one hundred bayonets strong, and some of the friendly Creeks who had joined me on my march a few days before, where finding but one quart of corn per man, and a few poor cattle, which, added to the live pork I brought along, would give us three days' rations of meat, determined me at once to use this small supply to the best advantage. Accordingly, having been advised by Colonel Gibson, quartermaster general, that he would sail from New Orleans on the 12th of February with supplies, and being also advised that two sloops with provisions were in the bay, and an officer had been despatched from Fort Scott in a large keel-boat to bring up a part of their loading, and deeming that the preservation of these supplies would be to preserve the army, and enable me to prosecute the campaign, I assumed the command on the morning of the 10th; ordered the live stock slaughtered, and issued to the troops with one quart of corn to each man, and the line of march to be taken up at twelve meridian. Having to cross the Flint river, which was very high, combined with some neglect in returning the boats during a very dark night, I was unable to move from the opposite bank until nine o'clock, on the morning of the 11th, when I took up my line of march down the east bank of the river for this place, touching the river as often as practicable, looking for the provision boats which were ascending, and which I was fortunate enough to meet on the 13th, when I ordered an extra ration to the troops, they not having received a full one of meal or flour since their arrival at Fort Early.

On that day my patrols captured three prisoners, and found some hidden corn. On the morning of the 14th I ordered the boat down the river to this place, whilst I descended by land, and reached here, without interruption, on the 16th. The eligibility of this spot as a depot determined me, and I immediately directed my aide-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, of the engineer corps, to furnish a plan for, and superintend the erection of, a fortification. His talents and indefatigable zeal, displayed in the execution of this order, induced me to name it Fort Gadsden, to which he is justly entitled. On my arrival here I immediately despatched the boat to the bay for the balance of the provisions known to be there, and to ascertain whether the flotilla, in charge of Colonel Gibson, had reached there, and which returned on the 19th with the unpleasant intelligence that nothing had been heard from the flotilla from New Orleans, since it was seen passing Fort Bowyer. I immediately put the troops on half rations, and pushed the completion of the fort for the protection of the provisions, in the event of their arrival, intending to march forthwith to the heart of the enemy, and endeavor to subsist upon him. In the mean time, I despatched Major Fanning, of the corps of artillery, to take another look into the bay, whose return, on the morning of the 23d, brought the information that Colonel Gibson, with one gunboat and three transports, and others, in sight, were in the bay. On the same night I received other information that no more had arrived. I am, therefore, apprehensive that some of the smaller vessels have been lost, as one gunboat went to pieces, and another, when last spoken, had one foot of water in her hold; all the vessels had been spoken after a gale that dispersed them. A north and northwest wind has prevailed for six days, but has fortunately changed this morning. I am now awaiting a boat from the bay (which is expected to-day) to complete eight days' rations for my troops, upon which I mean to march. From information received from Pensacola and New Orleans I have no doubt but that St. Marks is in possession of the Indians. The Governor of Pensacola informed Captain Call, of the 1st infantry, (now here,) that the Indians had demanded arms, ammunition, and provisions, or the possession of the garrison of St. Marks of the commandant, and that he presumed possession would be given from inability to defend it. The Spanish Government is bound by treaty to keep her Indians at peace with us. They have acknowledged their incompetency to do this, and are consequently bound, by the law of nations, to yield us all facilities to reduce them. Under this consideration, should I be able, I shall take possession of the garrison as a depot for my supplies, should it be found in the hands of the Spaniards, they having supplied the Indians; but if in the hands of the enemy I will possess it, for the benefit of the United States, as a necessary position for me to hold, to give peace and security to this frontier, and put a final end to the Indian warfare in the South.

Finding it very difficult to supply Fort Crawford on the Canecub by land I have ordered the supplies for that garrison by water, and written to the Governor of Pensacola, that, if he interrupts them during the present Indian war, I shall view it as aiding our enemy, and treat it as an act of hostility; and stated to him the propriety, under existing circumstances, of his affording all facilities to put down their own as well as our enemies, and that our Governments, while negotiating, can take the subject under consideration, but, in the mean time, our provisions must pass to Fort Crawford by water without interruption.

In mine of the 14th February, from Hartford, I informed you of the means adopted to procure supplies, and in my last of the 26th, from Fort Early, I informed you of their situation. To those communications I beg leave to refer you. I have only to add that I left Fort Early for Fort Scott, and subsisted my troops on ground peas, corn, and pork, that I could occasionally procure from the Indians, with some pork I had on foot, the whole subsistence for man and horse not costing five hundred dollars. Of all the supplies purchased for the relief of Fort Scott, and the support of the Georgia militia, not one pound was received until I passed Fort Scott. I said in my last that blame rested somewhere. The cause of those failures will, in due time, be a subject of investigation, and Colonel Brearly has been arrested on the application of General Gaines.

By some strange fatality, unaccountable to me, the Tennessee volunteers have not yet joined me; they promptly left their homes, and through the inclement weather reached Fort Mitchell, where I had ordered them supplies, and where Colonel Hayne, who led them, met my instructions to pass by Fort Gaines, where he would get a supply of corn that would enable him to reach Fort Scott; but the idea of starvation had stalked abroad, a panic appears to have spread itself everywhere, and he was told that they were starving at Fort Gaines and Fort Scott, and he was induced to pass into Georgia for supplies. His men and officers, as reported to me, were willing to risk the worst of consequences on what they had to join me; however, they have been marched from their supplies to a country stripped of them, when every consideration should have induced his advisers to have urged him on to secure the supplies in the bay, and preserve themselves and Fort Scott from starvation. I have a hope they will join me before I reach St. Marks, or the Mickasuky towns; this would be desirable, as the troops ordered from New Orleans, to protect the supplies, have not reached the bay, and leaving garrisons at Forts Scott and Gadsden weakens my force much; the whole effective strength of the regulars being but three hundred and sixty privates.

In mine of the 26th ultimo, from Fort Early, I stated that despatches received by General Gaines on the 19th instant, from the commanding officer at Fort Scott, induced him to set out that night for Fort Scott to prevent its abandonment, &c. In his passage down the Flint he was shipwrecked, by which he lost his assistant adjutant general, Major C. Wright, and two soldiers, (drowned.) The General reached me six days after, nearly exhausted by hunger and cold, having lost his baggage and clothing, and being compelled to wander in the woods four and a half days without anything to subsist on, or any clothing except a pair of pantaloons. I am happy to have it in my power to say that he is now with me, at the head of his brigade, in good health.

The great scarcity of subaltern officers, in the 4th and 7th regiments of infantry, has induced me to appoint several young men, present, as second lieutenants in the regiments, who, from personal knowledge, and good recommendations, I have no doubt, will prove themselves worthy, and, I trust, will meet with the approbation of the President. A list of their names, and the regiments to which they are attached, will be furnished the adjutant and inspector general, by my adjutant general.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. commanding.

P. S.—Since writing the above, I have the pleasure to inform you that the boat from the bay has arrived with provisions; also Colonel Gibson and Captain McKeever of the Navy. I shall move to-morrow, having made the necessary arrangements with Captain McKeever for his co-operation in transporting my supplies around to the bay of St. Marks, from which place I shall do myself the honor of communicating with you. Should our enemy attempt to escape with his supplies and booty to the small islands, and from thence carry on a predatory warfare, the assistance of the navy will prevent his escape.

General McIntosh, commanding the friendly Creeks, who had been ordered to reconnoitre the right bank of the Apalachicola, reported to me on the 19th that he had captured, without the fire of a gun, one hundred and eighty women and children and fifty-three warriors of the Red Ground chief's party, with their cattle and supplies; the chief and thirty warriors making their escape on horseback. Ten of the warriors, attempting to escape after they had surrendered, were killed by the General.

COOSADA, NEAR FORT JACKSON,
March 27, 1818.

SIR: Having arranged the affairs of the territory, as far as was practicable, I left St. Stephen's the 14th instant, with the intention of proceeding to Georgia for my family. At the town of Claiborne, the next day, intelligence reached me that, on the night of the 13th, a party of Indians had attacked a house on the Federal road, about sixty-five miles distant from that place, and murdered eight persons. I immediately ordered a detachment of mounted militia into service, and proceeded with them to the place. At the same time, apprehending the murderers might attempt to escape to Florida, the asylum for our enemies, I transmitted a communication, by express, to the commanding officer at Fort Crawford, notifying him of my arrangements, and desiring a force to be sent from the fort, in two detachments, along certain routes, to the place of rendezvous. The express was also instructed to overtake me. I accordingly received information from Major Young that my request had been executed. The detachments were marched with a promptitude honorable to the major, and I trust they will be enabled, with the aid of the militia, to arrest the progress of the hostile party.

Understanding that the inhabitants, in this quarter, considered themselves in much danger, I issued the necessary orders for the disposition of the troops, and proceeded hither. I have since been correctly informed, that the morning I left the place of rendezvous, five men, riding on the road in that neighborhood, were fired on by the Indians—three killed, and one wounded; in this state of things it is indispensable to the safety of the country, that troops should be stationed at several points; and I have taken measures, as far as I can, for that object. I have also issued an order, that all Indians who are hunting in our woods depart forthwith to their nation. It has become necessary to their safety, and to the repose of the inhabitants. We cannot distinguish the hostile from the friendly party; and such is the state of alarm, that the sight of an Indian creates among the women and children the most frightful apprehensions. I have sent a letter to the Big Warrior, requesting him to call his people home, and assuring him that my order is dictated by the most friendly motives.

Is it not probable that when the Seminoles are pressed by General Jackson, in the neighborhood of Appalachicola, they will retreat to our frontiers, and take revenge on our defenceless inhabitants? I look for it, and am without the means of resistance. There are not more than one hundred regulars at Fort Crawford, and two-thirds of the militia of the territory are not yet organized. Nor can I organize them, and appoint the officers, until the country is laid off into proper beats. So soon as the Legislature arranged the counties, I issued the necessary instructions on that subject; but owing to high waters, and the want of bridges, it is impossible to have them executed at present. There is not, moreover, nor has there been one dollar in our treasury. You will readily perceive my embarrassments, and I earnestly entreat you to place funds at my disposal for the protection of the people, and, if practicable, to order a much larger number of regular troops to our frontiers.

I shall make this my headquarters for some weeks. I have the honor to be, &c.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp near St. Mark's, April 8, 1818.

SIR: I wrote you from Fort Gadsden, communicating the embarrassments under which I had labored, previous to my arrival at that post, and my determination, being then in a situation to commence active operations, to penetrate immediately into the centre of the Seminole towns. My army marched on the 26th ultimo, and, on the 1st of April, was reinforced by the friendly Creek warriors, under General McIntosh, and a detachment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Colonel Elliott. On the same day, a mile and a half in advance of the Mickasukian villages, a small party of hostile Indians were discovered judiciously located on a point of land projecting into an extensive marshy pond; the position designated, as since understood, for the concentrating of the negro and Indian forces to give us battle. They sustained, for a short period, a spirited attack from my advanced spy companies, but fled and dispersed in every direction, upon coming in contact with my flank columns, and discovering a movement to encircle them. The pursuit was continued through the Mickasukian towns, until night compelled me to encamp my army. The next day detachments were sent out, in every direction, to reconnoitre the country, secure all supplies found, and reduce to ashes the villages. The duty was executed to my satisfaction; nearly three hundred houses were consumed, and the greatest abundance of corn, cattle, &c., brought in. Every indication of a hostile spirit was found in the habitations of their chiefs. In the council house of Kenhagee's town, the King of the Mickasukians, more than fifty fresh scalps were found; and, in the centre of the public square, the old Red Stick's standard, a red pole, was erected, crowned with the scalps, recognised by the hair, as torn from the heads of the unfortunate companions of Scott. As I had reason to believe that a portion of the hostile Indians had fled to St. Marks, I directed my march towards that fortress. As advised, I found that the Indians and negroes combined had demanded a surrender of that work; the Spanish garrison was too weak to defend it, and there were circumstances reported producing a strong conviction in my mind, that, if not instigated by the Spanish authorities, the Indians had received the means of carrying on the war from that quarter; foreign agents, who have been long practising their intrigues and villainies in this country, had free access into the fort; St. Marks was necessary, as a depot, to insure success to my operations. These considerations determined me to occupy it with an American force. An inventory of Spanish property, munitions of war, &c., has been taken and receipted for; personal rights and private property have been respected; and the commandant and garrison furnished with transportation to Pensacola. My correspondence with the Spanish commandants, the evidences under which I acted, and a detailed account of my operations, will be furnished you as early as practicable. Success depends upon the rapidity of my movements; to-morrow I shall march for the Suwanee river, the destroying of the establishments on which will, in my opinion, put a final close to this savage war.

Captain McKeever, of the Navy, cruising at my request on this coast, has been fortunate enough to secure Francis, or Hillis Hajo, the great prophet, and Hornattlemied, an old Red Stick chief. They visited his vessel under an impression they were English; from whom, as they stated, supplies of munitions of war, &c., under late promises, were expected. Arbuthnot, a Scotchman, and suspected as an instigator of this savage war, was found in St. Marks; he is in confinement, until evidences of his guilt can be collected. I am your most obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. commanding.

CAMP, 14 MILES FROM ST. MARKS,
On march to Suwanee, April 9, 1818.

From evidences furnished me by a Mr. Hambley, there is little room to doubt but that one of the chiefs, found slain on the field, in advance of the Mickasukian villages, was Kenhagee. Francis, or Hillis Hajo, and Hornattlemied, the prime instigators of this war, have been hung. The latter commanded the party who so inhumanly sacrificed Scott and his companions. Colonel Dyer, with the remainder of the Tennessee volunteers, is in the neighborhood, and will unite with me to-morrow.

AT MANACKS, April 15, 1818.

DEAR SIR: Since I last wrote to you I have received intelligence which makes it necessary for me to return to St. Stephens. I learn that the Indians who committed the late murders in this neighborhood were seen a few days since at Pensacola. My situation is extremely unpleasant. I am without funds for the protection of the territory, and totally ignorant of the views of the Government with respect to Florida. A friendly and intelligent Indian has informed me that the hostile party, by whom we have been annoyed, are two miles south of the Florida line, on a creek called Yellow Water, from whence they make incursions upon us. And yet I have received no intimation from the Executive of the United States which authorizes me to send troops into the Spanish territory. What orders have been issued to General Jackson on that subject I know not; nor indeed am I acquainted in any degree with the arrangements on the part of the United States for prosecuting the present war.

I should be glad to ascertain the views of the Government. We have no mails at present, and I send this letter to Georgia by travellers whom I have met this evening on my route to St. Stephens.

WM. W. BIBB.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Bowlegs' Town, Suwanee river, April 20, '18.

SIR: My last communication, dated Camp, before St. Mark's, April 8, and those to which it referred, advised you of my movements and operations up to that date; and, as I then advised you, I marched from that place on the morning of the 9th. On the evening of the 10th I was joined by the rear of the Tennessee volunteers, also by the Indians under General McIntosh, whom I had left at Mickasukee to scour the country around that place. Although the weather has been dry and pleasant, and the waters had subsided in a great degree, our march might be said to have been through water, which kept the infantry wet to the middle, and the depth of the swamps, added to the want of forage, occasioned the horses to give out daily in great numbers.

On the morning of the 12th, near Econfinnah, or Natural Bridge, a party of Indians were discovered on the margin of a swamp, and attacked by General McIntosh, and about fifty Tennessee volunteers, who routed them, killing thirty-seven warriors, and capturing six men and ninety-seven women and children; also recapturing a white woman who had been taken at the massacre of Scott. The friendly Indians also took some horses and about five hundred head of cattle from the enemy, who proved to be McQueen's party. Upon the application of an old woman of the prisoners, I agreed that if McQueen was tied and carried to the commandant of St. Mark's, her people should be received in peace, carried to the upper tribes of the Creek nation, and there provisioned until they could raise their own crops. She appeared much pleased with these terms, and I set her at liberty, with written instructions to the commandant of St. Mark's to that effect. Having received no further intelligence from McQueen, I am induced to believe the old woman has complied with her part of the obligation.

From St. Mark's I marched with eight days' rations, those that joined me having but five; this was done under the expectation of reaching this place in that time, founded on the report of my faithful Indian guide, which I should have accomplished but for the poverty of my horses, and the continued sheets of water through which we had to pass. On the morning of the 15th, my scouts overtook a small party of Indians, killing one man, and capturing the residue, consisting of one man, and one woman and two children; and on that evening I encamped, as my guide supposed, within twelve miles of Suwanee. I marched very early on the 15th, under the hope of being able to encompass and attack the Indian and negro towns by one o'clock P. M., but much to my regret, at three o'clock, and after marching sixteen miles, we reached a remarkable pond, which my guide recollected, and reported to be distant six miles of the object of my march; here I should have halted for the night, had not six mounted Indians, (supposed to be spies,) who were discovered, effected their escape; this determined me to attempt, by a forced movement, to prevent the removal of their effects, and, if possible, themselves, from crossing the river; for my rations being out, it was all important to secure their supplies for the subsistence of my troops. Accordingly my lines of attack were instantly formed and put in motion; and about sunset my left flank column, composed of the 2d regiment of Tennessee volunteers, commanded by Col. Williamson, and a part of the friendly Indians under Col. Kanard, having approached the left flank of the centre town and commenced their attack, caused me to quicken the pace of the centre, composed of the regulars, Georgia militia, and my volunteer Kentucky and Tennessee guards, in order to press the enemy in his centre, whilst the right column, composed of the 1st regiment of Tennessee volunteers, under Colonel Dyer, and a part of the friendly Indians, headed by General McIntosh, who had preceded me, were endeavoring to turn his left and cut off his retreat to the river. They, however, having been previously informed of our force, by a precipitate retreat, soon crossed the river, where it is believed Colonel Kanard, with his Indians, did him considerable injury. Nine negroes and two Indians were found dead, and two negro men made prisoners. On the 17th, foraging parties were sent out, who found a considerable quantity of corn and some cattle. On the 18th, having obtained some small craft, I ordered General Gaines across the river with a strong detachment, and two days' provision, to pursue the enemy; the precipitancy of their flight was soon discovered by the great quantity of goods, corn, &c., strewed through the swamps, and convinced General Gaines that pursuit was in vain; nine Indians and five negro prisoners were taken by our Indians. The evidence of the haste with which the enemy had fled induced the General to confine his reconnoissance to search for cattle and horses; both of which were much wanted by the army. About thirty head of cattle were procured, but, from the reports accompanying General Gaines's, which, in due time, will be forwarded to you, and the disobedience of his orders by the Indians, not one pound was brought into camp.

As soon as time will permit, I shall forward you a detailed account of the various little affairs with the enemy, accompanied with reports of the commanding officers of detachments; suffice it for the present to add that every officer and soldier under my command, when danger appeared, showed a steady firmness, which convinced me that, in the event of a stubborn conflict, they would have realized the best hopes of their country and General.

I believe I may say that the destruction of this place, with the possession of St. Marks, having on the night of the 18th captured the late Lieutenant Ambrister, of the British marine corps, and, as represented by Arbuthnot, successor to Woodbine, will end the Indian war for the present; and should it be renewed, the position taken, which ought to be held, will enable a small party to put it down promptly.

I shall order, or take myself a reconnoissance west of the Appalachicola, at Pensacola point, where, I am informed, there are a few Red Sticks assembled, who are fed and supplied by the Governor of Pensacola. My health being impaired, as soon as the duty is performed, the positions taken, well garrisoned, and security given to the southern frontier, (if the Government have not active employ for me,) I shall return to Nashville to regain my health. The health of the troops is much impaired, and I have ordered the Georgia troops to Hartford to be mustered, paid, and discharged, the General having communicated his wishes, and that of his troops, to be ordered directly there, and reporting that they have plenty of corn and beef to subsist them to that point. I have written to the Governor of Georgia to obtain from the State the necessary funds to pay General Glascock's brigade when discharged, and that the Government will promptly refund it. I am compelled to this mode to have them promptly paid, Mr. Hogan, the paymaster of the 7th infantry, (for whom I received from Mr. Brent an enclosure said to contain fifty thousand dollars,) not having reached me.

From the information received from Ambrister, and Mr. Cook, who was captured with him, that A. Arbuthnot's schooner was at the mouth of this river preparing to sail for the bay of Tampa, my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, volunteered his services with a small detachment to descend the river and capture her. The importance of this vessel to transport my sick to St. Marks, as well as to destroy the means used by the enemy, induced me to grant his request. He sailed yesterday, and I expected to have heard from him this morning. I only await his report to take up the line of march on my return to St. Marks. The Georgia brigade, by whom I send this, being about to march, compels me to close it without the report of Lieutenant Gadsden.

I have, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

Hon. JOHN C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort St. Mark's, April 20, 1818.

SIR: I wrote you from Bowlegstown on the 20th instant. On the night of the same day, I received the expected despatch from my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, communicating the success of his expedition, and on the next day, as soon as the sick of my army were despatched down the Suwanee river, to be conveyed in the captured schooner to St. Mark's, I took up the line of march for that fort. I arrived at this place last evening, performing a march of one hundred and seven miles in less than five days. Lieutenant Gadsden had reached it a few hours before me. He communicates having found among the papers of Arbuthnot, Ambrister, and Cook, letters, memorials, &c., all pointing out the instigators of this savage war, and, in some measure, involving the British Government in the agency. These will be forwarded you in a detailed report I purpose communicating to you as early as practicable.

The old woman spoken of in my last communication to you, who had promised to use her influence in having McQueen captured and delivered up, has not been heard of. From signs discovered on the opposite shore of the St. Mark's river, I am induced to believe that that Indian party is still in this neighborhood. A detachment will be sent out to reconnoitre the country, to receive them as friends, if disposed to surrender, or inflict merited chastisement, if still hostile.

I shall leave this in two or three days for Fort Gadsden, and after making all necessary arrangements for the security of the positions occupied, and detaching a force to scour the country west of the Appalachicola, I shall proceed direct for Nashville. My presence in this country can be no longer necessary. The Indian forces have been divided and scattered, and cut off from all communication with those unprincipled agents of foreign nations who have deluded them to their ruin; they have not the power, if the will remain, of again annoying our frontier.

I remain, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. commanding.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Gadsden, May 5, 1818.

SIR: I returned to this post with my army on the evening of the 2d instant, and embrace an early opportunity of furnishing you a detailed report of my operations to the east of the Appalachicola river. In the several communications addressed to you from Hartford, Fort Scott, and this place, I have stated the condition of the army on my assuming the immediate command, the embarrassment occasioned from the want of provisions, the privations of my troops on their march from the frontiers of Georgia, and the circumstances which compelled me to move directly down the Appalachicola river to meet with and protect the expected supplies from New Orleans. These were received on the 25th of March, and on the next day I was prepared for active operations. For a detailed account of my movements from that period to this day you are respectfully referred to the report prepared by my adjutant general, accompanied with Captain Hugh Young's topographical sketch of the route and distance performed. This has been principally a war of movements. The enemy, cut off from their strongholds, or deceived in the promised foreign aid, have uniformly avoided a general engagement. Their resistance has generally been feeble; and in the partial rencontres into which they seem to have been involuntarily forced, the regulars, volunteers, and militia, under my command, realized my expectations; every privation, fatigue, and exposure was encountered with the spirit of soldiers, and danger was met with a degree of fortitude calculated to strengthen the confidence I had reposed in them.

On the commencement of my operations, I was strongly impressed with a belief that this Indian war has been excited by some unprincipled foreign or private agents. The outlaws of the old Red Stick party had been too severely convinced, and the Seminoles were too weak in numbers to believe that they could possibly alone maintain a war with even partial success against the United States. Firmly convinced, therefore, that succor had been promised from some quarter, or that they had been deluded into a belief that America dare not violate the neutrality of Spain by penetrating to their towns, I early determined to ascertain these facts, and so direct my movements as to undeceive the Indians. After the destruction of the Mickasukian villages, I marched for St. Mark's. The correspondence between myself and the Spanish commandant, in which I demanded the occupancy of that fortress with an American garrison, accompanies this. It had been reported to me, direct from the Governor of Pensacola, that the Indians and negroes unfriendly to the United States had demanded of the commandant of St. Mark's a supply of ammunition, munitions of war, &c., threatening, in the event of a noncompliance, to take possession of the fort. The Spanish commandant acknowledged the defenceless state of his fortress, and his inability to defend it; and the Governor of Pensacola expressed similar apprehensions. The Spanish agents throughout the Floridas had uniformly disavowed having any connexion with the Indians, and acknowledged the obligations of His Catholic Majesty, under existing treaties, to restrain their outrages against the citizens of the United States. Indeed, they declared that the Seminole Indians were viewed as alike hostile to the Spanish Government, and that the will remained, though the power was wanting, to inflict merited chastisement on this lawless tribe. It was, therefore, to be supposed that the American army, impelled by the immutable laws of self-defence to penetrate the territory of His Catholic Majesty, to fight his battles, and even to relieve from a cruel andage some of his own subjects, would have been received as allies, bailed as deliverers, and every facility afforded to them to terminate speedily and successfully this savage war. Fort St. Mark's could not be maintained by the Spanish force garrisoning it. The Indians and negroes viewed it as an asylum, if driven from their towns, and were preparing to occupy it in this event. It was necessary to anticipate their movements, independent of the position being deemed essential as a depot, on which the success of my future operations measurably depended. In the spirit of friendship, therefore, I demanded its surrender to the army of the United States until the close of the Seminole war. The Spanish commandant required time to reflect. It was granted. A negotiation ensued, and an effort was made to protract it to an unreasonable length. In the conversations between my aide-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, and the Spanish commandant, circumstances transpired convicting him of a disposition to favor the Indians, and of having taken an active part in aiding and abetting them in this war. I hesitated, therefore, no longer; and as I could not be received in friendship, I entered the fort by violence. Two light companies of the 7th regiment of infantry, and one of the 4th, under the command of Major Twiggs, were ordered to advance, lower the Spanish colors, and hoist the star-spangled banner on the ramparts of Fort St. Mark's. The order was executed promptly. No resistance was attempted on the part of the Spanish garrison. The duplicity of the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's, in professing friendship towards the United States while he was actually aiding and supplying her savage enemies, throwing open the gates of his garrison to their free access, appropriating the King's stores to their use, issuing ammunition and munitions of war to them, and knowingly purchasing of them property plundered from the citizens of the United States, is clearly evinced by the documents accompanying my correspondence.

In Fort Saint Mark's, as an inmate in the family of the Spanish commandant, an Englishman, by the name of Arbuthnot, was found. Unable satisfactorily to explain the objects of his visiting this country, and there being a combination of circumstances to justify a suspicion that his views were not honest, he was ordered in close confinement. The capture of his schooner, near the mouth of Suwanee river, by my aide-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, and the papers found on board, unveiled his corrupt transactions, as well as those of a Captain Ambrister, late of the British colonial marine corps, taken as a prisoner near Bowlegs' town. These individuals were tried, under my orders, by a special court of select officers, legally convicted as ex-citizens of this savage and negro war, legally condemned, and most justly punished for their iniquities. The proceedings of the court-martial in this case, with the volume of testimony justifying their condemnation, present scenes of wickedness, corruption and barbarity, at which the heart sickens, and in which, in this enlightened age, it ought not scarcely to be believed that a Christian nation would have participated; and yet the British Government is involved in the agency. If Arbuthnot and Ambrister are not convicted as the authorized agents of Great Britain, there is no room to doubt but that that Government had a knowledge of their assumed character, and was well advised of the measures which they had adopted to excite the negroes and Indians in East Florida to war against the United States. I hope the execution of these two unprincipled villains will prove an awful example to the world, and convince the Government of Great Britain, as well as her subjects, that certain, though slow retribution awaits those unchristian wretches, who, by false promises, delude and excite an Indian tribe to all the horrid deeds of savage war.

Previous to my leaving Fort Gadsden, I had occasion to address a communication to the Governor of Pensacola on the subject of permitting supplies to pass up the Escambia river to Fort Crawford. This letter, with another from St. Mark's, on the subject of some United States' clothing, shipped in a vessel in the employ of the Spanish Government, to that post, I now enclose, with his reply. The Governor of Pensacola's refusal of my demand cannot but be viewed as evincing a hostile feeling on his part, particularly in connexion with some circumstances reported to me from the most unquestionable authority. It has been stated that the Indians at war with the United States have free access into Pensacola; that they are kept advised from that quarter of all our movements; that they are supplied from thence with ammunition and munitions of war; and that they are now collecting in large bodies, to the amount of four or five hundred warriors, in that city; that inroads from thence have lately been made on the Alabama, in one of which eighteen settlers fell by the tomahawk. These statements compel me to make a movement to the west of the Appalachicola; and, should they prove correct, Pensacola must be occupied with an American force, the Governor treated according to his deserts, or as policy may dictate. I shall leave strong garrisons in Fort St. Mark's, Fort Gadsden, and Fort Scott; and in Pensacola, should it become necessary to possess it.

It becomes my duty to state it as my confirmed opinion that, so long as Spain has not the power or will to enforce the treaties by which she is solemnly bound to preserve the Indians within her territory at peace with the United States, no security can be given to our southern frontier, without occupying a cordon of posts along the seashore. The moment the American army retires from Florida, the war hatchet will be again raised, and the same scenes of indiscriminate massacre with which our frontier settlers have been visited will be repeated. So long as the Indians within the territory of Spain are exposed to the delusions of false prophets, and the poison of foreign intrigue; so long as they can receive ammunition, munitions of war, &c., from pretended traders, or Spanish commandants, it will be impossible to restrain their outrages. The burning of their towns, the destroying of their stock and provisions, will produce but temporary embarrassments; resupplied by Spanish authorities, they may concentrate or disperse at will, and keep up a lasting predatory warfare against the frontiers of the United States, as expensive to our Government as harassing to our troops. The savages, therefore, must be made dependant on us, and cannot be kept at peace without being persuaded of the certainty of chastisement being inflicted on the commission of the first offence.

I trust, therefore, that the measures which have been pursued will meet the approbation of the President of the United States. They have been adopted in pursuance of your instructions, and under a firm conviction that they alone were calculated to insure "peace and security to the southern frontier of Georgia."

The army will move on the 7th from hence, crossing the Appalachicola river at the Ocheese bluff, about thirty miles above this.

ANDREW JACKSON,

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adj't Gen's Office, Fort Gadsden.
Appalachicola river, May 3, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the army under the immediate command of Major General Andrew Jackson took up the line of march on the 26th day of March last, with eight days' rations, and lay in advance of this post about six miles on the 29th, at Okolokne river, when nineteen canoes were made, and the principal part of the army crossed by eight o'clock, P. M., the residue next morning; when the march was again resumed at eleven o'clock, A. M. On this evening Brevet Major Twiggs of the 7th infantry was detached with one company and about two hundred warriors, with orders to advance on an Indian village called Tallahassie, and surprise it at day-break. On his near approach, he despatched a party to ascertain its situation, who reported it evacuated some days before. On the morning of the 31st he entered the village, having previously sent out parties to reconnoitre. Two of the enemy were made prisoners, one of whom made his escape from the Indians before he was brought into camp. The army passed the village about twelve o'clock, and encamped near Mickasuky, when intelligence was received of the approach of a detachment of mounted volunteers from Tennessee, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Elliott, near four hundred strong. On the morning of the 1st of April the army formed and halted until their arrival, when they were ordered to form the advance of each flank, with Captains Russell and Evans's companies, as spies, with Captain John Gordon. The army now advanced within a mile and a half of King-hajah's town, when a number of Indians were discovered herding cattle on the margin of a large pond. The General ordered the right and left columns to advance, with a view of cutting off their retreat, and at the same time instructed the advance light company, under Major Muhlenburg, the guard, under Major Nicks, together with the small companies composing his life guard, under Captains Dunlap and Crittenden, to advance in support of the spies, in the event of a general engagement. The spy companies commenced the attack, and a brisk running fire was kept up on both sides for some minutes, when the enemy divided, the spy companies pursuing those on the right; and Lieutenant Colonel Elliott having turned their flank, became generally engaged, and bore them over to the left column, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Mitchell, within half gunshot of each other, when they were assailed by both flanks, and would all have fallen, had not the volunteers taken up the impression, from the similarity of dress, that some of the friendly warriors had reached in pursuit of the enemy, which occasioned the firing to cease for a short time, when a number made good their retreat into the swamp. Captain Crittenden's company, being on horseback, was unable to reach the head of Lieutenant Colonel Elliott's column, when they dismounted, and operated against the enemy. Major Muhlenburg's company, the advance guard, and Captain Dunlap's company, being on foot, were not able to reach the scene of action in time. The right column of Georgia militia, on nearing the pond, filed round it; and Colonel King, with his regiment, was ordered to advance through it, to support the column of horse, should it be found necessary; which was executed by the colonel with great promptness. The conduct of the officers and soldiers engaged on this occasion was, in every respect, praiseworthy; our loss, one man of Captain Andrews's company killed, and four of Captain Evans's company of Tennessee volunteers wounded. The reports give fourteen killed and several wounded of the enemy, and four women prisoners, from whom we learned that three hundred warriors had advanced from the town to aid those engaged, and, on seeing the advance of an army, fled precipitately. The army now advanced upon the town, which was found deserted by the enemy; and, on reaching the square, discovered a red pole planted at the council-house, on which were suspended about fifty fresh scalps, taken from the heads of extreme age down to the tender infant of both sexes, and, in an adjacent house, near three hundred more, which bore the appearance of having been the barbarous trophies of settled hostility for three or four years past.

The army continued the pursuit to a large pond of water, which is eight miles in length, varying in width from six hundred to four thousand yards, and from two to five feet deep, through which the army passed, when the approach of night induced the commanding General to draw off his troops. On the succeeding morning, Brevet Mafor General E. P. Gaines, with a large command, was ordered to pass the lake or pond, and attack the other towns, but which he found abandoned by the enemy. The red pole was again found planted in the square of Fowltown, barbarously decorated with human scalps of both sexes, taken within the last six months from the heads of our unfortunate citizens. General McIntosh, who was with General Gaines, routed a small party of savages near Fowltown, killed one negro, and took three prisoners, on one of whom was found the coat of James Champion, of Captain Cummings's company, (4th regiment of infantry,) who was killed by the Indians on board one of our boats descending the river to the relief of Major Muhlenburg. This coat, with nearly all Captain Cummings's company's clothing, was lost on board of Lieutenant Scott's boat, when he and his party were massacred, on the 30th of November last. The pocket-book of Mr. Thomas Leigh, who was murdered at Cedar Creek on the 21st of January last, was found in Kinghajah's town, containing several letters addressed to the deceased, and one to General Glasscock. About one thousand head of cattle fell into our hands, many of which were recognised by the Georgia militia as the brands and marks of their citizens. Near three thousand bushels of corn were found, with other articles useful to the army. Upwards of three hundred houses were consumed, leaving a tract of fertile country in ruin, where these wretches might have lived in plenty, but for the infernal machinations of foreign traders, if not agents. The army remained at this point until the morning of the 5th, when the march was resumed for St. Marks, before which it arrived on the evening of the 6th, and, after communicating with the commanding officer, took possession of that fortress on the following morning. Captain McKeever, of the navy, having sailed for St. Marks with some vessels containing supplies for the army, was fortunate enough to entice on board his vessel, in the river, Francis, or Hillis Hadjo, and Homathlamicco, hostile chiefs of the Creek nation, and whose settled hostility has been severely felt by our citizens. The commanding General had them brought on shore, and ordered them to be hung, as an example to deter others from exciting these deluded wretches to future scenes of butchery. A man of the name of A. Arbuthnot was also taken on the arrival of the army, and placed in close confinement.

The troops having again received eight days' rations, and a garrison detached for Fort St. Marks, the army marched on the 9th of April, destined for Suwanee. On the morning of the 12th, the officer of the day reported that the sentinels had heard the lowing of cattle and barking of dogs during the night; from which the General was induced to send a runner to General McIntosh, who was encamped a short distance in rear of the army, with instructions to have the country below examined. In the mean time, the army moved slowly in advance. General McIntosh dispatched Major Kanard with a party, who returned to him a runner reporting the discovery of a hostile party too strong for his little band of warriors. McIntosh moved against them with his whole force. A small detachment of different companies of the Tennessee volunteers, under Colonels Dyer and Williamson, (they having joined the army on the evening of the 10th,) were left at our encampment to search for horses, and, on hearing the report of Major Kanard, formed themselves into a company under Captain Bell, who was with them, and moved to attack the enemy, whom they found near a large swamp, endeavoring to move off. A spirited engagement ensued, which resulted in the death of thirty-seven, and six men and ninety-eight women and children prisoners; and our loss, three killed and four wounded of the friendly Indians. The only woman out of seven whose life was spared at the massacre of Lieutenant Scott was here recaptured by Major Kanard. General McIntosh individually killed three of the enemy and captured one. The little band of Tennessee volunteers acted on this occasion as becomes their character. At the commencement of the action the army was halted, and a runner despatched to inform General McIntosh that any aid he might deem necessary would be afforded, and that the army would remain until his arrival, which was not until we encamped for the night. The enemy abandoned a number of horses, hogs, corn, and about six hundred head of cattle.

The army moved on the morning of the 13th, and on the succeeding day our spies surprised a camp consisting of two men, a woman, and two children. One of the men was killed; the other, with a small boy, slightly wounded; and the woman, unfortunately, not being distinguished in the swamp, received a wound of which she died. At three o'clock, P. M. on the 16th, the army arrived at a large pond within six miles of Bowlegs town, on Suwanee river, where a few Indians well mounted discovered our advance. An attempt was made to overtake them, but the enfeebled state of our horses rendered it impracticable. Under these circumstances, the General deemed it advisable to take the town by a forced march, not allowing the enemy time to cross the river and destroy their supplies. The manner of attack having been previously arranged, the army moved rapidly, until arriving near the large — which flanks the towns, when the troops changed position, conformably to previous orders, and moved forward. The left flank, composed of Colonel Williamson's regiment of Tennessee volunteers, at the head of which was a force of Indian warriors under Major (now Colonel) Kanard, soon came in contact, and warmly engaged the Indians and negroes; whilst the right flank, composed of Colonel Dyer's regiment of Tennessee volunteers, with a like force of warriors under General McIntosh, advanced near the river, to prevent the enemy from crossing. The centre advanced in excellent order, and under the expectation of having to combat with the strength of these towns and the fugitives from Mickasuky; but, on reaching Bowlegs town, found it abandoned. The left flank, from the nature of the ground they had to traverse, and Colonel Kanard not adhering entirely to the route designated, drove the Indians and negroes (about three hundred) into the river, before the right flank could occupy the desired position. The reports give eleven killed and three prisoners on the field, and it is believed many were killed and drowned in swimming the river, it being nearly three hundred yards wide. Colonel Kanard had thirteen wounded, but one dangerously. About twenty-seven hundred bushels of corn were obtained in the towns and neighboring swamps, near ninety head of cattle, and a number of horses. Our sentinels, on the night of the 17th, took prisoners two white men (Ambrister and Cook) and one negro, who had just returned from Arbuthnot's vessel at the mouth of Suwanee; from the latter we obtained a letter written by A. Arbuthnot to his son, in which he enumerates the army of the United States under the General's command, and requires him to inform his friend Bowlegs that resistance would be fruitless against such an overwhelming force, and to make over the river with all despatch; admonishing his son, at the same time, to remove and secrete everything which could be moved. From Cook we learned that this letter was read to the negroes and Indians, when they immediately commenced crossing their families, and had just finished as we entered their towns. Upwards of three hundred houses were here consumed, the most of which were well built and somewhat regular, extending near three miles up the river. On the morning of the 18th General Gaines was ordered, with a select command, and a number of warriors under General McIntosh, to cross the Suwanee river in pursuit of the enemy; but found, on advancing about six miles, that they had dispersed in every direction, from the numerous trails, and too far advanced to overtake them, his command being short of supplies. A detachment of the warriors, having advanced some distance, fell in with a small party of the enemy, killed three warriors, took some women and children and five negroes. On the same morning, Lieutenant James Gadsden, aid-de-camp to the commanding General, descended the Suwanee river to its mouth, with Captain Dunlap's and a few of Captain Crittenden's companies of the life-guard, and a small detachment of regulars, and captured, without difficulty, the schooner of A. Arbuthnot, which had brought supplies of powder and lead to the Indians and negroes settled at Suwanee. This vessel afforded the means of transporting our sick back to St. Marks. On the evening of the 20th, General Glasscock was ordered, at his request, to march his brigade by Mickasuky to Hartford, in Georgia, and Captain Bell ordered to muster them out of service; and the army moved about three-quarters of a mile preparatory to its return. On the 24th General McIntosh was ordered to proceed direct to Fort Scott, on Flint river, and an order furnished him to the commanding officer to muster his warriors out of service.

The army reached Fort St. Marks on the 25th, having marched twenty-eight miles on that day, and we were agreeably surprised in finding Lieutenant Gadsden had arrived safely that evening from the mouth of Suwanee. On the 26th a special court was ordered for the trial of A. Arbuthnot and Robert C. Ambrister; which court, on the documents and evidence adduced, sentenced the first to be hung, and the latter to be shot. They were accordingly executed on the morning of the 29th. The army moved and encamped four miles from St. Marks on the evening of the 28th, and arrived at Fort Gadsden on the 2d instant; the General having previously detached a garrison of two hundred men, under the command of Brevet Major Fanning, to occupy Fort St. Marks. I have only to add, that this army has borne hardships and privations to a great extent, in a manner becoming soldiers and citizens of a nation proud of their liberties. The assistant topographical engineer will furnish a topographical report of the country through which the army operated; and I refer you to the enclosed sketches for information of our order of movement, and have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Gadsden, March 25, 1818.

SIR: I have ordered a supply of provisions to be sent from New Orleans, via Pensacola, to Fort Crawford, on the Caneuco. This route has been adopted as the most speedy one of provisioning one of my garrisons which must be maintained during the present conflict against our mutual enemies, the Seminole Indians, and I cannot but express a hope that no attempt will be made to interrupt the free passage of my transports to that post. I am not disposed to enter into any controversy with you on the rights which our Government may claim to the free navigation of such water-courses as head within her limits, but flow through the territory of His Catholic Majesty, preferring to leave these subjects to be settled by those legally authorized; but as it is necessary for me to make use of the Escambia river in passing up provisions to the garrison at Fort Crawford, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that any attempt to interrupt the passage of transports cannot be viewed in any other light than as a hostile act on your part. I will not permit myself for a moment to believe that you would commit an act so contrary to the interest of the King your master. His Catholic Majesty, as well as the Government of the United States, are alike interested in chastising a savage foe, who have too long warred with impunity against his subjects as well as the citizens of this Republic, and I feel persuaded that every aid which you can give, to promote this object, will be cheerfully tendered.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

DON JOSE MAZOT, Governor of Pensacola.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Before St Marks, April 6, 1818.

SIR: To chastise a savage foe, who, combined with a lawless band of negro brigands, have for some time past been carrying on a cruel and unprovoked war against the citizens of the United States, has compelled the President to direct me to march my army into Florida. I have penetrated to the Mickasuky towns, and reduced them to ashes. In these towns I found many indications of a hostile spirit. On a red pole in the centre of the council-houses of Kenhagas town, more than fifty fresh scalps, of all ages, from the infant to the aged matron, were found suspended. In addition to this, upwards of three hundred old scalps were found in the dwellings of the different chiefs settled on the Mickasuky pond. Those barbarians who escaped death have fled. From information communicated by the Governor of Pensacola to two of my captains, Gordon and Call, I was induced to believe they had fled to St. Marks for protection. The Governor stated that the Indians and negroes had demanded of you large supplies of munitions of war, with a threat, in the event of a refusal, of taking possession of your fortress. He further expressed an apprehension that, from your defenceless state, they were already in possession of St. Marks. The wife of Chenubby, a noted chief, now a prisoner in my camp, informed me that the hostile Indians and negroes obtained their supply of ammunition from St. Marks. To prevent the recurrence of so gross a violation of neutrality, and to exclude our savage enemies from so strong a hold as St. Marks, I deem it expedient to garrison that fortress with American troops, until the close of the present war. This measure is justifiable on the immutable principle of self-defence, and cannot but be satisfactory, under existing circumstances, to His Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain. Under existing treaties between our two Governments, His Catholic Majesty, the King of Spain, is bound to preserve in peace with the citizens of the United States not only his own subjects, but all Indian tribes residing within his territory. When called upon to fulfil that part of the treaty in relation to a savage tribe who have long depredated with impunity on the American frontier, incompetency is alleged, with an acknowledgment that the same tribe have acted in open hostility to the laws, and invaded the rights of His Catholic Majesty. As a mutual enemy, therefore, it is expected that every facility will be afforded by the agents of the King of Spain to chastise these lawless and inhuman savages. In this light is the possession of St. Marks by the American forces to be viewed. I come not as the enemy but as the friend of Spain. Spanish rights and property will be respected. The property and rights of Spanish subjects will be guaranteed them. An inventory of all public property, munitions of war, &c., shall be made out and certified by an officer appointed by each of us, and a receipt given for the same, to be accounted for to His Catholic Majesty by the United States. The subject of my possession of the garrison of St.

Marks will be referred to our respective Governments, for amicable adjustment. Some armed vessels of the United States are in the bay of St. Marks, with whom I wish to communicate. You will, I trust, furnish me with a small vessel to convey a letter, as well as some sick and wounded that are with me. As our mutual savage enemies are concentrating their forces near or on the Suwaney, an early and prompt answer is requested to this letter, with an English translation, as neither myself nor staff are acquainted with the Spanish.

This will be handed to you by Aid-de-camp Lieutenant James Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected, I have, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

The COMM'G OFFICER, St. Marks.

ST. MARKS, OFF APPALACHIE,
April 7, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Being made to understand, although with the greatest difficulty, the contents of a letter with which your excellency honored me yesterday evening, delivered to me by your aid-de-camp James Gadsden, I will declare to your excellency the satisfaction the knowledge of the result of your expedition against Mickasuky has afforded me. That such would be the event could not be doubted, on considering the superior talents and skilful conduct of your excellency; and to these must be attributed the success, on which I tender you my most cordial congratulation.

My chief, the Governor of Pensacola, had in truth reason to mention to your captains, Gordon and Call, what your excellency states to me, and to entertain fears for the fate of this fort, menaced by Indians and negroes for some months past, and particularly since they have been disappointed in their expectations of obtaining powder and balls, which they have so repeatedly solicited, and to which they thought themselves entitled, from the practice which subsisted of supplying them annually therewith. This proves how entirely unfounded is the assertion of the wife of the chief Chenubby, that the Indians have been supplied with munitions in this fort since I was advised and I determined to maintain the most perfect neutrality. No one can better remove from your excellency's mind any unfavorable opinion you may have formed on this subject than the bearer, William Hambly, as he has at various times interpreted to me the solicitations of the several Indian chiefs in my neighborhood; and he can also inform you of the advice I always gave them—to avoid the destruction which has overtaken them, and which I foresaw from the beginning.

This being realized, and there being now no motive to fear any insult to the fort from these barbarians and the negroes, I beg permission of your excellency to call your attention to the difficulty I should involve myself in with my Government, if I were presently to assent to what your excellency proposes to me, to garrison this fort with the troops of the United States, without first receiving its orders. Such I will solicit immediately an opportunity offers, and I do not for a moment doubt that they will be given to me; so zealous is my Government to comply with the stipulations between her and the United States. In the interim I hope your excellency will desist from your intention, and be firmly persuaded of the good faith and harmony which will reign between this garrison and whatever troops you may think fit to leave in this vicinity, who may assist me in the defence of this fort on any unforeseen event.

The sick your excellency sent in are lodged in the royal hospital, and I have afforded them every aid which circumstances admit. I hope your excellency will give me other opportunities of evincing the desire I have to satisfy you.

I trust your excellency will pardon my not answering you as soon as requested, for reasons which have been given you by your aid-de-camp. I do not accompany this with an English translation, as your excellency desires, because there is no one in the fort capable thereof; but the before named William Hambly proposes to translate it to your excellency in the best manner he can.

May our Lord preserve your excellency many years. Such is my prayer. Most excellent sir, I kiss your excellency's hands, and am your most obedient and devoted servant,

F. CASO Y LUENGO.

The Most Ex't A. JACKSON,
General-in-Chief, &c.

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp near St. Mark's, April 7, '18.

SIR: I refer you to my communications of yesterday, for the motives which have compelled me to occupy the fort of St. Mark's. I again repeat that I have entered the territory of Spain as a friend, to chastise a mutual enemy of both nations, and whom His Catholic Majesty was bound, under the most sacred of treaties, to have punished himself. Peculiar circumstances, however, have prevented, and it was therefore expected that every facility would have been given to the American arms, to have insured success to their operations. The occupation of St. Mark's is essential to the accomplishment of my campaign, and is peculiarly so at this period, when evidence is derived from every source of the designs of the negroes and Indians against that fortress. They are now concentrating with the intention of taking possession of St. Marks the moment my army moves from its vicinity, the dislodging them from which will cost me more American blood than I am disposed should be shed. Success to my operations requires despatch; you will excuse me, therefore, in refusing your request that a suspension should be granted until a permit is obtained from your Government, and on insisting that Fort St. Marks should be immediately occupied by American troops.

Major Fanning, my inspector general, and

Lieut. Simmons, of the Ordnance Department, are appointed to act, with one or two officers nominated on your part, to take an inventory of, and inspect all public property in the fort of St. Marks, for which receipts will be given in the name of the American Government. Any disposition which you would wish made with the private property of yourself, officers, and soldiers, or any other arrangements gratifying to yourself, will be settled by my aid-de-camps, Lieutenants Gadsden and Glassell.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

Don F. CASO LUENGO,
Commanding Fort St. Marks.

APPALACHIE, April 7, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I should insist on what I stated to your excellency in my letter of this morning, as to the necessity of awaiting orders from the Governor of Pensacola for the delivery of this fort under my command, were I not, in addition to what your excellency says in your answer, threatened by your aid-de-camp and the other officers appointed to negotiate on the subject; and had not so large a body of troops entered, without awaiting my permission, and taken possession of all the stores and posts, lowering the Spanish flag, and hoisting the American.

So manifest a violation of the territory of His Catholic Majesty obliges me to complain of it, and to protest against it; and I accordingly do protest against it, and beg of your excellency to provide me, as speedily as possible, the vessels necessary to transport me to Pensacola, together with the troops and those persons who are in the royal employ; and also to give orders that, in the interim, the private property and effects of every Spanish individual here be respected. With respect to the public property of His Catholic Majesty, I have nominated the subaltern officer of this detachment and commissary of the fort to make, with the three officers whom you name to me, an inventory thereof.

I repeat to your excellency my respects, and prayers to God to preserve your life many years. Most excellent sir, I kiss your excellency's hands. Your most obedient and devoted servant,

FR. CASO Y LUENGO.

The Most Ex't A. JACKSON,
General U. S. troops before St. Marks.

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Camp, near St. Marks, April 7, 1818.

SIR: I have received your protest against my proceedings. The occupancy of Fort St. Marks by my troops, previous to your assenting to the measure, became necessary from the difficulties thrown in the way of an amicable adjustment, notwithstanding my assurances that every arrangement should be made to your satisfaction, and expressing a wish that my movements against our common enemy should not be retarded by a tedious negotiation. I again repeat what has been reiterated to you through my aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Gadsden, that your personal rights and private property shall be respected; that your situation shall be made as comfortable as practicable while compelled to remain in Fort St. Marks; and that transports shall be furnished, as soon as they can be obtained, to convey yourself, family, and command, to Pensacola. I daily expect some vessels from the bay of Appalachicola; as soon as they arrive, the most suitable shall be selected for said purpose.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

DON. FR. CASO Y LUENGO,
Governor of St. Marks.

PENSACOLA, April 16, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: Your excellency's letter of the 25th of the last month has been delivered to me, and also that of the 26th, in answer to mine, of the 16th of February last. I have the honor to advise your excellency of the receipt of both, and to answer the former.

In the month of May, of the last year, from a spirit of conciliation I permitted a cargo of provisions, which the schooner Mobiterra had brought from New Orleans to this place, to pass up the Escambia to Fort Crawford. Influenced by the same sentiments, I made a similar concession to Captain Call, assenting to the transporting of the cargo brought by the schooner Italiana, in January last, to the said destination; and, more lately, in continuance of the same amicable and conciliatory spirit, I consented that Lieutenant Eddy, of the garrison of the before named fort, (commissioned by its commander, Major Young, for the purpose,) should procure sixty barrels of provisions in this place; and the cargo of the schooner Italiana (which is, or ought to be, deposited here) not being yet exported, I do not think the further introduction of provisions, which your excellency asks at present necessary; but, nevertheless, as I infer from your excellency's letter that these provisions are already on their passage, in pursuance of the sufferance hitherto accorded, and observing the restrictions and course established, that is, to consign them to a Spanish commercial house, who will take care to forward them, and pay the royal duties of import and export, I will allow the same destination to be given to them as to the former, provided that the Government of the United States shall not set up, or derive any right, either now or hereafter, from these purely gratuitous concessions, as I make them from the obligation of existing circumstances, which do not admit of supplying the garrison of the before named Fort Crawford by any other way.

In accordance with the declaration of your excellency, when you add it is not your intention to enter into a discussion with me in relation to the right which the United States may claim to the free navigation of the Escambia, so neither is it mine to discuss this subject with your excellency, as well because it does not fall within my duties, as that, being a subordinate officer, I am bound to obey the superior on whom I depend, it being my duty, until I receive instructions to the contrary, to be governed on this head by the treaties existing between the United States and Spain; and in the last, of amity, limits, and navigation, I do not see the before named river mentioned, but the sovereignty of the King, my master, over all the territories, rivers, coasts, ports, and harbors lying South of 31° North, solemnly and explicitly recognised by the United States; and, if extraordinary and existing circumstances should require any further temporary concessions, not explained in the said treaty, I request your excellency to have the goodness to apply, in future, for the obtaining of them, to the proper authority, as I, for my part, possess no power whatever in relation thereto.

May God preserve your excellency many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

His Ex'cy A. JACKSON,
Major General, &c.

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort St. Mark's, April 27, 1818.

SIR: After I left this port for St. Juan, to disperse and destroy the mutual enemy of Spain and the United States, a small schooner, with men and supplies, arrived from Pensacola, and was taken possession of and detained by my officer left in command. This vessel has been liberated with all her effects, excepting some clothing of the United States unaccompanied with any invoice, and which has been detained, as supposed to be a part of that taken on board the boats within the territory of this Republic, in which Lieutenant Scott, of the United States army, with his command, were so inhumanly massacred.

I regret being compelled to state to you, that, from the papers and proofs taken at San Juan's; the quantity of American cattle found at St. Marks, and purchased by me from the commissary of the post; and the intercourse kept up between this post and the hostile Indians, there is too much ground to believe that the Indians have been encouraged, aided, and abetted by the officers of Spain in this cruel war against the United States. Proof positive exists that the Indians were supplied with ammunition by the late commandant of St. Marks. The United States clothing being found on board of a vessel in the employ of the Government of Spain, sailing from Pensacola direct for this port, compels me to call on you for a statement in what manner you came possessed of said clothing. The good understanding that so happily exists between His Catholic Majesty and the United States formed a just ground to believe that his agents would have discountenanced this cruel and savage war against the citizens of this Republic. Spain, too weak to comply with her treaties with the United States, or chastise her own savage subjects, waging war against a friendly nation, it was scarcely to be believed that her officers would have been detected in aiding and abetting the enemy, assisting with the intelligence of our movements, and purchasing the property depredated of us. America, just to her treaties, and anxious to maintain peace with the world, cannot and will not permit such a savage war to be carried on in disguise any longer. Asylums have been granted to the persons and property of an Indian foe, (fugitives from the territory of the United States;) facilities, deemed by me necessary to terminate a war which, under existing treaties, should have been maintained by Spain; for feeding my troops; and liberating the subjects of Spain imprisoned by the Indians; have all been denied by the officers of His Catholic Majesty. All these facts prove the unjust conduct of Spanish agents in Florida. It cannot be longer tolerated, and although a Republic fond of peace, the United States know their rights and at the expense of war will maintain them.

Your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

DON JOSE MAZOT,
Governor of Pensacola.

No. 2.

Copy of a note of the Commandant of West Florida to Major Young, at the encampment, banks of the Escambia.

PENSACOLA, April 27, 1818.

SIR: Your note of the 27th, dated encampment on the Escambia and Fort Crawford, accompanying the proclamation which you were pleased to enclose, were delivered to me at three o'clock this afternoon by an artificer, a man of color, whose speedy return not allowing me at present to answer them in detail, I shall merely state, that the small number of peaceful Indians who were in this place and in its vicinity retired on the 26th, at the dawn of which day several of them, both women and children, were killed by the troops of the United States. As it is not my purpose to investigate the motives of this act, or of the violation, resulting from it, I shall only say that, in compliance with my duty, I shall give an account of the whole proceeding to my superior; and, in the meantime, I hope you will allow no further hostilities to be committed on this territory, on any pretence whatever. If the Indians should give any further cause of complaint, I trust you will inform me of it, that they may receive due punishment, should that depend on my authority. If there are any Indians still remaining within this territory, I will have them sought for and informed of your letter, and advise you of the result. I can assure you, both under my hand and on my word, that the information, as stated in your letter, of the aggressions committed by the Indians is the first I have had of them, for at the time I agreed to the return of the escort referred to, I had no knowledge of any others than those who were concerned in the attack on Lieutenant Eddy. I repeat to you the assurance that my wishes and efforts are wholly directed to preserve the peace happily subsisting between our Governments. In a full confidence in your favorable sentiments, I beg leave to offer you my respectful salutations.

God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

To Major W. YOUNG,
Com'g Am. troops on the Escambia

Copy of a note from Jose Mazot to Major W. Young.
PENSACOLA, April 30, 1818.

SIR: In consequence of the request expressed in your letter of the 27th instant, I assembled the chiefs of the Upper Creeks at the villages of Colome, Canaan, Cowale, and Forsatche, and communicated to them the contents of your letter. They all replied that they had for a long time been very miserable and wretched, without shelter or home, that by the counsel of a good friend they had at length found one, that they had listened attentively to it, and accepted with gratitude the offers you had made them. These Indians are about eighty-seven in number, including women and children. They agreed to divide themselves into three parties, and set out on their march, as soon as I received your answer, which they thought it would be prudent for them to keep; and that when you were informed of their resolution, you would give the necessary orders for their safe progress, and avoiding any rencounter with the Choctaws, who, if not seasonably apprized of the circumstances, might attack them, in which case the pacific arrangements, in which we both take so strong an interest, would be entirely defeated. Opahi-hola, an Ali-liamon chief, on account of his advanced age, and infirmities will, for the present, remain here with his family. I have given orders for his relief, and pledge myself for his good behaviour. You will always find me disposed, sir, to promote any measure conducive to the mutual interests of our two countries, which may, at the same time, be in conformity with existing treaties. I offer you the renewed assurances of my respect, and I pray God to preserve you.

JOSE MAZOT.

HEADQ'RS. DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Montgomery, June 2, 1818.

SIR: The Seminole war having terminated, I deem it politic and advisable to send to Washington John Blunt and his Indian comrades, who have acted as pilots to me during the late campaign. John Blunt is a Tuckabatchee Indian, has long been friendly to the United States, and in consequence of his opposition to the Red Stick party during the Creek war has drawn down upon himself their vengeance during the late contest. His settlement being in an exposed situation on the Apalachicola river, he was early attacked by Seminoles, his property destroyed, and his family rifled from him; alone he escaped and fled to Fort Scott, where, joining the American standard, he has proved himself a most zealous friend and faithful pilot to this period. In justice to him I am bound to state, that to his correct knowledge of the country and zealous attachment to the cause in which we were engaged, I am measurably indebted for the success of the present campaign.

Mr. H. amply accompanies John Blunt. Mr. H. is a Spanish subject by birth, and has long been a resident as a trader on the Apalachicola river. In consequence of his attachment to the American cause, and his active exertions to check the hostile feelings of those Indians disposed to war against the United States, he drew down upon himself and family their vengeance. He was forcibly taken from his house at an early period of the war; his property, goods, and negroes taken from him, and he violently transported from Mickasukee, Suwanee, and St. Marks, until finally relieved by Captain McKeever of the American Navy; since which period he has been attached to my army as Indian interpreter. You will find him an honest and faithful friend of our Government, and valuable for the information which he can afford of Spanish policy and intrigue. He is well acquainted with all the transactions of foreign agents in this country, of their practices, &c., and how far encouraged by the Spanish authority, &c. With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Fort Montgomery, June 2, 1818.

SIR: In a communication to you of the 5th of May, I detailed at length the operations of my army up to that period. Leaving a strong garrison of regulars in Forts Scott and Gadsden, I resumed my march, with a small detachment of the 4th regiment of infantry, one company of artillery, and the effectives of the Tennessee volunteers, the whole not exceeding twelve hundred men, to fulfil my intentions, communicated to you, of scouring the country west of the Apalachicola river. On the 10th of May, my army crossed that river at the Ocheseec village, and, after a fatiguing, tedious, and circuitous march of twelve days, misled by the ignorance of our pilots, and exposed to the severest of privations, we finally reached and effected a passage over the Escambia. On my march, on the 22d of May, a protest from the Governor of Pensacola was delivered me by a Spanish officer, remonstrating in warm terms against my proceedings, and ordering me and my forces instantly to quit the territory of His Catholic Majesty, with a threat to apply force in the event of a non-compliance. This was so open an indication of hostile feeling on his part, after having been early and well advised of the object of my operations, that I hesitated no longer on the measures to be adopted. I marched for and entered Pensacola with only the show of resistance, on the 24th of May. The Governor had previously fled to Fort Carlos de Barancas, where, it was said, he had resolved upon a most desperate resistance. A correspondence ensued between us, (accompanying this, marked A,) detailing at length my motives for wishing and demanding that Pensacola and its dependencies be occupied with an American garrison. The package marked B are documents substantiating the charges, in part, against the conduct of the Spanish Governor, having knowingly and willingly admitted the savages, avowedly hostile to the United States, within the town of Pensacola.

The peaceable surrender of the fort at the Barancas was denied. I marched for and invested it on the evening of the 25th of May, and on the same night pushed reconnoitering parties under its very guns. On the morning of the 26th, a military reconnoissance was taken; and on the same night, a lodgement was made, under a fire from the Spanish garrison, by Captain Gadsden of the engineers, aided by Captains Call and Young, on a commanding position, within three hundred and eighty-five yards of the Spanish works, and a nine-pounder mounted. A howitzer battery was simultaneously established on the capitol of, and within seven hundred and fifty yards of the fort. At daylight on the 27th, the Spanish garrison opened their artillery on our batteries; a parley was sounded, a flag sent in, and the surrender of Fort Carlos de Barancas again demanded; the favorable positions obtained were pointed out, and the inutilty of resistance urged. Anxious to avoid an open contest, and to save the effusion of blood, the same terms previously offered were again tendered. These were rejected, and offensive operations recommenced. A spirited and well-directed fire was kept up the greater part of the morning, and at intervals during the afternoon. In the evening a flag was sent from the Spanish commandant, offering to capitulate, and a suspension of hostilities was granted until eight o'clock next day, when the enclosed articles of capitulation (marked C) were signed and agreed to. The terms are more favorable than a conquered enemy would have merited; but, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, my object obtained, there was no motive for wounding the feelings of those whose military pride or honor had prompted to the resistance made. The articles, with but one condition, amounted to a complete cession to the United States of that portion of the Floridas hitherto under the government of Don Jose Mazot.

The arrangements which I have made to secure Pensacola and its dependencies are contained in the general orders, marked D. I deemed it most advisable to retain, for the present, the same government to which the people had been accustomed, until such time as the Executive of the United States may order otherwise. It was necessary, however, to establish the revenue laws of the United States, to check the smuggling which had been carried on successfully in this quarter for many years past, and to admit the American merchant to an equal participation in a trade which would have been denied under the partial operations of the Spanish commercial code.

Capt. Gadsden was appointed by me collector, and he has organized and left the department in the charge of officers on whom the greatest confidence may be reposed.

Though the Seminole Indians have been scattered, and literally so divided and reduced as no longer to be viewed as a formidable enemy, yet, as there are still many small marauding parties supposed to be concealed in the swamps of the Perdido, Choctawhatchy, and Chapouley, who might make occasional and sudden inroads on our frontier settlers, massacring women and children, I have deemed it advisable to call into service for six months, if not sooner discharged, two companies of volunteer rangers, under Captains McGirt and Boyles, with instructions to scour the country between the Mobile and Apalachicola rivers, exterminating every hostile party who dare resist, or will not surrender and remove with their families above the thirty-first degree of latitude.

The Seminole war may now be considered as at a close, tranquillity again restored to the southern frontier of the United States; and, as long as a cordon of military posts is maintained along the Gulf of Mexico, America has nothing to apprehend from either foreign or Indian hostilities. Indeed, sir, to attempt to fortify or protect an imaginary line, or to suppose that a frontier on the thirty-first degree of latitude, in a wilderness, can be secured by a cordon of military posts, whilst the Spanish authorities were not maintained in the Floridas, and the country lay open to the use and excitement of any enemy, is visionary in the extreme. On the immutable principles, therefore, of self defence, authorized by the law of nature and of nations, have I bottomed all my operations; on the fact that the Spanish officers had aided and abetted the Indian enemy, and thereby became a party in hostilities against us, do I justify my occupying the Spanish fortresses. Spain had disregarded the treaties existing with the American Government, or had not power to enforce them; the Indian tribes within her territory, and which she was bound to keep at peace, had visited our citizens with all the horrors of savage war; negro brigands were establishing themselves when and where they pleased; and foreign agents were openly and knowingly practising their intrigues in this neutral territory. The immutable principles of self-defence justified, therefore, the occupancy of the Floridas, and the same principles will warrant the American Government in holding it until such time as Spain can guarantee, by an adequate military force, the maintaining her authority within the colony.

A topographical sketch, of the country from the Apalachicola to Pensacola Bay, accompanies this. Captain Young will prepare, as soon as practicable, a topographical memoir of that part of the Floridas in which my army has operated, with a map of the country. Captain Gadsden is instructed to prepare a report on the necessary defences of the country, as far as the military reconnoissance will permit, accompanied with plans of existing works, what additions or improvements are necessary, and what new works should, in his opinion, be erected to give permanent security to this important territorial addition to our Republic. As soon as this report is prepared, Captain Gadsden will receive orders to repair to Washington City with some other documents which I may wish to confide to his charge.

At the close of a campaign which has terminated so honorably and happily, it gives me pleasure to express my approbation generally of the officers and soldiers of every species of corps which I have had the honor to command. The patience with which they endured fatigue and submitted to privations, and the determination with which they encountered and vanquished every difficulty, are the strongest indication of the existence of that patriotic feeling which no circumstances can change, and of that irresistible ardor in the defence of their country which will prove her strength and bulwark under any exposure. I should do violence to my feelings if I did not particularly notice the exertions of my quartermaster general, Colonel George Gibson, who, under the most embarrassing circumstances, relieved the necessities of my army, and to whose exertions I was indebted for the supplies received. His zeal and integrity in this campaign, as well as in the uniform discharge of his duties since his connexion with my staff, merit the approbation and gratitude of his country.

With respect, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 10th instant I received your excellency's letter of the 27th of April last, informing me that some articles of clothing used by the troops of the United States, and supposed to be part of those taken in the boat in which Lieutenant Scott and his escort were so inhumanly murdered, were found in a small schooner despatched from this port for that of Appalachee with provisions.

Your excellency inquires of me in what manner these articles came into my possession; and you further state that you feel yourself obliged to inform me that the documents and the proofs found in St. Juan, the detention of American cattle, found in St. Marks, and the correspondence carried on between this post and the hostile Indians, are sufficient to create a belief that they were armed and incited to this cruel war against the United States by the Spanish officers.

Your excellency adds that there exists positive proofs that the Indians were supplied with munitions by the last commander of St. Marks; and you conclude by saying that an asylum has been granted here to the persons and property of the Indians, who are enemies to the United States, and fugitives from the American territory; and that these proceedings, and the refusing to allow the passage of provisions for your troops, prove the unjust conduct of the Spanish agents in the Floridas.

I shall answer the charges alleged in their proper order, and without evasion or reservation.

The first complaint made by your excellency is relative to the articles of clothing found on board the schooner Maria, and which have been detained on the supposition that they are the property of the United States.

Part of these articles, as is proved by copy No. 1, were purchased at New Orleans in the month of May, last year; part came from the Havana; and part were purchased in this place. All this is established. The charge is, of course, done away, and your excellency's question is satisfactorily answered.

The succeeding one is more serious, and relates to the course observed of late by the Governor of St. Marks.

I immediately required of him an account of his conduct, and he made me the communication found in copy No. 2. However, your excellency affirms that you possess positive proofs of the misconduct of this officer, I must, as a necessary consequence, entreat you to submit them to me, that, the fact being established, I may inflict on him deserved punishment. I assure your excellency, with the sincerity natural to me, that he has acted in entire opposition to his instructions; and that, if your excellency will transmit the proofs I request, he shall be brought before a council of war, and punished with all the severity his transgressions deserve; but your excellency will be just enough to allow that the Spanish Government cannot be responsible for the misconduct of its agents, when it neither upholds them therein, nor suffers their mal-practices, being ascertained, to pass unpunished.

The last complaints of your excellency have a personal and direct application to myself, and are relative to the asylum granted to the persons and property of the fugitive Indians, and to the passage of provisions up the Escambia. It is easy for me to remove these charges, and I think your excellency will be satisfied with a short and true relation of facts.

With respect to the Indians, your excellency has been assuredly misinformed, as, although it is true that some remained here, the greater part of them were women and children, who procured a subsistence by furnishing the inhabitants with wood, fish, and other trifling objects, and were here before the present war with the Seminoles. Others, now and then, assembled on account of the war, but in very small numbers; as, when I had them collected, in compliance with the proposition made by Major Young, they, altogether, amounted to eighty-seven, and, assuredly, these few unarmed and miserable men were not hostile to the United States. The continual passing of American citizens from the frontier to this people, who travelled alone and unarmed among them, without being, at any time, insulted or molested in their persons or property, is a proof of this.

With respect to the passage of provisions up the Escambia, I have not hitherto prevented it, but, on the contrary, have facilitated it so far as I was able, and my limited powers have permitted, even to the compromising of myself; for, being only a subordinate officer, I could not consent to it, as it is unauthorized, but I took the responsibility on myself, in consideration of existing circumstances, and so I stated to your excellency in my letter of the 15th of last month, which I wrote to you by Major Perault, and to which I refer you in support of my assertion. Now, that the free commerce of this people with those of the interior is declared admissible by higher authority, there will, in future, be no difficulty in allowing the merchants to transport from hence to Fort Crawford, and other forts on the frontier, as well by water as by land, whatever provisions and effects they may need or desire; by which means these posts will readily be provisioned, and your excellency will be satisfied.

I think I have answered your excellency's letter satisfactorily, and in a manner which can leave no doubt of the sincerity of my intentions, and which evinces my desire to contribute, so far as depends on me, to the good understanding existing between our respective Governments.

God preserve your excellency many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

His Exc<sup>y</sup> ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General U. S. Army.

No. 1.

PENSACOLA, May 18, 1818.

Being informed of what, amongst other subjects, Major General Andrew Jackson, of the United States troops, states to you in his letter of the 27th of April last, and communicated to me in yours of the 13th instant, in which you direct me to explain to you what description the articles were, referred to by the said General, and by whom the coats worn by the men belonging to the Grey and Brown companies, (de pardos y morenos,) from the Havana, under my command, were sold or brought to this place, they being the same uniform as that worn by the troops of the United States, I have to inform you, in reply, that the articles of clothing shipped on board the schooner Maria, for the supply of a detachment from the aforesaid companies at Appalachicola, and detained by General Jackson, consisted of fifteen four-point woollen blankets, brought here in His Majesty's hermaphrodite brig El Don Henrique Granpré, as is shown by voucher No. 1, annexed; 15 common black hats, bought of Don

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

Henrique Michelet, as is proved by voucher No. 2; and 20 shirts of Crea linen, and the same number of pantaloons, received by the above named hermaphrodite armed brig, with the exception of three or four of the latter articles, which were made in North America for the use of their troops, and came into my possession in the manner I shall explain to you. All which clothing I requested you, in mine of the 7th April last, to report to the Department of Royal Finance, that they might be regularly entered in the clearance, on account, and at the risk, of the same. By voucher No. 3, annexed, you will perceive that, on the 1st and 6th of May, and 29th of July last, there were shipped for me, from New Orleans, by Don Pedro Dalhaste y Claveria, merchant and citizen of the United States, one hundred and thirty-one coats of the uniform altered there, as is stated in his letter of advice; also twenty-eight pairs of shoes; one hundred and eighteen shirts; seventy-six pairs of pantaloons; two hundred and thirty-six woollen waistcoats, without sleeves; twenty Russia jackets; two hundred and fifty-three leather caps, for the use of the Chasseurs; and a quantity of leather gaiters and stocks; which articles were purchased from the military storekeeper at New Orleans, and brought here in the schooners Maria and Jalouse, under the charge of their masters, Bartolome Alberty and Joze Medina, who included them in the manifests they presented to the custom-house here, and the duties on them were paid, as appears from the estimate of them, made by the Department on the 19th of May and the 11th of August last. It follows, from this statement, that the conjecture formed by General Jackson, that the articles of clothing detained by him were part of those taken from the escort of Lieutenant Scott at the time he was killed, within the territory of the Republic, is deprived of all foundation, as the unfortunate fate of that officer and his escort happened on the Appalachicola in December last; and the articles of clothing alluded to were purchased in New Orleans in May and July of the same year, as is proved by the letters of advice and invoices comprised in voucher No. 3, to which I have referred. God preserve you many years.

NEW ORLEANS, April 30, 1817.

Annexed you have an account of cost and charges of fifty-four shirts and twenty-eight pairs of shoes, for amount whereof you are debited, in account, fifty-three dollars. Although I had no orders from you for the shirts, I was induced to purchase them by the low price, and the probability of your employing them to advantage. In the sack which contains them, you will find a uniform coat, altered here, and which can be obtained of the storekeeper at twelve rials. I think this would answer. There are about a hundred and twenty of them. I am offered by the same storekeeper fifty field-tents, nearly new, at three dollars, and a parcel of strong leathern caps, such as are worn by the Chasseurs, and which he will sell at less than two rials; of these there are about two hundred. The storekeeper having made me a second offer of the coats, I proposed to take them in barter for coffee, at eighteen and a half. At ten rials, I am persuaded it would be a good bargain, and would afford an opportunity of putting off the coffee, the low quality of which makes it a dull sale. The only quality asked for, and which sells with great difficulty at twenty dollars, is the very superior green coffee. I enclose the account of the cost and charges of the said coats, which you will receive by the schooner Maria, and whose amount is charged to your debit, in account current, viz: $176 13.

PENSACOLA, May 14, 1818.

Instructed, by your letter of yesterday, of the points treated of by Major General Jackson in his letter of the 27th ultimo, and on which he founds his positive assertions, that the Indians not only received succors at Appalachie, but that they were excited to commit their outrages against them, [the United States,] were advised of his movements, &c. I have, in answer, to express the astonishment this affair has caused me, and which has solely arisen from the imposture employed, by some malicious person, to asperse the parties criminated by the letter of the said General. His excellency states, that, from the papers and other proofs taken at St. John's, the detention of American cattle found at St. Mark's, and purchased of the commissary there, and the intercourse carried on between that place and the hostile Indians, it is evident that they were inspirited and excited to this cruel war by the Spaniards. To this I have to reply, that it has never come to my knowledge that any person belonging to the fort had any intercourse, directly or indirectly, with St. John's; and although I wrote two letters to Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, one of them was merely to thank him for the three copies [exemplars] he sent me from thence or Savannah, and for the information he gave me of the intention of the insurgents at Amelia Island, and of Captain Woodbine, who I informed you by express was one of the two chiefs hung on the day I left Appalachie, or on the preceding one; and the other was to request him to come or send as speedily as possible for the effects which, at the request of the Indian chiefs, and to avoid increasing their suspicions, I permitted to be deposited in the fort on the departure of O'Kelagne, who had them in charge; and although by this step I ran some risk, from the state of excitement of both parties, it was one which does not appear to me to give any just ground for suspicion. Nor does the finding of American cattle, which his excellency states he purchased at St. Mark's, afford greater cause of suspicion, as it is notorious that, from the time of its establishment, its supplies were obtained from the droves of cattle brought there for sale by the Indians; and that they had many is shown from those found in Mickaskey and its vicinity. Purchases were only occasionally made, because we considered ourselves sufficiently supplied for some months; and if the cattle were stolen from the Americans, the sellers took good care to conceal that fact, and were all of them known to have droves, and were in the habit of bringing them for sale; and very seldom was it that the American commandant or magistrate, within whose district these excesses were committed, was known to complain of them to the commandant at St. Mark's, and send him the marks of the cattle, that it might be seen from whence they came, and the purchase of them be avoided. Nor does the intercourse between the fort and the Indians, complained of by General Jackson, afford any better evidence of what he asserts, that from this it is inferable that they were inspirited and excited to this cruel war by the Spaniards. Such intercourse and good understanding were at all times recommended by the Government, and never more necessary than in the circumstances in which we were placed in the fort; and on this, amongst other reasons, General Jackson, in his first letter, founded his demand that it should be occupied by his troops, and added, that on this account such a course could not fail to be approved by His Catholic Majesty. In the same letter he stated to me, that he had been informed by an Indian woman, a prisoner, that the Indians and negroes had received large supplies of munitions from the fort. I thought I had convinced him of the contrary in my answer, in which I represented to him that no one could better remove from his mind any unfavorable impressions on this point, than the bearer of it, Mr. William Hambly, who, during his stay here, repeatedly interpreted to me the anxiety of the chiefs to obtain such supplies; and that he could also inform him, that I uniformly counselled them to avoid the destruction which has overtaken them, and which I foresaw from the first. But as it appears he is not yet satisfied, and persists in his charge, a reference to the returns of the public storekeeper will show that, from the month of May last, and prior to the receipt of your orders, there had been issued to some chiefs and head men, and that merely from motives of policy, only three pounds of powder, three pounds of balls, and fourteen flints; and the interpreter belonging to the fort, Juan Sandoval, and his son Francisco, through whom I communicated with the Indians, can also testify to the truth of this statement, whose evidence I request of you to have taken, in refutation of General Jackson's charge against me. He cannot but know that, a short time before the Negro fort on the Appalachicola was blown up, all the chiefs of the tribes in its immediate vicinity went there and supplied themselves with powder and ball left for them by the English; and that at Mickaskey, and the houses in the neighborhood, there was a great quantity. Having thus obtained so large a supply of the kind of powder and ball they most esteemed, what value could they set on ours, which they in fact view with such indifference and contempt, that only those hunters, of whom now and then one comes to the fort to supply us with venison, geese, &c., will use it; and although, as I stated in my communication to you, some was repeatedly requested of me by the chief Kinache, for the purpose of showing, by the refusal of it, that the American interest prevailed in the fort, he did not obtain it; in consequence of which we were considered as American partisans to the last, were reproached with it, and had even to put up with some impertinences from them. I shall, however, in strict adherence to truth, and because the circumstance may have given rise to these suspicions, state that the chief Petisacho, who was hung, received, among other things, at the fort, from Mr. Arbuthnot, an English merchant, when he came from Savannah to request aid against the negroes from him on account of their molestation, a small barrel of powder, which might contain from twenty to twenty-five pounds, and which was kept with the other effects brought from O'Kelagne's, and which he had in charge. What he did with it I know not, but I well know that the chief occasioned me much fear and anxiety, by being so near the fort with four or five hundred Indians of his party. I never had an idea that he employed it against the Americans, but supposed that they used it in the purchase of peltry for the said Arbuthnot, which was his avowed object, and in which he was engaged on the arrival of the Americans. The idea that the officers of St. Mark's lent themselves to aid and excite the Indians, by giving them information of the movements of the Americans, is highly ridiculous; for how, or from whence, could their movements be better known at the fort than from the Indians themselves? Thither they passed, and from thence repassed, incessantly, and their reports were so various that they deserved very little attention; as a proof of which, nothing certain was known of the operations of the Americans until the different columns of their troops appeared. At the mouth of the Pinar, although their three vessels were at anchor there for three or four days previous, they kept English colors flying until the day before the arrival of the army. My different communications to you are pledges that I took no part in the contest between the Americans and the Indians; nevertheless, my mistrust of the latter evinced to which I gave a preference. How, then, is it possible to believe that I gave them the aid of which General Jackson complains, or how can such aid be reconciled with the tenor of my letters and the steps I took to liberate Messrs. Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, by which I exposed myself and my garrison to the vengeance of the Indians? Or, lastly, with the fact of my having ransomed, at a most critical moment, an American soldier, whom they declared to me they would otherwise put to death? I leave it to the most impartial to decide, if these be not proofs of the existence, at St. Mark's, of a bias in favor of the American interest; and of this, I am persuaded, General Jackson will be convinced on deliberately reflecting on the subject. I shall not deny that I have observed towards those barbarians a policy which had the appearance of a warm friendship, and by which I have incurred considerable expenses. If, however, all the circumstances attendant on my situation be duly weighed, it will be seen that all this was neces-

to restrain them from doing what they had one time premeditated, on the pretext I have alluded to, and on others suggested to them by some persons who had gone hence to those parts of the country. Although I have, as I conceive, given satisfaction on all the points embraced by Major General Jackson in his letter, I beg leave to request that, for fuller evidence of what I allege, you will be pleased to give orders for having the testimony taken of the interpreter and his sons of the subaltern Don Miguel Ordóñez, of Don Anastasio Montes de Oca, the military storekeeper, and of surgeon Don Diego de Barrios, as these persons have some knowledge of the subject in question. God preserve, &c.

It having come to my knowledge that you have passed the frontiers with the troops under your command, and that you are within the territory of this province of West Florida, which is subject to my government, I solemnly protest against this procedure as an offence against my sovereign, exhorting you, and requiring of you, in his name, to retire from it; as, if you do not, and continue your aggressions, I shall repel force by force.

The consequence in this case will, doubtless, be the effusion of blood, and also an interruption of the harmony which has hitherto reigned between our respective nations; but, as the repeller of an insult has never been deemed the aggressor, you will be responsible, both to God and man, for all the fatal consequences which may result. God preserve you many years.

JOSE MAZOT.

The Commander of the U. S. troops.

A copy of this protest was addressed to General Andrew Jackson, and sent by a Spanish officer, meeting the American army, shortly after it had passed the Escambia river.

J. GADSDEN, *Aid-de-camp.*HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Pensacola, May 24, 1818.

SIR: The enclosed communication was forwarded to you by my aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden, last evening; not finding you, however, in Pensacola, its delivery was delayed.

I have entered Pensacola to provision my troops. I have only to add, that an immediate compliance with my demand is expected. Resistance on your part would be a needless sacrifice of men.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.Don José MAZOT,
Fort St. Charles, Barancas.HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
On the line of march, May 23, 1818.

SIR: The Southern frontier of the United States has, for more than twelve months, been exposed to all the horrors of a cruel and savage war. A party of outlaws and refugees from the Creek nation, negroes who have fled from their masters, citizens of the United States, and sought an asylum in Florida, and the Seminole Indians, inhabiting the territory of Spain, all uniting, have raised the tomahawk, and, in the character of savage warfare, have neither regarded sex nor age; helpless women have been massacred, and the cradle crimsoned with the blood of innocence. The United States, true to their own engagements, and confiding in the faith of Spain to enforce existing treaties, never entertained a doubt but that these atrocities would early attract the attention of the Spanish Government, and that speedy and effectual measures would have been adopted for their suppression. Under this persuasion, a cordon of military posts was established to give immediate protection to such of our frontier settlers as were peculiarly exposed, and strict injunctions issued to the American officers to respect the territory of Spain, and not to attempt operations within its limits. These instructions were most scrupulously observed; and, notwithstanding the inactivity of the American troops had encouraged the Indians to the most daring and outrageous acts of violence against our citizens, the Government of the United States was still disposed to respect the territory of Spain, and confide in the ability of the Spanish Government to execute existing treaties, until advised through you that, with every disposition, the Spanish authorities had not the power of controlling the Indians in Florida; that their acts of late were viewed as equally hostile to the interests of Spain as those of the United States; that Spanish subjects were not exempted from the evils of which we complained, and that the negro establishment on the Appalachicola, and St. Juan rivers, were founded by British agents, contrary to the will of Spain. Those representations determined the President of the United States to adopt effectual measures to restore tranquillity to the Southern frontier of the American Republic; and, pursuant to his orders, justifiable by the immutable laws of self-defence, I have penetrated into Florida, reduced to ashes the Seminole villages, destroyed their magazines of provisions, beaten their warriors whenever they hazarded a contest, dispersed some, and expelled others across the river.

In the course of my operations, it became necessary to visit the Spanish fortress of St. Mark's. Entering the territory of Spain to fight her battles, to relieve from bondage her subjects, and to chastise an Indian tribe whom she acknowledged, under existing treaties, she was bound to preserve at peace with the United States, I had every reason to expect that the American army would have been received as friends, and every facility afforded to insure success to operations so interesting to both Governments.

My expectations have not been realized. It had been reported to me, direct from you, that Fort St. Mark's had been threatened by the Indians and negroes, and you expressed serious apprehensions, from the weakness of the garrison, and defenceless state of the works, for its safety. From other sources, to be relied on, the same information had been furnished me. It became necessary, therefore, to anticipate the movements of the enemy, and amicably to get possession of a work, the dislodging the enemy from which might cost me much precious blood.

On entering St. Mark's, evidence of the duplicity and unfriendly feelings of the commandant evinced itself. I found that the gates of his fort had been thrown open to the avowed savage enemies of the United States. That councils of war had been permitted to be held within his own quarters by the chiefs and warriors. That the Spanish store houses had been appropriated to the use, and were then filled with goods belonging to the hostile party. That cattle, knowingly plundered from the citizens of the United States, had been contracted for and purchased by the officers of the garrison, from the Spanish thieves. That foreign agents had free access within the walls of St. Mark's, and a Mr. Arbuthnot, condemned and executed as the instigator of this war, an inmate in the commandant's family.

From this fort was information afforded the enemy of the strength and movements of my army by the said Arbuthnot, the date of departure of express noted by the Spanish commissary, and ammunition, munitions of war, and all necessary supplies furnished.

On my return from my operations east, your letter was received, positively refusing to permit (unless exorbitant duties were paid) any provisions passing up to the American fort on the Escambia. Connected with this strong indication of an unfriendly disposition on your part, I have learnt, from the most unquestionable authority, that the city of Pensacola has, for some months past, been entirely under the control of the Indians; that free ingress and egress is permitted to the avowed savage enemy of the United States; the supplies of ammunition, munitions of war, and provisions, have been received by them from thence; that on the 15th of April last there were no less than five hundred Indians in Pensacola, many of them known to be hostile to the United States, and who had but lately escaped my pursuit. The late massacre of eighteen individuals on the Federal road was committed by Indians, direct from their return to Pensacola, who were received by you and transported across the bay, to elude the pursuit of the American troops. The Americans returning, the savages were permitted to return. An Indian, wounded in pursuit by a party, for having killed a citizen of the United States, was openly, in the sight of many Americans, received by you, and every comfort administered. Such practices, if authorized by the King, would justify me in open hostilities. Disposed, however, to believe that it was one of the unauthorized acts of agents, I deem it politic and necessary to occupy Pensacola and the Barancas with an American garrison, until the Spanish Government can be advised of the circumstance, and have force sufficient to maintain, and agents disposed to enforce, existing treaties.

This is the third time that the American troops have been compelled to visit Pensacola from the same causes. Twice had the enemy been expelled, and the place left in quiet possession of those who had permitted the irregular occupancy. This time it must be held until Spain has the power or will to maintain her neutrality.

This is justifiable on the immutable principles of self-defence. The Government of the United States is bound to protect her citizens; but weak would be all its efforts, and ineffectual the best advised measures, if the Floridas are to be free to every enemy, and on the pretext of policy or necessity, Spanish fortresses are to be opened to their use, and every aid and comfort afforded. I have been explicit, to preclude the necessity of a tedious negotiation. My resolution is fixed, and I have strength enough to enforce it. My army now occupies the old fort St. Michael, commanding Pensacola. If the town and the Barancas are peaceably surrendered, an inventory of all the property, ammunition, arms, &c. shall be taken by officers appointed by both parties, and the amount receipted for by me, to be accounted for by the American Government. The property of Spanish subjects shall be respected; their religion and laws guaranteed to them; the civil Government permitted to remain as now established, subject to the control of the military authority of the United States; the ingress and egress open to all individuals; commerce free to the subjects of Spain as usual; and the military furnished with transportation to Cuba.

If the peaceable surrender be refused, I shall enter Pensacola by violence, and assume the government until the transaction can be amicably adjusted by the two Governments. The military in this case must be treated as prisoners of war.

The proof supporting the accusation against your official station will justify this procedure.

In reply to your communication of the 22d instant, I have only to observe that the clothing detained will be a subject of future friendly settlement.

How far the Indians, permitted to remain in the neighborhood of Pensacola, were friendly disposed to the citizens of the United States, is tested by the late massacre committed by them on the Alabama.

The Red Ground chiefs, Muldecoxy and Holmer, avowedly hostile to the United States, were but lately seen in Pensacola, and a body of Indians desecrated a few days since in the vicinity of Barancas, in presence of several Spanish officers.

By a reference to my communications of the 25th of March, you will see how far I have been the aggressor in the measure protested against. You are there distinctly advised of the objects of my operations, and that every attempt on your part to succor the Indians, or prevent the passage of my provisions in the Escambia, would be viewed in no other light than as hostile acts on your part.

You have done both, and exposed my troops to the severest privations, by the detention occasioned by the exaction of duties on my provisions and vessels in Pensacola. You have, therefore, been the aggressor, and the blood which may be shed by a useless resistance on your part to my demand will rest on your head. Before God and man you will be responsible.

This will be handed to you by my aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden, by whom an answer is expected.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

Don JOSE MAZOT,
Governor of Pensacola.

FORTRESS OF ST. CHARLES, OF BARANCAS,
May 24, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: I received, at 10 o'clock this morning, the two communications of your excellency of the 23d and of this day. As I have, on mine of the 18th instant, satisfactorily answered all the charges your excellency alleges in the former, I shall only add, with respect to the Indians, that I notice your excellency is greatly misinformed, as the circumstances to which you refer are, for the most part, unfounded; in proof of which I will state, that the only two Indians I have found since the peace negotiated by me, and the delivery of the eighty-seven to Major Young, are two who are in the prison, with three women and children. I ought to inform you that, long before the movements of your excellency, I had given orders at Appalachee that the Seminole Indians should not be succored, and even had placards posted up in Pensacola for the same purpose; passing over without notice only some unfortunate beings who, from time immemorial, had furnished the people with wood, as I have stated.

Your excellency lays to my charge the blood which may be shed by my refusal to deliver up the province, as your excellency requests; which I shall never do, nor can I, without covering myself with dishonor at the close of my life and of my long military career. I am firmly persuaded your excellency would, in my case, do the same, as you would not venture to stain the honorable laurels with which you are adorned. No nation, whatever may be its motives, can violate the territory of another, especially when no demands have previously been made of its Government. Your excellency has violated the Spanish territory in Appalachee, by taking possession of that fort, and pulling down its flag, when you could have adopted more conciliatory measures, which would more and more have cemented and strengthened the good understanding existing between our respective Governments.

On the 21st of the present month, by your excellency's order, Don Pedro Philibert, and other inhabitants, remained prisoners in their houses, on their parole of honor. To-day, at 11 o'clock, before Captain Gadsden arrived at Pensacola, your excellency's army entered, and made prisoners on parole Don Pedro de Alba, the interpreter, (who translated your before named communications, and who is the bearer of these.) and I believe all the military, and of course broke up the seven posts [punta] stationed with the same number of officers and two chiefs for the maintenance of the tranquillity of the place.

These facts being incontrovertible, I ask who but your excellency will be responsible for the blood that may be shed, as you declare, in your letter, that you are about to take possession of Pensacola and Barancas? I protest before God and man that my conduct is blameless, and that my ardent desires are, as they ever have been, to contribute to the peace and tranquillity of our respective nations; for, besides the sincerity of my intentions, I have in view the Message of the President to the Congress of the United States on the 25th of March last, and its tenor assured me that no aggressions were to be expected from the troops of the said States. Such, however, this province has unfortunately suffered from the operations of your excellency in Appalachee and Pensacola.

I expect from the generosity of your excellency, first, that you will set the officers and troops which garrisoned Pensacola at liberty; and that, after supplying your army with provisions, you will shortly evacuate the territory of this province, and not carry on a partial war against West Florida at a time when our nations are in profound peace.

Lieutenant Colonel Don Lui Piemas, temporarily commandant of Pensacola, is duly authorized to exercise my functions, and to receive the communications of your excellency, which he will faithfully remit to me, and to which I will give the promptest answers, to be transmitted to you through the bearer of this, the interpreter, Don Pedro de Alba. Finally, if, contrary to my hopes, your excellency should persist in your intention to occupy this fortress, which I am resolved to defend to the last extremity, I shall repel force by force; and he who resists aggression can never be considered an aggressor.

God preserve your excellency many years.

JOSE MAZOT.
His Ex'cy ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General com'g U. S. Army.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Pensacola, May 25, 1818.

SIR: The accusations against you are founded on the most unquestionable evidence. I have the certificates of individuals who, on the 23d instant, at or near the little bayou, counted seventeen Indians in company of several Spanish officers.

I have only to repeat that the Barancas must be occupied by an American garrison, and again to tender you the terms offered, if amicably surrendered. Resistance would be a wanton sacrifice of blood, for which you and your garrison will have to atone. You cannot expect to defend yourself successfully, and the first shot from your fort must draw down upon you the vengeance of an irritated soldiery. I am well advised of your strength, and cannot but remark on the inconsistency of presuming yourself capable of resisting an army which has conquered the Indian tribes, too strong, agreeably to your own acknowledgment, to be controlled by you. If the force which you are now disposed wantonly to sacrifice had been wielded against the Seminoles, the American troops had never entered the Floridas.

I applaud your feeling as a soldier in wishing to defend your post; but when resistance is ineffectual, and the opposing force overwhelming, the sacrifice of a few brave men is an act of wantonness, for which the commanding officer must be accountable to his God.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. com'g Division of the South.
Don JOSE MAZOT, Com'g Barancas.

PENSACOLA, May 26, 1818.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: On the 24th of the present month, Captain Amelung, of the 1st United States regiment, put into my hands your excellency's letter, dated at Washington, Mississippi Territory, on the 23d of April last; in which, after apprizing me that your Government had given it in charge to you to inform me that the fort of the Negroes, erected during the late war with Great Britain, near the junction of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, had been reinforced, and was now occupied by more than two hundred and fifty negroes, many of whom were seduced from the service of their masters, (who are citizens of the United States,) and that all of them are well armed, provisioned, and disciplined, you make many wise reflections with respect to the serious injuries which may result from tolerating such an establishment, not only to those in the immediate neighborhood of it, by destroying the peace of the nation, but likewise to the good understanding which happily exists between our respective Governments. You enter into an investigation to show what the Spanish authorities ought to do to put an end to an evil of so serious a nature, in a mode prescribed by those principles of good faith, which are the foundation of friendly neighborhood among nations. You distinctly state what this Government ought immediately to do; in failure of which, your Government will be obliged to do it, to insure the safety of the inhabitants of the United States; and you conclude by requesting me to state, in my answer to your letter, whether the said fort has been constructed by the Spanish Government, and whether the negroes who composed the garrison were deemed subjects of His Catholic Majesty; and if the fort was not built by Spanish authority, to state by what authority and by whose order it was built.

In answer to your excellency I will state (with the veracity which comports with the character of an honorable officer, in which class I rank myself) that, having arrived at the place nearly at the close of the month of March preceding, and being informed of what your excellency has communicated to me, (with this difference, that the fort, instead of being where you placed it, is to be found on the eastern bank of the Appalachicola, at about 15 miles from its mouth or entrance into the sea,) I lost no time in proposing to my Captain General the measures which appeared to me proper, as well for securing the inhabitants of the country under my command from the damage, loss, and injuries which they have suffered, and still suffer, from this establishment, as to prevent the American citizens and the friendly Indians of the neighborhood from continuing to experience them. I have hitherto received no answer, and, consequently, your excellency (who knows how limited are the powers of a subordinate officer) cannot be surprised that I should make known to you that, although my mode of thinking exactly corresponds with yours as to the dislodging of the negroes from the fort, the occupying it with Spanish troops, or destroying it, and delivering the negroes who may be collected to their lawful owners, I shall not be able to act until I receive the orders of my Captain General, and the assistance necessary to enable me to undertake the enterprise with a moral certainty of accomplishing the end. I am persuaded that the determination of the said chief cannot be long delayed, and, should it authorize me to act, your excellency may rest assured and persuaded that I will not lose an instant in adopting, on my part, the most efficacious measures for cutting up by the root an evil which is felt to the full extent stated in your letter by the inhabitants of this province, who are subjects of my Sovereign, and whose prosperity and tranquillity it is my duty to preserve and protect.

With this explanation, your before named letter may be considered fully answered, as it gives you to understand that, thinking as your excellency thinks with respect to the necessity of destroying the negroes, the fort of Appalachicola, occupied by them, was not constructed by order of the Spanish Government; and that the negroes, although in part belonging to inhabitants of this province, and, as rational beings, may be subjects of the King, my master, are deemed by me insurgents or rebels against the authority not only of His Catholic Majesty, but also of the proprietors from whose service they have withdrawn themselves; some seduced by the English Colonel Edward Nicholls, Major Woodbine, and their agents; and others from their inclination to run off.

But as your excellency manifests a particular desire that, in case the fort was not erected by Spanish authority, I should state by whose order it was erected, I have no difficulty in satisfying your curiosity, by informing you that I have understood, ever since my arrival at this place, that the said fort, and another near the confluence of the Chatahoochee and Flint rivers, (which it appears no longer exists,) were built by the orders of the before named Colonel Nicholls. I will not assure you he did it under authority from his Government; but I can say he proceeded to place artillery, munitions, and provisions in it, by the arrangement of Vice Admiral Malcolm, and that when Colonel Nicholls and the troops of his detachment, after the conclusion of the expedition against Louisiana, withdrew from that point, he left orders with the negroes totally contrary to the incontestable right of sovereignty which the King, my master, exercises from the line of the thirty-first degree of north latitude to the south. My predecessors in the Government have given an account of all these actions to the authorities on whom they depended, that the satisfaction which the violation required might be demanded by those on whom this duty devolves.

I think I have answered your excellency's letter satisfactorily, and in terms which cannot leave a doubt of the sincerity of my intentions in favor of the common cause of the American and Spanish inhabitants, and that my present inaction does not proceed from a want of inclination.

I likewise flatter myself that, until my Captain General decides, no steps will be taken by the Government of the United States, or by your excellency, which may be prejudicial to the sovereignty of the King, my master, in the district of Appalachicola, which is a dependency of this Government. And, finally, I conclude, by assuring your excellency that it will afford me particular satisfaction to have opportunities of evincing my desire not only to contribute, so far as depends on me, to the cementing of the good understanding which subsists between our respective Governments, but also to prove to your excellency the high opinion I entertain of your virtues and military talents.

God preserve your excellency many years.

MAURICIO DE ZUNIGA.

His Excy A. JACKSON.

FORT GADSDEN, May 2, 1818.

SIR: We beg leave to submit to you the following statement of facts: On the 13th December, 1817, we were violently torn from our settlements on the Appalachicola river by a number of Indians, headed by Chenubby, a chief from the Fowltown tribe, carried to Mickasuky, and delivered to Kenhajah, King of the Mickasukians. Kenhajah carried us to the negro towns on Suwaney, and thence to the Spanish fort St. Marks, to the commandant of which he delivered us as prisoners, captured under the orders of a Mr. Arbuthnot, reported to us as a British agent. At St. Marks we were treated as prisoners, and not permitted to wander beyond the walls of the garrison.

Whilst at that port the ingress and egress of the Indians, hostile to the United States, was unrestrained, and several councils were held, at one of which Kenhajah, King of the Mickasukians, Francis or Hillis Hago, Hamathlemeco, the chief of Autesses, and the chief of the Kolemies, all of the old Red Stick party; and Jack Mealy, chief of the Ochewas, were present. When it was reported that the chiefs, and that warriors were entering Fort St. Marks for the purpose of holding a council, Hambly represented to the commandant the impropriety of permitting such proceedings within the walls of a Spanish fortress, the officer of which was bound to preserve and enforce the treaties existing between the King of Spain and the United States; he replied to Hambly with some degree of warmth, observing that it was not in his power to prevent it. On the Indians coming into the fort, at their request, we were confined. The council was held in the commandant's quarters, he, the commandant, was present, but strictly forbade the intrusion of any of the officers of the garrison.

The Indians were in the habit of driving to Fort St. Marks, and disposing of cattle to the commandant and other Spanish officers. While at that post three or four droves were brought in, acknowledged by the Indians to have been stolen from the citizens of the United States, and purchased by the Spanish officers.

We were present at most of these contracts, and Hambly often referred to as an interpreter between the purchaser and seller.

Chenubby, a Fowltown Indian, once applied to Hambly to mention to the commandant that he was about visiting the frontiers of Georgia on a plundering expedition, and wished to know whether he would purchase the cattle brought in. A contract was entered into, and Chenubby, some time after, brought in and disposed of eleven head of cattle to the Spanish commandant of Fort St. Marks. These same cattle were those purchased by you from the commandant as his private property.

WM. HAMBLY,
EDM'D DOYLE.

FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

SIR: In conversation with the commandant at Fort St. Marks, on the subject of having that work occupied by an American garrison, I had occasion to notice the aid and comfort that the hostile party of Indians had received as reported from him; that they had free access within the walls of his fort, and it was known no small supplies of ammunition had been received from that quarter.

In reply he stated that his conduct had been governed by policy, the defenceless state of his work and the weakness of his garrison compelled him to conciliate the friendship of the Indians, to supply their wants, to grant what he had not the power to deny, and to throw open, with apparent willingness, the gates of his fortress, lest they should be forced by violence.

That he had been repeatedly threatened by Indians and negroes, and that his security depended upon exhibiting an external friendship. After Fort St. Marks was occupied by the American troops a black man and Spanish soldier was reported to me as having been arrested clad in the American uniform, recognised as part of the clothing of the fourth and seventh regiments, captured in the boat commanded by Lieutenant Scott, in ascending the Appalachicola river.

In explanation, the Spanish commandant observed, that his soldiers and the Seminole Indians were in the habit of trading with each other, and that this negro, with others of his garrison, had received his permission to purchase some clothing reported to have been brought in by the Indians. Respectfully, &c.

Major General A. JACKSON,
Com'g Southern Division U. S. A.

I certify that, on the 23d of May, being in the Bayou which enters Pensacola Bay, one and a half miles from the town, I saw at the ferry, on the Barancas, a number of Indians, I think about seventeen, in company with four Spanish officers. The officers were carried over, and the boat returned to ferry over the Indians. I saw one boat-load landed on the side next the Barancas. The Indians concealed themselves in the bushes on discovering us.

RICHARD BRICKHAM.

Witness: T. CROSS, Lieut. of Infantry.

I certify that I was in the boat with Brickham at the place and time mentioned in the above certificate; that I saw several Indians in company with four Spanish officers. The officers were ferried over with one Indian. I did not see the Indians ferried over; they concealed themselves on discovering us.

Witness to both certificates:

W. S. FULTON, Sec'y to Com. Gen.

We certify that, being in Fort St. Charles, Barancas, on the 28th of May, 1818, in the afternoon, soon after the American troops took possession of the work, and as the Spanish troops were marching out, we saw an Indian carried out by some Spanish soldiers; he was laid on his back to put on board a boat; he was wounded in the leg or thigh, and had every appearance of having been engaged in the defence of the fort.

Sec'y to Commanding General.

We, the undersigned, do hereby certify that, at the capture of Fort St. Marks East Florida, by Major General Andrew Jackson, on the 7th April, 1818, there were some cattle purchased on account of the United States, and turned over to us, which we are of an opinion had been driven from the frontiers of Georgia, (a part of them at least) and we were strengthened in our opinion by a number of officers and men from Georgia offering to swear to a number of them as the property of their neighbors and friends.

Given under our hands, at Fort Gadsden, this 3d of May, 1818.

PETER CONE,
Assistant Commissary.

We, the undersigned officers and men of the Georgia militia, in the service of the United States, do hereby certify that we were at Fort St. Marks, East Florida, at the time of its capture by Major General A. Jackson, on the 7th April, 1818, and saw some cattle that were purchased on account of the United States, from the Spanish authorities, which we were ready to swear to as the property of our friends and neighbors in Georgia.

ANDREW FRAZIER, Captain.
DANIEL F. SULLIVAN, G. M. S.

FORT GADSDEN, May 3, 1818.

SIR: After the occupancy of Fort St. Marks with the American troops, on the 7th of April last, it became my duty to take charge of some goods found in one of the public stores.

These goods were pointed out by the Spanish commandant, who, through Mr. Hambly as interpreter, separated several of the articles claimed as his own private property, and designated others as the property of Francis or Hillis Hajo, and Arbuthnot, a British agent or trader: an inventory of these were taken, and deposited with the American officer left in command at Fort St. Marks. With respect, &c.,

D. E. TWIGGS,
Brevet Major 7th Infantry.

I certify that I acted as interpreter in the transaction above alluded to, and two separate parcels of goods were designated by the Spanish commandant of St. Marks as belonging to Hillis Hajo and Arbuthnot.

WM. HAMBLY.

FORT MONTGOMERY, June 2, 1818.

I certify that between the 5th and 17th of May, 1818, whilst at Fort Gadsden on the Appalachicola river, I was informed by a Mr. Larua and Benneto Gassea, both citizens of, and at that time direct from, Pensacola, that, at the time of their departure thence, there were five hundred Indians in and about Pensacola; and I further certify that, on my arrival at Pensacola on the 23d of May, I was informed by Mr. Skeets, and other citizens of that place, that, on the 22d, which was the day before my arrival, Holmes, a noted Red Stick, with his party, had left Pensacola to proceed to the Choctawhatchy for safety, having been for several days previous in town.

All which I certify on honor.

WM. HAMBLY.

Witness—WM. S. FULTON,
Private Secretary of the Com'g General.

I do hereby certify that, during my long residence on the river Appalachicola, my knowledge of the Indian language, and my intimate acquaintance with the different chiefs, gave me many opportunities of knowing, through them, the advices given them from time to time by the Governors of West Florida, hostile to the United States. In the year 1812 or 1813, I saw a letter from the Governor of Pensacola to the late chief of the Seminoles, T. Perryman, advising him to collect his forces and join his upper town brethren, whom he said had come to a determination to rise in arms and shake off the American yoke; he would supply them in arms and ammunition, and he said he was sure that in less than a month their fathers and protectors, the Spaniards, would have a sufficient army in the field to aid and protect them. Not long after I saw this letter, a large party of Indians went down to Pensacola, where they received a large supply of ammunition and some arms; it was but shortly after this, when they attacked and destroyed the garrison of Fort Mims; this was the commencement of the first Indian war; on the 13th of December last, when on my plantation on the Appalachicola, I was made a prisoner of by a party of Seminole Indians, and was taken up to the Ochesee Bluff in company with Mr. Doyle, who was made a prisoner of with me. They kept us there three days, during which time they were busily engaged with some transports, which were then ascending the river to Fort Scott; from thence they took us to the Mickasukee, where the Indians informed me that they had been told by the commandant of St. Mark's that war was declared between Spain and the United States. From this place we were carried to the Suwanee, when Kenhagee, principal chief of the Seminoles, told me that we had been taken and robbed by order of Arbuthnot, and brought there to be tried by him. Shortly after we reached this, Arbuthnot arrived from Providence, when we were tried and sentenced by said Arbuthnot to be tortured. This sentence was not put in execution by the friendly interference of Mr. Cook, clerk to Arbuthnot, and the negro chief Nero. We were then conducted back to the Mickasukee, then Kenhagee went down to the fort of St. Mark's to consult the commandant if he would take us as prisoners, to keep at his order. They held a council among the neighboring chiefs, and on the fifth day he returned and ordered us to be conducted down next morning. We arrived at St. Mark's on the 12th of February at night. The Spanish officers received us kindly, but the commandant did not forget to remind us that we were still prisoners, and marked out that night the limits of our prison they rigidly kept during the time of our stay. Next morning the first thing that presented itself to my view, was my saddle horse, which had been taken from me by the Indians; he was in the possession of the commissary. I mentioned it to the commandant, but he said he bought him of an Indian, and he could do nothing in it. A few days after, in the course of a conversation, I mentioned it to the Spanish Doctor; he assured me that two-thirds of the property taken from us by the Indians had been bought by the commissary and others in the fort; the plundered property taken from Georgia, was every day luckily bought by the commandant and others; I knew one instance of an Indian making an engagement with the commandant for cattle, that he was then going to plunder, and in fourteen or fifteen days brought them in and sold them. On our first arrival at St. Mark's we had, by help of a friendly Indian, conveyed intelligence to our friends in Pensacola of our situation, and they sent us in a small vessel to effect our escape. At her arrival, the commandant said to us that he had no objection to our getting out of the power of the Indians, but that he should first demand a written obligation that we should never return to that country, nor hold communication directly or indirectly with the United States Government, or any of her officers; this being settled, we left St. Mark's in the night of the 28th March, and joined Captain McKeever in his gunboats in the Bay of Appalachicola; on the 30th returned with him to St. Mark's, where we joined General Jackson on the 6th of April.

Given under my hand this 24th of July.

WM. HAMBLY.

PROVINCE OF WEST FLORIDA,
Town of Pensacola, Sept. 18, 1818.

In pursuance with an order to me directed by Colonel William King, civil and military Governor of said province, (a copy whereof is hereto annexed,) I caused to appear before me, at the quarters of Captain Hugh Young, of the army of the United States, in this town, the following persons, viz: Manuel Gonzales, Dr. Brosnahan, William Cooper, J. Dauphin, — Skeate, Felipe Prieto, Joachim Barreлас, P. Alba, Jun., Jose Bonefi, (Marian) and Charles Leseau, to answer, on oath, such interrogatories, not tending to criminate themselves, as might be propounded to them by Captain Young, relating to the intercourse which took place between the late Spanish authorities of this province, and the hostile Indians, during the recent war with the United States.

Joachim Barreлас, being duly sworn, declares, that he has frequently seen parties of Indians in the town of Pensacola since the month of November, 1817; says that parties of Indians have been provisioned by the late authorities at this place, on several occasions; has frequently heard, and believed, that the Indians were in the habit of bringing into this place, horses, cattle, &c., for the purpose of selling them and other plunder; says he was at Barancas at the time that General Jackson came to Pensacola, in May last; deponent acted there as commissary, and knows that several Indians went from town down to Barancas, with the Spanish forces, and took refuge in the fort; that at the same time several small parties were encamped about the Barancas; that, upon the arrival of General Jackson before the Barancas, Tapaulca and family were also in the fort; deponent has seen said chief several times in Pensacola, and believes him to be either a Creek or Seminole Indian; that while deponent was at Barancas, and subsequently to the said month of November, 1817, he saw an Indian named Lunæ, an express from St. Marks, cross over from Santa Rosa island, to Barancas, with despatches for the Governor here; says that since the said month of November, 1817, Governor Mazot, being himself at Barancas, did order this deponent to give rations to several parties of Indians then there, of at least from thirty to forty strong, men, women, and children.

JOACHIM BARRELAS.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

George Skeate, being duly sworn, declares, that he has constantly resided in the town of Pensacola since November, 1817, since which, he has repeatedly seen at different times in said town, from thirty to forty Indians; has not seen any ammunition given to the Indians within the period above alluded to; has heard, and believes, that horses, cattle, &c., were brought into this place by the Indians and sold, which deponent, however, did not see. Deponent believes that the late Governor Mazot was well acquainted with the several murders that were committed on the neighboring American frontier; knows of no supplies furnished by order of the Spanish Government, since about the month of March, 1817, when a supply of knives, a few blankets, and some copper kettles, were furnished and delivered to a party of Indians, for the purpose, as was then said, of acting against the insurgents who were expected; that the said party of Indians shortly after disappeared, and nothing more was heard of them. Deponent saw, on the day that Major Young attacked a party of Indians in the neighborhood of this town, a number of Indians whom he believes were sent (or went themselves) across the bay in a boat belonging to Don Antonio Modina, Captain of the port.

GEORGE SKEATE.

Mr. Charles Le Jeune, being duly sworn, declares, that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817, since which he has frequently seen in this town, or its vicinity, parties of upwards of a hundred Indians encamped; that these parties were armed with rifles, or with the arms that were furnished them by the English; that although he cannot state that those parties had received ammunition from the Spanish Government here, he nevertheless can, and does state, that the said parties were provisioned from the King's stores, by Prieto, King's storekeeper; that previous to November, 1817, the Government was regularly in the habit of giving out ammunition to the Indians, from a store which was expressly for that purpose here; that on the day that Major Young attacked the Indians near this town, there was a considerable number encamped near the water side in town, who, upon hearing the report of the fire-arms, crossed the bay in their own boats, and in other larger boats belonging to others.

CHARLES LE JEUNE.

William Cooper, being duly sworn, declares, that he has resided in Pensacola since November, 1817, during which period he has frequently seen in town and its vicinity, several parties of Indians—saw one in particular with some sheet lead, and has heard that the Indians had introduced some clothes into town that looked like American manufacture; states, also, that Tapaulca was Red Stick chief, and had been frequently about Pensacola, for several years past.

WILLIAM COOPER.

JOHN DUFFY, being duly sworn, declares as follows:

Question. Have you resided in and about Pensacola since November, 1817?—Answer. I have.

Question. Have you seen in said town, or its vicinity, within or since that period, any Indians? Answer. I have.

Question. How many did you see at any particular time?

Answer. About the latter end of last Spring I saw in town from fifty to sixty Indians, but few of them were armed, because they were prohibited from coming into town armed. I suppose their arms were left in their camps in the neighborhood.

Question. How did these Indians subsist themselves, and how did they procure ammunition?

Answer. Probably from Government here; of this, however, I am not certain.

Question. Did you see any horses, cattle, or other plunder, brought into this place by the Indians?—Answer. No.

Question. How many Indians were in Pensacola, and its neighborhood, at the time that Major Young attacked a party near this town?

Answer. Of all descriptions, viz: men, women, and children, there must have been a considerable number; not less probably than one hundred and fifty or sixty.

Question. When Major Young attacked the party near town, how did those in town find means to escape across the bay?

Answer. I have understood, and believe, that they were set across by order of the Governor.

SANTIAGO PAUPHIN.

A true copy: R. K. CALL, A. L. C.

JOSEPH BONEFI, being duly sworn, declares as follows, viz:

Question. Have you lived in Pensacola since November, 1817?—Answer. I have.

Question. Have you not between that period and the approach of the American forces, under Major General Jackson, repeatedly seen divers parties of hostile Indians in this town or its neighborhood?

Answer. I have. Indeed, between the said month of November and the time that the hostile party surrendered to Major Young, there were more or less in town; sometimes in numbers considerable, sometimes fewer.

Question. How, or by whom, were those Indians subsisted, and from whom, or by what means, did they procure ammunition and other warlike stores or weapons?

Answer. I have understood, and do believe, that they were fed by the Government here; as to ammunition, &c., I cannot state how they procured supplies, except it might have been from the stores about town.

Question. Have you seen or been informed of any horses, cattle, or other plunder, having been brought in here by the Indians within the time above alluded to?—Answer. No.

JOSEPH BONEFI.

PENSACOLA, Sept. 19, 1818.

I certify that the foregoing depositions were sworn to and subscribed before me on this day.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

[illegible]

Field Report of the operating Army under the immediate command of Major General Andrew Jackson, at Pensacola, May 24, 1818.

STAFF, CORPS, AND REGIMENTS.

Lieutenants Ripley and Cross, of the 8th department, joined at Pensacola, and marched with the army, not included in the above report. The companies of Life Guards, with a detachment of Tennessee volunteers, in all one hundred men, formed a guard for the protection of Pensacola. The sick of the different corps, amounting to thirty-six men, were detached, leaving an aggregate of nine hundred and fifty-six to operate against the fortress of Barracas.

ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

Proposals which the Civil and Military Commandant of the Province of West Florida makes to His Excellency Andrew Jackson, General-in-Chief of the American Army, before the Fort San Carlos de Barancas.

1st. The fort of Barancas will be delivered to the troops of the United States, under the following conditions:

[Approved, with the exceptions made following each article, and possession given at one o'clock past morning this day.]

2d. The garrison of the fort of Barancas will march out, to be transported to the Havana, on the day and hour which shall be agreed upon, with all the honors of war; drums beating; with arms and baggage. Those employed in the Royal Finance, and others attached to this department, shall also be transported to the same port.

[A roster to be furnished of all the military and civil officers of the garrisons of Fort Barancas; the troops to march out as expressed in this article; their arms to be stacked at the foot of the glacis, and left in possession of the American army until the day of embarkation, when they will be restored.]

3d. The commandant of the province, the officers of his staff of the artillery and engineers, the officers and troops, shall carry with them their arms and personal effects, and shall also have the liberty of disposing of their property of every kind, with perfect security to the purchasers.

[All titles for property legally derived from the Crown of Spain will be respected.]

4th. The garrison shall be embarked on account of the United States; every person of the military class, or of the Royal Finance, shall receive, during the passage, such rations as are allowed to every grade by the regulations of Spain.

[Approved, as far as relates to the transportation of the garrison, and the Spanish rations allowed, provided they do not exceed the American ration, in which case the American ration only will be allowed.]

5th. A competent number of vessels shall be furnished for embarking the personal effects, papers, and other property belonging to the commandant, officers, and others in the Royal employ, and particularly the papers of the Secretary's office of the Government, which are in Pensacola; those of the Department of the Royal Finance, and of the civil and military employ. These papers shall not be subjected to any inspection or recognisance, under the pledge of their containing nothing foreign to the functions of the said persons.

[Approved. An estimate of the necessary transportation to be furnished, agreeably to established usage.]

6th. The sick, wounded, and all those who are now, or may fall sick previous to the embarkation of the troops for the Havana, shall be maintained by the Government of the United States until cured, and shall have the same privileges as the rest of the garrison; those who are in a situation shall be embarked at the same time with it, and all shall be under the care of, and attended by, the surgeon and other individuals of the Spanish military hospital.

[Approved.]

7th. The garrison of Pensacola, and the prisoners, as also those in the employ of the Royal Finance, shall enjoy the same privileges as the garrison of Barancas, and shall likewise be transported to the Havana, uniting the former to the latter, and all shall remain in the quarters they occupied in Pensacola until the moment of embarkation for the port of Havana.

[Approved. An estimate of the necessary transportation to be furnished, and included in estimate, for the garrison of Fort Barancas.]

8th. During their stay the United States will furnish to the King's storekeeper, under documents from the Royal officers, such articles of provisions as may be deficient or not in the King's stores, to complete the rations of the troops dependants; those in the King's employ, and their respective families, according to the allowance made by the regulations of Spain; the reimbursement thereof remaining subject to the decision of the Governments of Spain and the United States.

[An inventory of the provisions in possession of the Spanish commissary to be forthwith furnished. The rations allowed subject to the limitation in the fourth article.]

9th. The provisions actually existing in the King's stores of Pensacola and Barancas shall be transported to the former, in order that they may serve for the said supply of rations.

[Approved.]

10th. An inventory, and a duplicate thereof, shall be made by the military storekeeper, and such officer of artillery as the commandant of this corps may name, and such other as may be appointed by the General of the troops of the United States, of the artillery, powder, military stores, and other effects belonging to this department, in Pensacola, and Barancas.

[Approved. Major Peters, of the artillery, appointed on the part of the American Government.]

11th. Persons and property shall be respected; concessions and sales of land made by the competent authorities shall be valid and guaranteed by the American Government at whatever time they may have been made, and until the date hereof.

[All titles legally derived from the Crown of Spain, prior to this date, guarantied and respected.]

12th. The commandant of engineers shall name an officer, who, with another whom the General of the American army may appoint, shall make an inventory, and a duplicate thereof, of the number and state of the royal edifices, in the same manner as is stated for the department of artillery.

[Approved, and Lieutenant Sands of the artillery appointed on the part of the American Government.]

13th. The military officers, and those in the service of all and the several departments, may embark with them their wives, children, and servants; in which number are to be included the families of those of the said classes who may be absent. Those who have property to dispose of, or affairs to settle, may remain the time necessary for these purposes. American authority shall afford them every protection during their stay, and they shall enjoy the same privileges as the rest of the garrison, and be transported to the Havana on account of the United States.

[Inadmissible, so far as it regards transportation being allowed to the families of those officers not present, and servants not attending upon the persons of the officers and their families. Those individuals disposed to remain in Florida will be respected, and protected in all civil and personal rights; and, if not embracing the transportation allowed at the present period, they must furnish their own at a future period.]

14th. The storekeeper general shall form an inventory of the small vessels and craft, and of the other effects under his charge, in the same way as stated for the department of artillery.

[Approved, and Lieutenant Parkhurst, quartermaster of artillery, appointed on behalf of the American Government.]

15th. The officers and troops of this garrison, with their equipage, shall be transported to Pensacola, where they shall remain, as already stated, until embarked for the Havana.

[Approved.]

17th. The Alabama chief, with his family, now in this fort, and who has been reported to Major Young, shall be included in this capitulation, and transported to the Havana.

[Approved. His name to be entered in an article, and the Spanish Government guarantying that he never returns to the Floridas.]

18th. The Catholic religion shall be maintained, with its ministers, and free exercise.

[A free toleration to all religions guaranteed.]

19th. This capitulation is made under the confidence that the General of the American troops will comply with his offer of returning integral this province, in the state of which he receives it, as explained in his official letters.

[Approved, and the restoration made under the conditions expressed in General Jackson's communication to the Governor of Pensacola, the 23d of May.]

20th. If any doubt should arise as to the meaning of the articles of this capitulation, they shall be construed in the manner most favorable to the Spanish garrison.

[The above articles to be interpreted agreeably to their literal and expressed meaning.]

21st. The present capitulation shall be signed and exchanged by the General of the American army and the commandant of this province, as soon as possible, and, at latest, by five o'clock in the afternoon; each party respectively being in possession of an original.—[Approved.]

PORT OF SAN CARLOS DE BARANCAS,
May 28, 1818.—7 o'clock in the morning.

JOSE MAZOT.

CAMP NEAR FORT BARANCAS, May 28, 1818.
A. JACKSON, Maj. Gen. comd'g.

Additional articles, which are to have the same force as the primary, and which extend to the fulfilment of what has been agreed upon.

1st. The name required of the Alabama chief is Opayhola. The commandant of this province engages, in the name of his Government, that the said chief shall never return to the Floridas.

[Approved.]

2d. If any vessels of war of His Catholic Majesty, destined for this port, should arrive with a supply of provisions or money, they shall be freely admitted, as well as Spanish merchant vessels.

SAN CARLOS DE BARANCAS,

May 28, 1818.—5 o'clock in the afternoon.

JOSE MAZOT.

CAMP, NEAR FORT BARANCAS, May 28, 1818.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adjutant General's Office, Barancas,
May 29, 1818.

FELLOW SOLDIERS: You were called into the field to punish savages and negroes, who had, in a sanguinary manner, used the tomahawk and scalping-knife upon our helpless citizens upon the frontier. You have pursued them to Mickaskey, St. Mark's, Suwaney, and lastly to this place, through an unexplored wilderness, encountering immense difficulties and privations, which you met with the spirit of American soldiers, without a murmur.

Your General anticipated a close of the campaign on his return to Fort Gadsden, and hailed the hour with feelings of gratitude to Heaven, at the prospect of relieving you from your labors, by placing you in quarters, and returning you to your homes; but how great was the disappointment, when he heard of the recent murders committed on the Alabama, by a party of the enemy from Pensacola, where they were furnished with provisions and ammunition by a friendly Power. Under this state of things, you were marched here, encountering difficulties which you alone can properly appreciate, meeting on the way the protest of the Governor of West Florida, threatening to employ force if we did not immediately evacuate the country. This new and unexpected enemy was soon taught to feel the impotence of his threats. You entered Pensacola without resistance, and the strong fortress of the Barancas could hold out but one day against your determined courage. Your General cannot help admiring the spirit and military zeal manifested, when it was signified that a resort to storming would be necessary; and would do injustice to his feelings, did he not particularly notice the judgment displayed by his aid-de-camp, Captain Gadsden of the engineers, in the selection of the positions for the batteries, and the gallantry of his second aid, Captain McCall, and Captain Young of the topographical engineers, in aiding him to erect the works, under the fire of heavy batteries within four hundred yards, as well as the skill and gallantry of Captain Peters, Lieutenants Minton and Spencer, in the direction and management of the nine pounder, and that of Lieutenants Sands and Scallon, charged with the management of the howitzer. Captain McKeever, of the navy, merits, as he has on several occasions, his warmest thanks for his zealous co-operation and activity in landing two of his guns, (should an additional battering train have been necessary,) and gallantly offering to lay his vessel before the water battery, in the event of storming the upper works; his officers and crew deserve his confidence.

The General assigns to Colonel King the government of Pensacola and its dependencies, and that part of the 7th department lying west of the Appalachicola and Chatahoochee rivers, until otherwise ordered by General Gaines.

The Colonel will take measures to have the volunteers now at Pensacola relieved, preparatory to their return march. The Tennessee volunteers will be rationed for five days, and will forthwith move for Fort Montgomery, where they will receive further orders.

The General, in taking leave of Colonel King and his command, tenders to the officers and soldiers an affectionate farewell.

By order: ROBERT BUTLER,
Adjutant General.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
May 29, 1818.

Major General Andrew Jackson has found it necessary to take possession of Pensacola; he has not been prompted to this measure from a wish to extend the territorial limits of the United States, or from any unfriendly feeling on the part of the American Republic to the Spanish Government. The Seminole Indians, inhabiting the territories of Spain, have, for more than two years past, visited our frontier settlements with all the horrors of savage massacre; helpless women have been butchered, and the cradle stained with the blood of innocence. These atrocities, it was expected, would have early attracted the attention of the Spanish Government, and, faithful to existing treaties, speedy measures adopted for their suppression. That, so far from being able to control, the Spanish authorities were often compelled, from policy or necessity, to issue munitions of war to these savages: thus enabling, if not exciting, them to raise the tomahawk against us. The immutable laws of self-defence, therefore, compelled the American Government to take possession of such parts of the Floridas in which the Spanish authority could not be maintained. Pensacola was found in that situation, and will be held until Spain can furnish military strength sufficient to enforce existing treaties. Spanish subjects will be respected; Spanish laws will govern in all cases affecting property and person; a free toleration to all religions guaranteed, and trade alike to all nations.

Colonel King will assume the command of Pensacola, as military and civil Governor. The

15th Con. 2d Sess.—71

Spanish laws, so far as they affect personal rights and property will be enforced. Colonel King will take possession of the archives of the province, and appoint some confidential individual to preserve them. It is all important that the record of titles and property should be carefully secured. He will cause an inquiry to be made into all the landed property belonging to the King of Spain, and hold possession of it. The claims to property, within the range of gunshot of Fort St. Charles de Barancas, will be scrupulously examined into; and, should this prove valid, a rent allowed, but possession in nowise given. This property is necessary for the United States, and under its laws may be held, and an equivalent paid. The revenue laws of the United States will be established, and Captain Gadsden appointed to act as collector; with full power to nominate such sub-officers as, in his opinion, will be necessary to the faithful discharge of the trust reposed in him. He will apply to the Governor of Pensacola for military aid in all cases where it may be necessary to correct attempts at an illicit trade.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. com. Div. of the South.

Minutes of the proceedings of a special court, organized agreeably to the following order, viz:

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adjutant General's Office,
Fort St. Marks, April 26, 1818.
GENERAL ORDER.

The following detail will compose a special court, to convene at this post, at the hour of 12 o'clock M, for the purpose of investigating the charges against A. Arbuthnot, Robert Christy Ambrister, and such others who are similarly situated, as may be brought before it:

The court will record all the documents and testimony in the several cases; and their opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoners; and what punishment, if any, should be inflicted.

DETAIL.

Major General E. P. GAINES, President.
Members.

Colonel King, 4th infantry,
Colonel Williams, Tennessee volunteers,
Lieut. Colonel Gibson, Tennessee volunteers,
Major Muhlenburg, 4th infantry,
Major Montgomery, 7th infantry,
Captain Vashon, 7th infantry,
Colonel Dyer, Tennessee volunteers,
Lieut. Col. Lindsay, corps of artillery,
Lieut. Col. Elliott, Tennessee volunteers,
Major Fanning, corps of artillery,
Major Minton, Georgia militia,
Captain Crittenden, Kentucky volunteers,
Lieut. J. M. Glassell, 4th infantry, Recorder.

An orderly will be detailed from General Gaines's brigade; and the court will sit without regard to hours.

By order of Major General JACKSON:
ROBERT BUTLER, Adj. Gen.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 26, 1818.

The court convened pursuant to the foregoing order; when, being duly sworn in the presence of the prisoner, and he being asked if he had any objection to any member thereof, and replying in the negative, the following charges and specifications were read, viz:

Charges vs. A. Arbuthnot, now in custody, who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1st. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens; he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

Specification. That the said A. Arbuthnot, between the months of May and July, or some time in June, 1817, wrote a letter to the Little Prince, exhorting and advising him not to comply with the Treaty of Fort Jackson, stating that the citizens of the United States were infringing on the Treaty of Ghent, as he believed, without the knowledge of the Chief Magistrate of the United States; and advising the Upper and the Lower Creeks to unite and be friendly; stating that William Hamby was the cause of their disputes. Also, advising the Little Prince to write to the Governor of New Providence, who would write to His Majesty the Prince Regent, through whom the United States would be called to a compliance with the Treaty of Ghent; and advising not to give up their lands under the Treaty of Fort Jackson, for that the American citizens would be compelled to give up to them all their lands under the Treaty of Ghent.

CHARGE 2d. Acting as a spy, and aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy—supplying them with the means of war.

Specification 1st. In writing a letter from St. Mark's fort, dated the 2d April, 1818, to his son John, at Suwanee, (marked A,) detailing the advance of the army under General Jackson, stating their force, probable movements and intentions, to be communicated to Bowlegs, the chief of the Suwanee towns, for his government.

Specification 2d. In writing the letters, marked B (without date) and C, with enclosures of January 27, 1818; and D, called "a Note of Indian Talks;" and E, without date, applying to the British Government, through Governor Cameron, for munitions of war, and assistance for our enemies, making false representations. And also applying to Mr. Bagot, British Ambassador, for his interference, with a statement on the back of one of the letters of munitions of war for the enemy.

CHARGE 3d. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hamby and Edmund Doyle, and causing their arrest, with a view to their condemnation to death; and the seizure of their property, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain and the United States and the Indians, they being citizens of the Spanish Government.

Specification 1st. In writing the letters marked F, dated the 26th August, 1817; G, dated the 13th May, 1817; and H, threatening them with death, alleging against them false and infamous charges, and using every means in his power to procure their arrest; all which writings and sayings excited, and had a tendency to excite, the negroes and Indians to acts of hostility with the United States. By order of the court:

J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

To which charges and specifications the prisoner pleaded not guilty.

The prisoner having made application for counsel, it was granted him; when the court proceeded to the examination of the evidence.

JOHN WINSLETT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that some time before last July the Little Prince received a letter, signed by Mr. Arbuthnot, advising the upper part of the nation to unite with the lower chiefs in amity; and stating that the best mode for them to repossess themselves of their lands would be to write to him, Arbuthnot, and he would send on their complaints to the Governor of Providence, whence it would be forwarded to His Britannic Majesty, and he would have the terms of the Treaty of Ghent attended to; he, moreover, stated his belief that the encroachments on the Indian lands were unknown to the President of the United States; the witness also identified the signature of the letter of the prisoner to his son, (marked A,) referred to in the first specification to the second charge, and heretofore noted as being the same with that sent to the Little Prince.

The witness, on being further interrogated, stated the language of the letter alluded to to be, that the British Government, on application would cause to be restored to them their lands they held in 1811, agreeably to the terms of the Treaty of Ghent.

Question by the prisoner. Who is the Little Prince, or is he known by any other name?

Answer. He is known by the name of Tus-tenuk-ke Hopin, and is the second chief of the nation.

Question by the prisoner. Where is the letter you allude to, or in whose possession?

Answer. It was left in the possession of the Little Prince when I last saw it.

Question by the prisoner. Has this Little Prince no other name than what you state?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question by the prisoner. Do you swear that the letter alluded to was addressed to the Little Prince?

Answer. I do not. It was presented me by the Little Prince to read and interpret for him, which I did.

Question by the prisoner. Are you certain that the letter stated that the Chief Magistrate of the United States could have had no knowledge of settlements made on Indian lands, or injuries committed?

Answer. The letter stated that to be the belief of the writer.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, with regard to the first specification of the second charge, that, being at Suwanee, in the towns, about the 6th or 7th of April, he was awakened early in the morning by Mr. Ambrister's receiving, by the hands of a negro, who got it from an Indian, a letter from St. Mark's, at that time stated by Ambrister to be from the prisoner.

Question by the prisoner. Did you see that letter, or hear it read?

Answer. I did see the paper, but did not hear it read.

Question by the prisoner. Did you state that the letter was received by an Indian express?

Answer. So the black man that delivered it said.

A question being raised by a member of the court as to their jurisdiction on the third charge and its specifications, the doors were closed, and, after mature deliberation, they decided that this court are incompetent to take cognizance of the offences alleged in that charge and specifications.

PETER B. COOK, a former clerk to the prisoner, and a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, that, about December or January last, the prisoner had a large quantity of powder and lead brought to Suwanee in his vessel, which he sold to the Indians and negroes; that, subsequent to that time, which he cannot recollect, Ambrister brought for the prisoner, in his (the prisoner's) vessel, nine kegs of powder and a large quantity of lead, which were taken possession of by the negroes; the witness also identified the following letters referred to in the foregoing charges and specifications, marked A, B, C, D, E, F, G, and H, as being the prisoner's handwriting; also the power of attorney, No. 1, granted by the Indians to A. Arbuthnot.

From A. Arbuthnot to his son, John Arbuthnot.

FORT ST. MARK'S, APRIL 2, 1818,

9 o'clock in the morning.

DEAR JOHN: As I am ill able to write a long letter, it is necessary to be brief. Before my arrival here, the commandant had received an express from the Governor of Pensacola, informing him of a large embarkation of troops, &c., under the immediate command of General Jackson; and the boat that brought the despatch reckoned eighteen sail of vessels off Appalachicola. By a deserter that was brought here by the Indians, the commandant was informed that three thousand men, under the orders of General Jackson; one thousand foot and one thousand six hundred horse, under General Gaines; five hundred under another General; were at Prospect Bluff, where they are rebuilding the burnt fort. That one thousand Indians of different nations were at Spanish Bluff building another fort, under the direction of American officers; that, as soon as these forts were built, they intended to march—they have commenced. Yesterday morning advice was received that they had appeared near —, and two of the sons of McQueen and an Indian. Late in the afternoon three schooners came to anchor at the mouth of the river; and this morning the American flag is seen flying on the largest. I am blocked here; no Indians will come with me; and I am now suffering from the fatigue of coming here alone.

The main drift of the Americans is to destroy the black population of Suwanee. Tell my friend Bowleck that it is throwing away his people to attempt to resist such a powerful force as will be down on Suwanee; and as the troops advance by land, so will the vessels by sea. Endeavor to get all the goods over the river to a place of security, as also the skins of all sorts; the corn must be left to its fate. So soon as the Suwanee is destroyed, I expect the Americans will be satisfied and retire; this is only my opinion; but I think it is conformable to the demand made by General Gaines of King Hatchy some months since. In fact, do all you can to save all you can; save the books particularly. It is probable the commandant will receive some communication from the vessels to-day, when he will know more certainly what are their motives in coming off the fort. I think it is only to shut the passage to the Indians. Twenty canoes went down the river yesterday, and were forced to return. The road between this and the Mickasukee is said to be stopped. Hillis Hadjo and Himathlo Mico were here last night to hear what vessels; they will remove all their cattle and effects across St. Mark's river this morning, and perhaps wait near thereto for the event.

I have been as brief as I can, to give you the substance of what appears facts that cannot be doubted. To enter into details in the present moment is useless. If the schooner is returned, get all the goods on board of her, and let her start off for Mount-ater creek, in the bottom of Cedar Key bay. You will there only have the skins to hide away. But no delay must take place, as the vessels will no doubt follow the land army; and perhaps even now some have gone round. I pray your strictest attention, for the more that is saved will be eventually more to your interest.

Let the bearer have as much calico as will make him two shirts for his trouble. He has promised to deliver this in three, but I give him four days. I am yours, affectionately,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

From A. Arbuthnot to Charles Cameron, Governor of Bahamas.

SIR: Being empowered by the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to represent the state of their nation to your excellency, that you may be pleased to forward the same for the information of His Majesty's Government, to whom alone they look for protection against the aggressions and encroachments of the Americans, I beg leave to submit to your excellency the enclosed representations, humbly praying that your excellency will be pleased to take an early opportunity of forwarding the same to Great Britain.

I am also instructed by Bowleck, chief of the Suwanee, to make the demand herein enclosed; he never having had any share of the presents distributed at Prospect Bluff, though he rendered equally essential services as any of the other chiefs to the British cause, while at war with America; and was at New Orleans with a part of his warriors. His frontiers being more exposed to the predatory incursions of the back Georgians, who enter his territory and drive off his cattle, he is obliged to have large parties out to watch their motions and prevent their plundering; and, being deficient of ammunition, he prays your excellency will grant his small demand.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

Humbly submitting the same, I have the honor to be, your excellency's most humble servant,

A. A.

First. We beg leave to represent that Edmund Doyle and William Hambly, lately clerks at Prospect Bluff to Messrs. Forbes, &c., and who still reside on the Appalachicola river, we consider as the principal cause of our present troubles and uneasiness. Hambly was the instrumental cause of the fort at Prospect Bluff being destroyed by the Americans, by which we lost the supplies intended for our future wars. Since then both these men have kept emissaries among us, tending to harass and disturb our repose, and that of our brethren of the Middle and Upper nation; they spread among us reports that the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are descending to drive us off our lands; they equally propagate false.

From A. Arbuthnot to Benjamin Moodie, enclosing letters to Charles Bagot, Esquire, British Minister at Washington.

SHAWNEE, CREEK NATION,
January 27, 1818.

SIR: The enclosed, containing matter of serious moment, and demanding the immediate attention of his excellency the British Ambassador, I trust he will, for this time, forgive the trifling expense of postage, which I have endeavored to prevent as much as possible by compressing much matter in one sheet of paper. Should you, sir, be put to any trouble or expense, by this trouble I give you, by being made acquainted with the same, I will instruct B. M. Dunshee, & Co., to order payment of the same.

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

From A. Arbuthnot to the Honorable Charles Bagot.

SIR: It is with pain I again obtrude myself upon your excellency's notice; but the pressing solicitations of the chiefs of the Creek nation, and the deplorable situation in which they are placed by the wanton aggressions of the Americans, I trust your excellency will take as a sufficient apology for the present intrusion.

In August last, the head chief of the Seminole Indians received a letter from General Gaines, of which I have taken the liberty of annexing your excellency the contents as delivered me by the chief's head English interpreter, with King Hatchy's reply thereto.

This letter appears to have been intended to sound the disposition of the chief, and ascertain the force necessary to overrun the nation; for, from then, until the actual attack was made on Fowltown, the same General, with General Jackson, seem to have been collecting troops and settling in various quarters.

If your excellency desires to have further information respecting the situation of this country and its inhabitants, I can, from time to time, inform your excellency of such facts and circumstances as are stated to me by chiefs of known veracity, or which may come under my own observation; and your excellency's order, addressed to me at New Providence, will either find me there, or be forwarded me to this country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, your excellency's most obedient servant,

A. A.

The following memorandum was on the back of the foregoing letter:

King Hatchy, 1,000; Boleck, 1,500; Oso Hatjo Choctawhachy, 500; Himashy Miso Chattichy, 500; at present with Hillisajo —; at present under arms, 1,000 and more; attacking those Americans who have made inroads on their territory.

A quantity of gunpowder, lead, muskets, and flints, sufficient to arm one thousand or two thousand men.

Muskets, 1,000; arms smaller, if possible.

10,000 flints, a proportion of rifle put up separate.

50 casks gunpowder, a proportion for rifle.

2,000 knives, six to nine inch blade, good quality.

1,000 tomahawks.

100 pounds vermilion.

2,000 pounds lead, independent of ball for musket.

KING HATCHY,
BOLECK.

From General Gaines to the Seminole Chief.

Your Seminoles are very bad people; I don't say whom. You have murdered many of my people, and stolen my cattle and many good horses, that cost me money; and many good houses that cost me money you have burnt for me; and now, that you see my writing, you'll think I have spoken right. I know it is so; you know it is so; for now you may say I will go upon you at random; but just give me the murderers, and I will show them my law; and, when that is finished and past, if you will come about any of my people, you will see your friends; and, if you see me, you will see your friend. But there is something out in the sea—a bird with a forked tongue—whip him back before he lands, for he will be the ruin of you yet. Perhaps you do not understand who or what I mean—I mean the name of Englishman.

I tell you this, that if you do not give me up the murderers who murdered my people, I say I have got good strong warriors, with scalping-knives and tomahawks. You harbor a great many of my black people among you at Sawwahnee. If you give me leave to go by you against them, I shall not hurt anything belonging to you.

GENERAL GAINES.

To the SEMINOLE CHIEF.

From King Hatchy to General Gaines, in answer to the foregoing.

You charge me with killing your people, stealing your cattle, and burning your houses; it is I that have cause to complain of the Americans. While one American has been justly killed, while in the act of stealing cattle, more than four Indians while hunting have been murdered by these lawless freebooters. I harbor no negroes. When the Englishmen were at war with America, some took shelter among them; and it is for you white people to settle those things among yourselves, and not trouble us with what we know nothing about. I shall use force to stop any armed Americans from passing my towns or my lands.

KING HATCHY.

To General E. P. GAINES.

Note of Indian Talks.

In August, Capp had a letter from General Gaines, in substance as annexed, No. 1; and returned the answer, as by No. 2: nothing further was said on either side. The end of October, a party of Americans from a fort on Flint river surrounded Fowltown during the night, and began burning it. The Indians then in it fled to the swamp, and in their flight had three persons killed by fire from the Americans; they rallied their people, and forced the Americans to retire some distance, but not before they had two more persons killed. The Americans built a blockhouse or fort where they had fallen back to, and immediately sent to the fort up the country for assistance, stating the Indians were the aggressors; and also settled with Inhemocklo, for the loss his people had suffered; at the same time sending a talk to King Hatchy, by a head man, Apiny, that he would put things in such a train as to prevent further encroachments, and get those Americans to leave the fort. But no sooner was the good talk given, and before the bearer of it returned home, than hundreds of Americans came pouring down on the Indians, roused them to a sense of their own danger, they flew to arms, and have been compelled to support them ever since. It is not alone from the country, but by vessels entering Appalachicola river with troops, and settlers are pouring into the Indian territory, and, if permitted to continue, will soon overrun the whole of the Indian lands. From the talk sent King Hatchy, by Governor Mitchell, I am in hopes that those aggressions of the Americans on the Indian territory are not countenanced by the American Government, but originate with men devoid of principle, who set laws and instructions at defiance, and stick at no cruelty and oppression to obtain their ends. Against such oppressions the American Government must use not only all their influence, but, if necessary, force, or their names will be handed down to posterity as a nation more cruel and savage to the unfortunate aborigines of this country, than ever were the Spaniards in more dark ages to the nations of South America.

The English Government, as the special protectors of the Indian nations, and on whom alone they rely for assistance, ought to step forward and save those unfortunate people from ruin. And as you, sir, are appointed to watch over their interests, it is my duty as an Englishman, and the only one in this part of the Indian nation, to instruct you of the talks the chiefs bring me for your information; and I sincerely trust, sir, you will use the powers you are vested with for the service and protection of those unfortunate people, who look up to you as their saviour. I have written General Mitchell, who I hear is an excellent man, and, as he acts as Indian agent, I hope his influence will stop the torrent of innovators, and give peace and quietness to the Creek nation.

I pray your excellency will pardon this intrusion, which nothing but the urgency of the case would have induced me to make.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

A. A.

From Cappichimieco and Boleck to Governor Cameron.

It is with pain we are again obliged to obtrude ourselves on your excellency's notice, in consequence of the cruel war we have been forced into by the irruptions of the Americans into the heart of our lands. It will be first necessary to state to your excellency, that one head chief, Kinhiyah, received a letter from General Gaines in August last; a copy of which is enclosed, with the answer returned thereto. This letter only appears to have been a prelude to plans determined on by the said General and General Jackson, to bring on troops and settlers to drive us from our lands, and take possession of them; for, in the end of October, a party of Americans surrounded Fowltown during the night, and in the morning began setting fire to it, making the unfortunate inhabitants fly to the swamp, and who in their flight had three persons killed by the fire of the Americans. Our Indians rallying, drove the Americans from the town, but in their exertions had two more of their people killed. The Americans retired some distance, and built a fort or blockhouse to protect themselves, until the assistance they had sent for to the fort up the country should arrive. A letter falling into the hands of General Mitchell, the Indian agent, which states the Indians to have been the aggressors, he suspected its truth, and, on inquiry, found it was the reverse; in consequence, he made satisfaction to Inhinoothla, the chief of Fowltown, and his people, for the injuries they had sustained: at the same time, he desired a talk to be sent to our head chief, stating his wish to see all the Indians friends, and that in twenty days he would send and get the Americans to retire from the forts. But this has had no effect on the lawless invaders of our soil; for before the bearer of our talks could return home, he met hundreds of Americans descending on us. They have also settlers and troops which come from Mobile, and go up the Appalachicola river. Thus, seeing no end to those inroads, necessity compels us to have recourse to arms; and our brethren are now fighting for the lands they inherited from their fathers, for their families and friends.

But what will our exertions do without assistance? Our sinews of war are almost spent; and harassed as we have been for years, we have not been able to lay by the means for our extraordinary wants; and to whom can we look up to for protection and support, but to those friends who have at all former times held forth their hands to uphold us, and who have sworn in their late treaty with the Americans to see our just rights and privileges respected and protected from insult and aggression? We now call on your excellency, as the representative of our good father King George, to send us such aid in ammunition as we are absolutely in want of; and, as our brother chief, Hillisajo, was informed, when in England, that when ammunition was wanted to enable us to protect our just rights, that your excellency would supply us with what was necessary. We have applied to the Spanish officer at the fort of St. Mark's, but his small supply prevented his being able to assist us, and we have only on your excellency to depend. We likewise pray your excellency would be pleased to send an officer or person to lead us right, and to apportion the supply you may be pleased to send us agreeably to our proper wants.

In paying your excellency will lend an ear to our demand, and despatch it without delay, we remain your excellency's faithful and most obedient friends and servants,

CAPPICHIMICCO,
BOLECK,

For ourselves and all the other chiefs of the Lower Creek nation.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to Colonel Edwards Nicholls.

NASSAU, N. P. August 26, 1817.

SIR: Especially authorized by the chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names I affix to the present, I am desired to address you, that you may lay their complaint before His Majesty's Government. They desire it to be made known that they have implicitly followed your advice in living friendly with the Americans who were their neighbors, and have attempted to molest them, though they have seen the Americans encroach on their territory, burning their towns, and making fields where their houses stood. Rather than make resistance they have retired lower in the peninsula. The town of Eahallaway, on the Chatahoochee, where Olismicco was chief, is one instance of the encroachments of the Americans. This town is situated under the guns of Fort Gaines; and Micco was desired to submit to the Americans or his town would be blown to atoms. Rather than do so, he retired, and is now living in the lower nation, and his fields, and even where the town stood, is ploughed up by the Americans. They complain of the English Government neglecting them, after having drawn them into a war with America; that you, sir, have not kept your promise of sending people to reside among them; and that if they have not some person or persons resident in the nation to watch over their interest, they will soon be driven to the extremity of the peninsula. You left Mr. Hambly to watch over the interest of the Creek nation, but you had hardly left the nation when he turned traitor, and was led by Forbes to take the part of the Americans. His letter to me, of which I annex you a copy, will show you what length he could go if he had the means. It is Hambly and Doyle who give the Indians all the trouble they experience. They send their emissaries among the Lower Creeks, and make them believe the Cowetas, aided by the Americans, are coming to destroy them. Thus both are put in fear, and their fields are neglected, and hunting is not thought of. I have endeavored to do away this fear, by writing the chief of the Coweta towns that they ought to live on friendly terms with their brethren of the lower nation, whose wishes were to be on good terms with them, and not to listen to any bad talks, but to chase those that give them from among them. My letter was answered from them rather favorably; and I hope the talk that was sent to the Big Warrior last June will heal the difference between them. Hillisajo arrived in my schooner at the Ocklocknee Sound last June, and was well received by all the chiefs and others who came to welcome him home. In consequence of his arrival a talk was held, the substance of which was put on paper for them; and it was sent, with a pipe of peace, to the other nations. Hillisajo wished to return to Nassau with me, but I prevailed on him to stay in the nation, and keep them at peace. I regret, sir, to notice this poor man's affairs, though, by his desire, it appeared that he arrived at Nassau a short time after I had left it in January, and Captain W. being here took charge of him, his goods, and money, prevailing on the Governor to let him stay with him until he went down to the nation, which it was his intention to do. Of the money received of Governor Cameron, he had only given him eighty dollars, by Captain W. a barrel of sugar, a bag of coffee, and a small keg of rum. And the interpreter, Thugart, informed that when Hillisajo asked for an account, Captain W. refused it, saying it would be useless to a man who could not read. He also misses two cases; one of which contains, he thinks, crockery. I have made inquiry of His Majesty's ordnance storekeeper, and he informs me the whole were delivered to Captain W.; they are, therefore, lost to Hillisajo.

I am desired to return Hillisajo's warmest acknowledgments for the very handsome manner you treated him in England, and he begs his prayer may be laid at the foot of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent. I left him and all his family well on the 20th June. Old Cappichimicco desires me to send his best respects, and requests that you will send out some people to live among them, and all the land they took from Forbes shall be theirs; at all events, they must have an agent among them to see that the Americans adhere to the treaty, and permit them to live unmolested on their own lands. This agent should be authorized by His Majesty's Government, or he will not be attended to by the Americans. In the gazettes of Georgia the Americans report the Seminole Indians are continually committing murders on their borders, and making incursions into the State. These are fabrications, tending to irritate the American Government against the poor Indians; for, during the time I was in the nation, there was only one American killed, and he with two others were in the act of driving off cattle belonging to Bowlegs, chief of Suwanee; whereas, three men and a boy were killed last June by a party of American cattle stealers, while in their hunting camps; the boy they scalped, and one of Bowlegs' head men was killed in St. John's river, in July. The backwood Georgians, and those resident on the borders of the Indian nation, are continually entering it, and driving off cattle. They have, in some instances, made settlements, and particularly on the Choctahatchy river, where a considerable number have descended.

By the treaty with Great Britain, the Americans were to give up to the Indians all the lands that may have been taken from them during the war, and place them on the same footing they were in 1811. It appears they have not done so; that Fort Gaines, on the Chatahoochee, and Camp Crawford, on the Flint river, are both on Indian territory, that was not in possession of America in 1811. They are fearful that, before any aid is given by the English Government, they will no longer be in possession of any territory. I wrote last January to his excellency the honorable Charles Bagot, respecting the encroachments of the Americans, as I was informed, by the copy of a letter from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, handed me by his excellency Governor Cameron, that His Majesty's Ambassador had received orders to watch over the interests of the Indians. Since my return here I have received of Mr. Moodie, of Charleston, an extract of a letter from the honorable Charles Bagot, that the expense of postage is so considerable, any further communications of the same nature must be sent him by private hands. Now, sir, as no person goes from this direct to Washington, how am I to be able to comply with his desire? Thus he will be kept ignorant of the situation of the poor Indians, and the encroachments daily made on their lands by the American settlers, while he may be told by the American Government that no encroachments have been made, and that the forts they still hold are necessary to check the unruly Seminoles. Thus the person appointed to watch over the interest of the Indians having no other means of information than from the parties interested in their destruction, and seeing, from time to time, in the American gazettes, accounts of cruel murders, &c., committed by the Indians on the frontier settlements of the United States, he apprehends the Indians merit all the Americans do to them.

But let His Majesty's Government appoint an agent, with full powers to correspond with His Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, and his eyes will then be opened as to the motives of that influence, American individuals as well as the Government, in vilifying the Indians.

The power given me, and the instructions, were to memorialize His Majesty's Government, as well as the Governor General at Havana; but if you will be pleased to lay this letter before His Majesty's Secretary of State, it will save the necessity of the first; and I fear that a memorial to the Governor General would be of no use.

Referring you to the answer, I am, &c.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

To Lieut. Col. EDWARD NICHOLLS.

G.

From A. Arbuthnot to William Hambly.

OCKLOCKNEE SOUND, May 3, 1817.

SIR: On my return home, this day, I received a letter signed by you, and dated 23d March. As you therein take the liberty of advising me, as you say, by order of the chiefs of the Creek nation, I am glad of, and shall embrace this opening you gave me, and reply to you at some length; and, sir, let me premise that, when you lived at Prospect Bluff, a clerk to Messrs. Forbes & Co., you did not consider Cappichimicco, McQueen, or any other of the chiefs of the lower nation, as outlaws, nor have they ever been considered as such by the English Government, who are the especial protectors of the Indian nation; and it ill becomes Mr. Hambly to call Cappichimicco an outlaw, that man who has ever been his friend, and by his authority has prolonged his life. Yet, sir, the young chiefs and warriors of the Creek nation, considering you as the chief cause of their troubles, would have long ere this had possession of you, and perhaps with your life made you pay the forfeit for the injuries heaped on them, had not that man, who has been your friend from your early youth, stepped in as your protector. Yes, this is the man who Mr. Hambly presumes to call an outlaw. A pardoned villain, when going to the gallows, would bless the hand that saved his life; but Mr. Hambly blasphemes his saviour.

As Mr. Hambly's generous friend is the principal cause of my being in this country, as an honest man I shall endeavor to fulfil my promise to him and the other chiefs. The guilty alone have fear; an honest and upright man dreads no danger, fears no evil, as he commits no ill; and your arm of justice ought to be applied where it would rightly fall on the heads of the really guilty. Your mean and vile insinuations, that have been the cause of thefts and murders, come ill from him who has been the cause of the murder of hundreds. Though your usage was made villanous at the fort, yet your revenge was too savage and sanguinary. If your conduct, sir, to the Indians were guided by as pure motives as mine, you would endeavor to influence them, and respect each other as brothers, and live in harmony and friendship, cultivating their lands in Summer, and taking their diversions of hunting in Winter, respecting their neighbors, and making yourselves respected by them. If thus, sir, you would act, (and by your knowledge of their language you have much more in your power than any other man.) you would then be the true friend of the Indians. Were I an instigator of thefts and murder, would I hold the language I have done to the chiefs and others who have called on me? Ask the lieutenant commanding at Fort Gaines, if my letter to him breathed the strains of murder? Ask Opy Hatchy, or Dany, his interpreter, if the recomendatory note I sent him by order of Apiny, could be written by an instigator of murder? Ask Apiny himself if my language to him was that of a murderer? Ask Mappalitchy, a chief residing among the Americans on Oakmulgee, if my language and advice to him favored that of a murderer? All those and every Indian who has heard my talks, will contradict your vile assertions.

But Mappalitchy has given me a clue by which I can unravel from whence the aspersions come, not from Apiny, Hatchy, or any of the chiefs of the upper towns, but from him who endeavors to lead them to mischief and quarrels with each other.

Did not the chiefs hear my note read with respect, and perfectly according to my sentiments of being all as brethren, uniting in the bonds of friendship and love? Did not they agree to smoke the pipe of peace with their brethren of the lower nation, and live in future as brothers? What made some of them alter their minds afterwards? The interference of a humane man, who counsels them to write me, demanding my removal from a bang of outlaws, and which letter is signed "William Hambly."

I shall only make one more observation, and that will show from whence I came, and whether I came among the Indians as a revenger or as the friend of peace and harmony.

In the Spring of 1816, Mr. Hambly sent Governor Cameron a letter, containing talks of the chiefs of the Indian nations; they were forwarded to England, and his excellency handed me, on my leaving Providence, an answer thereto from the right honorable Earl Bathurst, one of His Majesty's chief Secretaries of State, that I might make the same known to the chiefs on my arrival in the nation. What will Governor Cameron think of the man who, in 1816, could write against the encroachments of the Americans on the Indian nation, and, in the Spring of 1817, call the chiefs of that nation, for whom he more especially wrote, outlaws? Mr. Hambly may sell his services to America; but no man can expatriate himself from that allegiance due to his native country; and a government may call on a friendly nation to give up a subject that has seriously wronged her. I recommend Mr. Hambly to be content with the douceur he may have received, and permit the unlettered Indian to live quietly and peaceably on his native land.

I shall send a copy of this letter, with the one from you, to be read by the chiefs of this nation, and shall, at the same time, take an opportunity of expressing myself more fully than I did in the note sent by Apiny.

Wishing you a speedy recantation of your errors, and a return to your former way of thinking, I am your obedient servant,

A. ARBUTHNOT.

Letter from A. Arbuthnot to the Governor of Havana.

The chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are hereunto annexed, beg leave to approach your excellency, and represent their complaints. Long imposed on by the persons keeping stores in this country, in charging us exorbitant prices for their goods, while they only allow us a very trifling one for our peltry, we have found it necessary to look out for a person that will deal fairly with us, and we wish to establish a store for him on Appalachicola river. We have made application to the commander of St. Mark's, and he referred us to your excellency. It is not alone the imposition that has been practised upon us, that has made us presume to address your excellency; we have complaints of a more serious nature against the persons employed by the only house that has been established among us, that of Mr. Forbes.

In the first place, some years back, under false pretences, they attempted to rob us of a very large portion of our best lands; and we the more readily acceded to it, from the faithful promise given us that they would get English people to settle it, and live among us, but, far from doing this, Mr. Forbes attempted to sell it to the American Government, and settle it with Americans. Thus finding ourselves deceived and imposed on, we withdrew our grant about three years since, which, from the stipulations contained therein not being fulfilled on the part of Mr. Forbes, we conceived we had a right to do. Secondly, Mr. Doyle and Mr. Hambly, the two persons left in the nation to carry on Mr. Forbes's business, have, for more than two years, been endeavoring to influence us to join the Americans; and finding that fair means would not secure us from our attachments to our ancient friends the English, they have recently had recourse to threats of bringing the Americans down upon us; and that people only want a pretext to attack us, which the said Doyle and Hambly attempt to give them, by spreading false reports of our murdering the Americans, stealing their cattle, and preparing for war against them, while, in fact, it is the Americans who murder our red brethren, steal our cattle by hundreds at a time, and are daily encroaching on our lands, and maintaining the settlers in their ill-gotten possessions by armed force.

On the Choctahatchy river there are a large body of Americans forming settlements, and more are daily joining them. As this river is far within that line marked out by your excellency's Government and the Americans, some years since, (although that line was unknown to us until very lately, and we never gave our sanction, nor, in fact, knew of any sale of our lands made to the Americans,) we trust your excellency will give order to displace them from within the line, and send them back to their own country. Our delaying to address your excellency to represent the forementioned grievances has been owing to the want of a person to attend to our talks, and put them in writing for us. The commander of the fort at St. Mark's has heard all of our talks and complaints. He approves of what we have done and what we are doing; and it is by his recommendation we have thus presumed to address your excellency.

We have the honor to be, &c.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

His Exc'y the GOVERNOR GENERAL, &c.

No. 1.

Power of attorney from the Indian chiefs to A. Arbuthnot.

Know all men by these presents, that we, chiefs of the Creek nation, whose names are affixed to this power, having full faith and confidence in Alexander Arbuthnot, of New Providence, who, knowing all our talks, is fully acquainted with our intentions and wishes, do hereby, by these presents, constitute and appoint him, the said Alexander Arbuthnot, our attorney and agent, with full power and authority to act for us, and in our names, in all affairs relating to our nation, and also to write such letters and papers as to him may appear necessary and proper for our benefit and that of the Creek nation.

Given at Ocklocknee Sound, in the Creek nation, this seventeenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen.

Witness: PETER SHUGERT, Interpreter.

Certified explanation of names and towns to which the foregoing chiefs belong, agreeably to the numbers set opposite thereto.

1. Kiahigee, chief of Mickasukee.
2. Inhemthlo, chief of Fowltown.
3. Charle Tustonoky, second chief of Oakmulgee Town.

4. Chief on the Conholoway, below Fort Gaines.
5. Oponey, chief of the Oakmulgee Town.
6. Chief of the Atlapalga.
7. Chief of the Pallatchacoley.
8. Chief of the Chehaws.
9. Chief of the Red Sticks.
10. Francis, (the prophet.)
11. Peter McQueen, chief of the Tallahasses, (an old Red Stick.)
12. A Red Stick, created chief by the lower towns.

Question by the court. Have you, at any time within the last twelve months, heard any conversation between the prisoner and the chief called Bowlegs, relating to the war between the United States and the Seminoles?

Answer. I heard the prisoner tell Bowlegs that he had sent letters to the Prince Regent, and expected soon to have an answer. Some time afterwards, some of the negroes doubted his carrying those letters, when the prisoner stated that he had, but the distance being great, it would take some time to receive an answer.

By the court. State to the court when and where you first saw the letter signed "A. Arbuthnot," dated April 2, 1818, referred to in the first specification of the second charge.

Answer. About the 6th of April, a black man, who said he had received it from an Indian, gave it to Mr. Ambrister, whom I saw reading it.

Question by the court. Do you know by what means that letter was conveyed to Suwanee?

Answer. I understood by an Indian who was sent from Fort St. Mark's.

Question by the court. Who paid the Indian for carrying the letter referred to in the last interrogatory?

Answer. I do not know.

Question by the court. What steps were taken by the negroes and Indians on the receipt of the letter?

Answer. They first believed the bearer to be an enemy, and confined him; but, learning the contrary, began to prepare for the enemy, and the removal of their families and effects across the river. The Indians lived on the opposite side.

Question by the court. Did the Indians and negroes act together in the performance of military duty?

Answer. No; but they always said they would fight together.

Question by the court. Did not Nero command the blacks, and did not Bowlegs own Nero; and was not the latter under the immediate command of Bowlegs?

Answer. Nero commanded the blacks, and was owned and commanded by Bowlegs; but there were some negro captains who obeyed none but Nero.

Question by the court. What vessel brought to Suwanee the ammunition which you said was sold by the prisoner to the Indians and negroes?

Answer. The schooner Chance, now lying at this wharf. She is a foretopsail vessel, belonging to the prisoner.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

The witness also identified the manuscript of the prisoner on the following documents, viz: No. 1, granting him full power to act in all cases for the Indians, as recorded before; and also a letter, without signature, to the Governor of St. Augustine, numbered 2; and further, a letter, without date, to Mr. Mitchell, the Indian agent, numbered 3; an unsigned petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron, praying his aid in men and munitions of war numbered 4; all of which the witness stated to be in the handwriting of the prisoner.

No. 2.

[Supposed to be from Bowlegs to the Governor of St. Augustine.]

SIR: I had the honor of receiving your letter of September, but the impossibility of finding a person to write an answer to the same is the cause of this apparent neglect.

I shall be very happy to keep up a good understanding and correspondence with you; and hope you will, when occasion offers, advise me of such things as may be of service to myself and people. My warriors and others that go to St. Augustine, return with false reports, tending to harass and distress my people, and preventing them from attending to their usual avocations. At one time, the Americans and Upper Indians, supported by a force of about three thousand men, were running lines far within the Indian territory; at another time, are collecting a force at Fort Mitchell, in the forks of Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, to fall on the towns below.

Now, sir, we know of no reason the Americans can have to attack us, an inoffensive and unoffending people. We have none of their slaves; we have taken none of their property since the Americans made peace with our good father, King George. We have followed the orders of his officer that was with us, Lieut. Colonel Edward Nicholls, and in nowise molested the Americans, though we daily see them encroaching on our territory, stealing our cattle, and murdering and carrying off our people. That same officer also told us, we, as allies to the great King, our father, were included in the treaty of peace between our good father and the Americans; and that the latter were to give up all the territory that had been taken from us before and during the war. Yet, so far from complying with the ninth article of that treaty, they are daily making encroachments on our land, getting persons, who are not known to the chiefs, and, without any power or authority, to grant and sign over lands to them. Thus they deceive the world, and make our very friends believe we are in league with them.

The principal chiefs of the nation, with the head warrior, assembled at my town on the 8th instant, and came to the resolution of informing the British Minister at Washington of the conduct of the Americans and the officers of their Government towards us. It has been done accordingly, and copies sent to England.

We demand of the King, our father, to fix some of his people among us, who may inform him, from time to time, of what is passing, and see the Americans do not extend themselves on our lands.

The Spanish subjects in the Floridas are too much in the interests of the Americans to be our friends. For the Governors, I shall always entertain the greatest regard; but for the people, they do not act so as to merit any esteem and protection. You desire I would chase those marauders who steal my cattle. My people have lately driven some Americans from Lahheway, and I have no doubt the Americans will lay hold of this as a pretext to make war on us, as they have before done, in stating we harbor their runaway slaves.

To DON JOSE COPPINGER,
Governor of St. Augustine.

No. 3.

SIR: King Hatchy, the head chief of the Lower Creek nation, has called on me to request I would represent to you the cruel and oppressive conduct of the American people living on the borders of the Indian nation, and which he was in hopes, from a talk you were pleased to send him some weeks since, would have been put a stop to, and peace restored between the Indians and the American people; but, far from any stop being put to their inroads and encroachments, they are pouring in by hundreds at a time, not only from the land side, but ascending the Appalachicola in vessel-loads. Thus, the Indians have been compelled to take up arms to defend their homes from a set of lawless invaders.

Your known philanthropy and good-will to the Indians induces the head chiefs to hope that you will lose no time in using your influence to put a stop to those invasions of their lands and order that those who have already presumed to seize our fields may retire therefrom.

The Indians have seized two persons they think have been greatly instrumental in bringing the Americans upon them, and they are now in their possession as prisoners. It is even reported they have made sales of Indian lands without the knowledge, consent, or approbation, of the chiefs of the nation; and, from their long residence in the nation, and the great influence one of those people formerly enjoyed among the chiefs as their chief, there is some reason to believe he has been guilty of improper conduct to the Indian nation.

Gen. MITCHELL, Ag't for Indian Affairs.

No. 4.

Petition of the chiefs of the Lower Creek nation to Governor Cameron.

We, the undersigned, are deputed by the chiefs of the Creek nation to wait on your excellency, and lay before you their heavy complaints.

To the English we have always looked up as friends, as protectors, and on them we now call to aid us in repelling the approaches of the Americans, who, regardless of treaties, are daily seizing on our lands and robbing our people. They have already built seven forts on our land; they are making roads and running lines into the very heart of our country; and, without the interference of the English, we shall soon be driven from the land we inherited from our forefathers.

The Americans tell us the English will regard us no more, and we had better submit to them; but we cannot submit to their shackles, and will rather die in defence of our country.

When peace was made between the English and Americans, we were told by Lieutenant Colonel Nicholls that the Americans were to give up our lands they had taken from us, and we were desired to live quietly and peaceably, in nowise molesting the Americans. We have strictly followed those orders, but the Americans have not complied with the treaty. Colonel Nicholls left Mr. Hamblly in charge of the fort at Prospect Bluff, with orders to hear us if any cause of complaints, and represent the same to the British Government; but he turned traitor and brought the Americans down on the fort, which was blown up, and many of our red brethren destroyed in it. The ammunition stores intended for our use were either destroyed or taken off by the Americans. We have sent several messengers to inform your excellency of these proceedings of the Americans, but they have never returned to us with an answer. Three of our red brethren have lately been killed by the Americans while hunting on our lands, and they threaten to attack the towns of Mickaskey and Suwanee, the only two large towns left us in the Creek nation; and without aid from your excellency, we cannot repel their attack.

We are therefore deputed to demand of your excellency the assistance of troops and ammunition, that we may be able effectually to repel the attack of the Americans, and prevent their further encroachments; and, if we return without assistance, the Americans, who have their spies among us, will the more quickly come upon us.

We most humbly pray your excellency will send such a force as will be respected and make us respectable.

[The following endorsed on the foregoing.]

CHARLES CAMERON, Esq.,
Governor, Commander-in-chief, &c.

I beg leave to represent to your excellency the necessity of my again returning to the Indian nation with the deputies from the chiefs; and, as my trouble and expense can only be defrayed by permission to take goods to dispose of among them, I pray your excellency will be pleased to grant me such a letter or license as will prevent me from being captured, in case of meeting any Spanish cruiser on the coast of Florida.

The court adjourned to meet to-morrow morning, at 7 o'clock.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

The court convened pursuant to adjournment.
Present:

Major General E. P. GAINES, President.

Members.

Colonel King,	Colonel Dyer,
Colonel Williams,	Lieut. Col. Lindsay,
Lieut. Col. Gibson,	Lieut. Col. Elliott,
Major Muhlenburg,	Major Fanning,
Major Montgomery,	Major Minton,
Captain Vashon,	Captain Crittenden,
Lieutenant J. M. Glassell,	Recorder.

When the further examination of the witness, PETER B. COOK, took place, viz:

Question by the prisoner. How long have you been acquainted with the settlements on the Sawahnee?

Answer. Between six and seven months.

Question by the prisoner. For what term of years did you engage to live with the prisoner?

Answer. For no stated period; I was taken by the year.

Question by the prisoner. Were you not discharged by the prisoner from his employ?

Answer. He told me he had no further use for me after I had written the letters to Providence.

Question. Where did you stay after you were discharged?

Answer. I stayed in a small house belonging to a boy called St. John, under the protection of Nero.

Question. What was the subject-matter of the letters you wrote to Providence?

Answer. After being refused by the prisoner a small venture to Providence, I wrote to my friends for the means to trade by myself.

Question by the prisoner. Do you believe the prisoner had knowledge of the venture being on board the schooner?

Answer. I do not believe he did; it was small, and in my trunk.

Question by the prisoner. Do you know that Ambrister was the agent of the prisoner?

Answer. I do not.

Question. Do you think that the powder and lead shipped would more than supply the Indian and negro hunters?

Answer. I did not see the powder and lead myself, but was told by Bowlegs that he had a great quantity; he had them keeping to fight with.

Question. Did the Indians reside on the east side of the river?—Answer. They did.

Question. You were asked if the negroes and Indians, when the letter marked A was communicated, did not take up arms. Had they received information of the defeat of the Indians at Mickaskey prior to that time?

Answer. It was afterwards, I believe, they received the information.

Question. Did not Bowlegs keep other powder than that got from the prisoner?

Answer. He had some he got from the bluff, which was nearly done; he said his hunters were always bothering him about powder.

Question. Did you state that, at the time Ambrister ascended the river, there was no other vessel at the mouth of the river?

Answer. There was none other there; there was one had sailed.

Question. There is a letter A spoken of; how do you know that the son of the prisoner had that letter in his possession?

Answer. I saw him with it, which he dropped, and a boy called John picked it up and gave it to me.

Question. You stated that the Indians and negroes doubted the fidelity of the prisoner in sending letters to the Prince Regent; do you think the prisoner would have been punished by them had he not complied with their wishes?

Answer. I do not know.

Question. Do you believe the prisoner was compelled to write the Indian communications?

Answer. He was not compelled.

WILLIAM HAMBLY, a witness for the prosecution, being duly sworn, and commencing a statement of what he heard the chiefs say, and the prisoner objecting to hearsay evidence of that kind, the court was cleared in order to take the question when they decided that the prisoner's objection was not valid. The witness was therefore recalled, and stated that, fifteen or twenty days after the prisoner arrived at Ocklocknee, the Seminole Indians began to steal horses from the United States' settlements, and committed murders on the Satilla river, which, he was informed by them, was at the instigation of the prisoner. The chiefs of the Little Villages, in witness's neighborhood, then desired him to write a few lines to the prisoner, stating those reports, and that he did not know that those Indians he was exciting had long been outlawed, and cautioned him against such proceedings, or he might be involved in their ruin. This the witness did; when the prisoner wrote him a long and insulting letter, which was lost, upbraiding the witness for calling those Indians outlaws, and accusing him of exciting the Indians to cruel war. The witness was told by chiefs and Indians, who had seen the prisoner, that he advised them to go to war with the United States, if they did not surrender them the lands which had been taken from them, and that the British Government would support them in it.

The Indians that took the witness and a certain Mr. Doyle prisoners, which happened on the 3th of December last, told them it was by the prisoner's order; and, on their arrival at the Mickasuby, (as prisoners,) King Hijah and all his chiefs told them it was by the prisoner's orders they were taken and robbed. On their arrival at Suwamy, they were told by the Indian and negro chiefs, who sat in council over them, that the prisoner had advised he should be given up to five or six Choctaw Indians, who were saved from the negro fort, who would revenge themselves for the loss of their friends at that place. On their return from Suwamy, the chief King Hijah, told them that he had got the prisoner to write several letters for him; one to the Governor of Providence, one to the British Minister at Washington, one to the Secretary of State in London, and one to the American agent for Indian affairs, protesting against the proceedings of the commanding officer at Fort Scott. While the witness was at Suwamy, the Indian chiefs told him that the prisoner had arrived at that place with ten kegs of powder on board his vessel; and, whilst in Fort St. Mark's, some time in March, Hillis Hajo, or Francis, brought an order from the prisoner to the commandant for two kegs of powder, with other articles, which were in his possession.

Question by the court. Were any murders or depredations committed on the white settlements by the Indians previous to the prisoner's arrival at Ocklocknee?

Answer. None, except one murder at Fort Gaines, which was before or about the time of the prisoner's arrival.

Question. How long have you resided among the Indians? State to the court whether you are acquainted with the Indian language, and how long since you learned it?

Answer. I have resided among them fourteen years, and have understood their language twelve years.

Question. Do you believe the Seminoles would have commenced the business of murder and depredation on the white settlements had it not been at the instigation of the prisoner, and a promise, on his part, of British protection?

Answer. I do not believe they would without they had been assured of British protection.

Question by the court. What was the light in which the prisoner was viewed by the hostile Seminoles? Was it that of an authorized agent of the British Government?

Answer. The different chiefs always represented him to me as such. The witness recognised the letter marked G, and signed A. Arbuthnot, as being a copy of the one alluded to in his testimony as lost.

Question by the prisoner. Are you acquainted with the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. I have seen it, but cannot say I am acquainted with it.

Question. Is that which you have just seen, and say is the copy of the one you lost, the prisoner's handwriting?

Answer. It looks to be his handwriting, but I cannot say positively.

Question. Was the prisoner considered as the agent of the Seminoles at the time those murders were committed?

Answer. I had not seen the prisoner at that time. The Indian chiefs told me that the prisoner had reported himself to them as an English agent.

Question. Where did you understand the prisoner to be when you were taken prisoner?

Answer. The Indians told us that he had gone over to Providence, but was expected back by the time we should arrive at Suwanee.

Question. Did you not request King Hijah to prevail upon the prisoner to give you a passage in his schooner to Providence?

Answer. Yes, but was told that the prisoner refused it; stating that, if we were forced upon him, he would blindfold us, and make us walk overboard.

Question. What were the reasons given by King Hijah for the prisoner's not granting your request?

Answer. King Hijah stated that the prisoner was fearful of meeting with an American vessel, when we should be taken out, and he thereby lose his schooner.

EDMUND DOYLE, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, was questioned as follows:

Question by the Judge Advocate. Do you know anything that would lead to substantiate the charges against the prisoner now before you?

Answer. I know nothing but from common report.

WILLIAM FULTON, an evidence in the present prosecution, being duly sworn, testified to the copy of a letter from A. Arbuthnot to General Mitchell, agent for Indian affairs, dated Suwanee, January 19, 1818, and marked No. 6, as acknowledged by the prisoner to be the same in substance as one written by himself at that time. An extract from the letter was then read.

No. 6.

Extract from a letter written by A. Arbuthnot to General Mitchell, American agent for the Creek nation of Indians, dated

SUWANEE, January 19, 1818.

In taking this liberty of addressing you, sir, in behalf of the unfortunate Indians, believe me I have no wish but to see an end put to a war, which, if persisted in, I foresee must eventually be their ruin; and as they were not the aggressors, if, in the height of their rage, they commit any excesses, that you will overlook them as the just ebullitions of an indignant spirit against an invading foe. I have the honor, &c.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

By order of King Hijah and Bowlegs, acting for themselves and the other Chiefs.

Question by the prisoner. Where did the prisoner acknowledge the letter just read to be a copy of the one written by himself?

Answer. In the encampment before this place, about the 6th or 7th instant.

Question by the prisoner. Was not the acknowledgment when he was a prisoner?

Answer. It was.

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear a gentleman say to the prisoner, whilst in custody, that those who recommended the scalping-knife and tomahawk should feel their keenest edge?

Answer. I did hear a gentleman say that those who excited the Indians to the murder of the unoffending should feel the keenest edge of the scalping-knife; but, as well as I recollect, that observation was not made until after the repeated acknowledgments of the prisoner of having written the letter.

Question by the court. Was not the confession of the prisoner to this letter made voluntary, and without any constraint whatever?

Answer. I conceive it was.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution being closed, the prisoner required Robert C. Ambrister as one of his witnesses, against whom criminal charges had been filed, and who was in custody on account thereof; to which the Judge Advocate objecting, the court was cleared to take its sense; when it was decided that Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody for similar offences with the prisoner, cannot be examined as evidence before this court.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a previous witness, now on the part of the prisoner, being again sworn, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Was there any other vessel at the mouth of the Suwanee river when Ambrister seized your schooner?—Answer. Yes.

Question. What vessel was it? Was it not the vessel which Ambrister came in?

Answer. It was a sloop, and I understood Ambrister came in her.

Question. Did Ambrister ever mention to you who recommended him to seize the prisoner's schooner, or who assisted him in stimulating the negroes to do so?

Answer. No; I understood he came on board of his own accord.

Question by the court. Have you, since you commanded the prisoner's vessel, ever brought any arms to that part of the country?

Answer. No; I brought a quantity of lead and ten kegs of powder in the last trip.

JOHN WINSLET, a former witness on the part of the prosecution, being recalled on behalf of the prisoner, was questioned as follows, viz:

Question by the prisoner. Are you not of opinion that the letter which you say was written by the prisoner to the Little Prince is now in the possession of the Little Prince?

Answer. After reading it, I returned to him, and believe it to be still in his possession, as Indians seldom destroy papers of that kind.

The prisoner requesting some time to make up his defence, he was given until to-morrow evening, at four o'clock.

*FORT ST. MARK'S,
April 28, four o'clock, P. M.*

The Recorder having read over the proceedings of the court with closed doors, the prisoner was recalled into court, and made the defence, marked K, and attached to these proceedings. The doors were then closed, and, after most mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, the court find the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, guilty of the first specification to the first charge, and guilty of the first charge; guilty of the first and second specifications of the second charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" they therefore do, on the most mature reflections, sentence the prisoner, Alexander Arbuthnot, to be hanged by the neck until he is dead; two-thirds of the court concurring.

EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major Gen., Pres't of the Court.
S. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

K.
DEFENCE.

May it please this Honorable Court: The prisoner arraigned before you is sensible of the indulgence granted by this honorable court in the examination of the case now before them. It is not the wish of the prisoner, in making his defence, to tire the patience of the court by a minute reference to the voluminous documents and papers, or to recapitulate the whole of the testimony which has come before the honorable court in the course of this investigation. Nor is it the intention of the prisoner to waste the invaluable time of this court by appeals to their feelings or sympathy, though I am persuaded that sympathy nowhere more abounds than in a generous American breast. My only appeal is to the sound and impartial judgment of this honorable court, the purity and uprightness of their hearts, that they will dispassionately and patiently weigh the evidence they have before them, apply the law, and on these, and these alone, pronounce their judgment.

If this honorable court please, I shall now proceed to examine the law and evidence that is relied on by this honorable court in support of the first charge and specification. Winslet, a witness on the part of the prosecution, says, the Little Prince showed him a letter written in June last, signed A. Arbuthnot, requesting his friendship with the lower nation of Indians; the same witness stated that he believed the letter to be now in the possession of the Little Prince. Here, may it please this honorable court, I would call their attention to the law relating to evidence; first presuming that the rules of evidence are the same, whether in civil or military tribunals.—Macomb, 99.

This point being concluded, the next inquiry is, what are the rules of evidence with respect to the admission of letters, or papers of private correspondence, in a court of criminal jurisdiction? May it please this honorable court, must you not produce the original letters and papers, if they are not lost or mislaid, so that they cannot be obtained; and, in case they are lost, proof must be made of the handwriting being the same as that of the original before they can be received as evidence.—(Macomb on Courts Martial; Peake's Evidence; Gilbert's Laws of Evidence.) No instance can be cited where a copy of a letter was read as evidence when the original could be obtained, much less the giving in evidence the contents of such letter from bare recollection. The only proof that this honorable court has of the existence of such a letter being in the hands of any person, or its contents being known, is the vagrant memory of a vagrant individual. Make this a rule of evidence, and, I ask you, when would implication, construction, and invention stop? whose property, whose reputation, and whose life would be safe? Here I would beg leave to mention a remark made by the president of this court in the course of this investigation, which was, that, notwithstanding the letter was proved by the witness to be in the possession of the Little Prince, this court could not notice that circumstance, because there was no means by which it could be obtained. I would ask the honorable court what means they have adopted, or what exertions have they made, to procure this letter? If the honorable court please, I shall here close the defence on the first charge and specification, believing that they are neither supported by law nor evidence.

May it please the honorable court, I will now come to the second charge, and first specification of that charge. In support of this charge and specification, the evidence is a letter written to my son. If the court please, this letter was written in consequence of the situation of my property at Sawahnee, and the large debts that were due me from Bowlegs and his people. Nothing, I believe, of an inflammatory nature can be found on reading the document marked A, authorizing the opinion that I was prompting the Indians to war. On the contrary, if the honorable court will examine the document marked A, they will see that I wished to lull their fears, by informing them that it was the negroes, and not the Indians, the Americans were principally moving against.

If the honorable court please, I will make a few remarks on the second specification, and here close my defence. In proof of this charge, the court have before them the evidence of Hambly, Cook, and sundry letters purporting to be written by myself to different individuals. May it please the court, what does Cook prove? Why, that I had ten kegs of powder at Sawahnee. Let me appeal to the experience of this court, if they think this quantity of powder would supply one thousand Indians, and an equal number of blacks, more than two months for hunting?

As to the letters named in this specification, may it please the honorable court, the rules of evidence laid down in the first part of this defence will apply with equal force in the present case. It remains now, may it please the honorable court, to say something as to Hambly's testimony; and, may it please this honorable court, the rule laid down in this case as to hearsay evidence will be found without a precedent. A strong case was stated by an intelligent member of this court, on the examination of this part of the evidence; that is, would you receive as testimony what a third person had said, who, if present, you would reject as incompetent? Apply this principle to the present case; could an Indian be examined on oath in our courts of judicature? If, then, the testimony of savages is inadmissible, Hambly proves nothing.

Here, may it please this honorable court, I close my reply to the charges and specifications preferred against me; being fully persuaded that, should there be cause of censure, my judges will, in the language of the law, lean to the side of mercy.

A. ARBUTHNOT.

Continuation of the minutes of the proceedings of a special court, whereof Major General Gaines is President, convened by order of the 26th of April, 1818.

FORT ST. MARK'S, April 27, 1818.

The court proceeded to the trial of Robert C. Ambrister, a British subject, who, being asked if he had any objections to any one of the members of the court, and replying in the negative, was arraigned on the following charges and specifications, viz:

Charges against Robert C. Ambrister, now in custody, who says he is a British subject.

CHARGE 1st. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, supplying them with means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

Specification 1st. That the said Robert C. Ambrister did give intelligence of the movements and operations of the American army between the 1st and 20th of March, 1818, and did excite them (the negroes and Indians) to war against the army of the United States, by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, whose Government was at peace and friendship with the United States and all her citizens.

CHARGE 2d. Leading and commanding the Lower Creeks in carrying on a war against the United States.

Specification 1st. That the said Robert C. Ambrister, a subject of Great Britain, which Government was in peace and amity with the United States and all her citizens, did, between the 1st of February, and 20th of March, 1818, levy war against the United States, by assuming command of the Indians, in hostility and open war with the United States, and ordering a party of them to meet the army of the United States, and give them battle, as will appear by his letters to Governor Cameron, of New Providence, dated 20th March, 1818, which are marked A, B, C, and D, and the testimony of Mr. Peter B. Cook, and Captain Lewis, of the schooner Chance. By order of the court,

J. M. GLASSELL, Recorder.

To which charges and specifications pleaded as follows, viz:

To the 1st charge and specification, not guilty.
To the 2d charge and specification, guilty, and justification.

Adjourned until to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock.

FORT ST. MARKS, April 28, 1818.

The court met pursuant to the adjournment. Present:

Major General GAINES, President.

Members.

Colonel King,	Colonel Dyer,
Colonel Williams,	Lieut. Col. Lindsay,
Lieut. Col. Gibson,	Lieut. Col. Elliott,
Major Muhlenburg,	Major Fanning,
Major Montgomery,	Major Minton,
Captain Vashon,	Captain Crittenden,
Lieutenant J. M. Glassell,	Recorder.

The Recorder then read to the court the following order, viz:

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adj't Gen's Office, near St. Marks,
April 28, 1818.

GENERAL ORDER.

Captain Allison, of the 7th infantry, is detailed to form a supernumerary member of the special court now sitting at Fort St. Marks.

By order:

ROBERT BUTLER, Adj't Gen.

Pursuant to the above order, the supernumerary member took his seat.

JOHN LEWIS PHENIX, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, that about the 5th or 6th of April, 1818, his vessel and himself having been captured by the prisoner, and he brought to Suwanee as a prisoner, there was an alarm among the negroes and Indians, created by learning some news from Mickasuky, at which time the prisoner appeared active in sending orders, and sending a detachment to meet the American army. The witness also stated, that the prisoner appeared to be a person vested with authority among the negro leaders, and gave orders for their preparation for war, procuring ammunition, &c., and that the leaders came to him for orders; the prisoner furnished them with powder and lead, and recommended to them the making of ball, &c., very quickly. The witness also stated, that the prisoner occasionally dressed in uniform, with his sword; and that on the first alarm, which he understood was from Mickasuky by a negro woman, he put on the uniform. The witness further stated, that some time about the 20th March, 1818, the prisoner, with an armed body of negroes, (twenty-four in number,) came on board his vessel, and ordered him to pilot them to Fort St. Marks, which he stated he intended to capture before the Americans could get there, threatening to hang the witness if he did not obey.

Question by the court. Did you ever understand by whose authority, and for what purpose, the accused came into the country?

Answer. I have frequently heard him say he came to attend to Mr. Woodbine's business at the bay of Tampa.

Question by the prisoner. Did I not tell you, when I came on board the schooner Chance, I wished you to pilot me to St. Mark's, as I was informed that two Americans, by the names of Hambly and Doyle, were confined there, and I wished to have them relieved from their confinement?

Answer. You stated you wanted to get Hambly and Doyle from St. Mark's. I do not know what were your intentions in so doing.

Question. Did I not tell you that I expected the Indians would fire upon me when arriving at St. Mark's?

Answer. You did not. You stated that you intended to take the fort in the night by surprise.

Question. Did you see me give ammunition to the negroes and Indians? if so, how much, and at what time?

Answer. I saw you give powder and lead to the negroes when you came on board, and advised them to make balls; and I saw you give liquor and paint to the Indians.

Question. Have you not often heard me say, between the 1st and 20th of April, that I would not have anything to do with the negroes and Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. About the 15th of April I heard you say you would not have anything to do with the negroes and Indians; I heard nothing about exciting them to war.

Question. Can you read writing?

Answer. Not English writing.

Question. Did you not hear me say, when arriving at Suwaney, that I wished to be off immediately for Providence?

Answer. I did not. After the alarm, you said you wished to be off for Tampa.

Question. Did you not say to the accused you wished to visit Mr. Arbuthnot, at his store, on Suwaney, and get provisions yourself?

Answer. I did not. I stated I wanted provisions.

Question. Did I send or command any Indians to go and fight the Americans?

Answer. I did not exactly know that you sent them; the Indians and negroes were crowding before your door, and you were dividing the paint, &c. among them; and I understood a party was going to march.

Question. Did I not give up the schooner in charge to you as captain?

Answer. After our return from Suwaney town, you directed me to take charge of her to go to Tampa.

JONAS J. ARBUTHNOT, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, that some time about the 23d of March, the prisoner came with a body of negroes, partly armed, to his father's store on Suwaney river, and told the witness that he had come to do justice to the country by taking the goods and distributing them among the negroes and Indians, which the witness saw the prisoner do; and that the prisoner stated to him that he had come to the country on Woodbine's business to see the negroes righted. The witness has further known the prisoner to give orders to the negroes; and that, at his suggestion, a party was sent from Suwaney to meet the Americans to give them battle, which party returned on meeting the Mickasuky Indians in their flight. The witness also testified to the following letter, marked A, and referred to in the specification of the 2d charge as the writing of the prisoner.

Robert C. Ambrister to Governor Cameron.

SAWANEE, (near St. Mark's fort),

March 20, 1818.

SIR: I am requested particularly by all our Indian chiefs, to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them two years ago, and have advanced some considerable distance in their country, and are now making daily progress. They say they sent a number of letters to your excellency by Mr. Arbuthnot, but have never received one answer, which makes them believe that he never delivered them, and will oblige them much if you will let them know whether he did or not. The purport of the letters was begging your excellency to be kind enough to send them down some gunpowder, muskets, balls, lead, cannon, &c., as they are now completely out of those articles; the Americans may march through the whole territory in one month, and, without arms, &c., they must surrender. Hillis Hajo, or Francis, the Indian chief, the one that was in England, tells me to let your excellency know that the Prince Regent told him that whenever he wanted ammunition, your excellency would supply him with as much as he wanted. They beg me to press upon your excellency's mind to send the above-mentioned articles down by the vessel that brings this to you, as she will sail for this place immediately, and let the Prince Regent know of their situation. Any letters that your excellency may send down, be good enough to direct to me, as they have great dependence in my writing. Any news that your excellency may have respecting them and America, you will be doing a great favor to let me know, that I may send among them.

There is now a very large body of Americans and Indians, who I expect will attack us every day, and God only knows how it will be decided; but I must only say this will be the last effort with us. There has been a body of Indians gone to meet them, and I have sent another party. I hope your excellency will be pleased to grant the favor they request. I have nothing further to add, but am, sir, with due respect, your obedient humble servant.

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

Question by the prisoner. Did you hear me say that I came on Woodbine's business?

Answer. I did.

Question by the prisoner. Were not the negroes alluded to, at Arbuthnot's store before I arrived?

Answer. No. You came with them.

PETER B. COOK, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated, that he never heard the prisoner give any orders to negroes or Indians; that the prisoner distributed Arbuthnot's goods, and also paint, to the negroes and Indians; also that some powder was brought from the vessel to Suwaney by the prisoner, and distributed among the negroes by Nero. Some time in March the prisoner took Arbuthnot's schooner, and, with an armed party of negroes, (twenty-four in number,) set out for St. Marks, for the purpose of taking Arbuthnot's goods at that place, and stated that he would compel the commandant to deliver them up. On hearing of the approach of the American army, the prisoner told the negroes it was useless to run; for, if they ran any further, they would be driven into the sea. The prisoner told the witness that he had been a lieutenant in the British army, under Colonel Nicholls. The prisoner was sent by Woodbine to Tampa to see about those negroes he had left there. The prisoner told the witness that he had written a letter to Governor Cameron for ammunition for the Indians some time in March; and also told the witness that he had a commission in the patriot army, under McGregor, and that he had expected a captaincy. The witness testified that the following letters, marked A, B, C, and D, and referred to in the specification to the 2d charge, were in the handwriting of the prisoner, and one marked E.

NOTE.—The letter marked A, is copied in a previous part of these proceedings.

SUWANEE, NEAR RIVER APPALACHICOLA.

DEAR SIR: Francis, and all the Indian chiefs, have requested me particularly to acquaint you that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them these two years past, and are making daily progress in their territory, and say they will proceed; that you are the only friend they have in that part of the world, and hope that you will exert yourself in their behalf, and ask for as much assistance as can be had; that the Americans are at the forks of the river Appalachicola; they have written a number of times to England and Providence, but have never received one answer; they expect the man never delivered the letters, but they have full hopes in my writing; they request you to make the Prince Regent acquainted with their deplorable situation; the Americans have been very cruel since they commenced, and I hope you will not lose a single moment in forwarding their views; they say they will be extremely happy to see you; nothing would give them greater pleasure than to see you out at this present time. If they should not see you, to send them out all news and directions, that they may be guided by it. There are about three hundred blacks at this place, and a few of our bluff people; they beg me to say they depend on your promises, and expect you are on the way out; they have stuck to the cause, and will always believe in the faith of you, and any directions you may give. Send to me at this place and I will do what I can.

And remain, my dear sir, most truly yours,

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

N. B. Francis says you must bring the horses when you come out, that you promised, and that his house has been burnt down, and burnt his uniform clothes.

SIR: I am requested particularly by the Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that the Americans have commenced hostilities with them a long time since, and have advanced some distance in their territory, and are still continuing to advance; that they (the chiefs of Florida) have sent repeatedly to your excellency, and have never received one answer; they suspect Mr. Arbuthnot has never delivered the papers to your excellency; they wish me to state to you that they are completely out of ammunition, muskets, &c., begging your excellency will be pleased to send them the articles above mentioned, with a few cannon, as the Americans build their boats so strong that their rifle balls cannot penetrate their sides. The captain of the vessel, who will come down again, I have given orders to make your excellency acquainted with the time the vessel will sail for this place. Your excellency will, I hope, be good enough to make the Prince Regent acquainted with their situation, and ask for assistance, which have pressed me very hard to press on your excellency's mind, and likewise to send them down what news may be respecting them and the country, which will be a great satisfaction to them. I have the honor to be, &c.

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

N. B. They beg your excellency will be as expeditious as possible; that your excellency is the only dependence they have, and whom the Prince Regent told them would give them every assistance that laid in your power.

SUWANEE, NEAR FORT ST. MARK'S,

March 20, 1818.

I am requested by Francis and all the Indian chiefs to acquaint your excellency that they are at war with the Americans, and have been some time back; that they are in great distress for want of ammunition, balls, arms, &c., and have wrote by Mr. Arbuthnot several times, but they suppose he never delivers them to your excellency. You will oblige them much to let them know whether he did or not.

I expect the Americans and Indians will attack us daily; I have sent a party of men to oppose them; they beg of me to press on your excellency's mind to lay the situation of the country before the Prince Regent and ask for assistance. All news respecting them, your excellency will do a favor to let us know by the first opportunity, that I may make them acquainted; I have given direction to the captain to let your excellency know when the vessel will sail for this place. I hope your excellency will be pleased to send them the ammunition; I expect if they do not procure some very shortly, that the Americans will march through the country. I have nothing further to add. I am, dear sir, &c.

MOUTH OF THE RIVER, Tuesday 3 o'clock.

DEAR COOK: The boat arrived here about three o'clock on Thursday; the wind has been ahead ever since I have been down; the rudder of the vessel is in a bad condition, but I will manage to have it done to-night; the wind, I am in hopes, will be fair in the morning, when I will get under weigh and make all possible despatch. I will make old Lewis pilot me safe. If these Indians don't conduct themselves straight, I would use rigorous means with them; beware of Mr. Jerry; I found him on board when I came; keep a good look out. I have sent two kegs of powder, and one bar of lead. Yours, &c.

R. C. A.

Question by the prisoner. Did you not frequently hear me say that I would have nothing to do with the Indians in exciting them to war with the United States?

Answer. I do not recollect.

Question by the prisoner. Are you acquainted with Lewis Phenix, and have you not heard him express ill-will against me in consequence of my wishing him to pilot me to St. Mark's?

Answer. I never did.

Question. Do you know of my sending troops at any time to fight against the United States, and have I not been constantly with you, so that you would have had an opportunity of knowing if here had been any sent by me?

Answer. I have not; they might have been sent without my knowledge.

JACOB HARMON, a witness on the part of the prosecution, being duly sworn, stated that, some time in the latter end of March, or first of April, the prisoner took possession of the schooner Chance, with an armed party of negroes, and stated his intentions of taking St. Mark's; on his way thither, going ashore, he learned from some Indians that Arbuthnot had gone on to St. Mark's, which induced him to return. The witness also stated that, while the prisoner was on board, he had complete command of the negroes who considered him as their captain. The prisoner took the cargo of the vessel up towards Suwanee, which consisted of, with other articles, nine kegs of powder and five hundred pounds of lead.

The evidence on both sides being closed, the prisoner was allowed until five o'clock this evening to make his defence.

The time allowed the prisoner for the preparation of his defence having expired he was brought before the court, and made the defence marked A, which is attached to these proceedings.

The court was then cleared, and the proceedings read over by the recorder, when, after due deliberation on the testimony brought forward, the court find the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of so much of the specification to the first charge as follows, viz: "and did excite them to war with the United States by sending their warriors to meet and fight the American army, he being a subject of Great Britain, which Government was at peace and friendship with the United States and all her citizens;" but not guilty of the other part of the specification: guilty of the first charge; guilty of the specification of the second charge, and guilty of the second charge; and do therefore sentence the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, to suffer death by being shot, two-thirds of the court concurring therein.

One of the members of the court requesting a reconsideration of his vote on the sentence, the sense of the court was taken thereon, and decided in the affirmative; when the vote was again taken, and the court sentence the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The court adjourned sine die.

DEFENCE M.

FORT ST. MARKS, April 28, 1818.

The United States of America vs. Robert Christy Ambrister.

Who being arraigned before a special court-martial upon the following charges, to wit:

1st. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy; supplying them with the means of war; he being a subject of Great Britain at peace with the United States, and lately an officer in the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2d. Sending and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on war against the United States.

To the first charge the prisoner at the bar pleaded not guilty, and as to the second charge he pleaded guilty, and justification. The prisoner at the bar feels grateful to this honorable court for their goodness in giving him a sufficient time to deliberate, and arrange his defence on the above charges. The prisoner at the bar here avails himself of the opportunity of stating to this court that, inasmuch as the testimony which was introduced in this case was very explicit, and went to every point the prisoner could wish, he has nothing further to offer in his defence, but puts himself upon the mercy of the honorable court.

ROBERT C. AMBRISTER.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Adj't Gen's Office, camp 4 miles north of
St. Mark's, April 29, 1818.

GENERAL ORDERS.

At a special court-martial, commenced on the 26th instant at St. Mark's, and continued until the 28th, of which brevet Major General E. P. Gaines is president, was tried A. Arbuthnot on the following charges and specifications, viz:

CHARGE 1st. Exciting and stirring up the Creek Indians to war against the United States and her citizens; he, A. Arbuthnot, being a subject of Great Britain, with whom the United States are at peace.

CHARGE 2d. Acting as a spy, aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war.

CHARGE 3d. Exciting the Indians to murder and destroy William Hambly and Edward Doyle, confiscate their property, and causing their arrest with a view to their condemnation to death, and the seizure of their property, they being citizens of Spain, on account of their active and zealous exertions to maintain peace between Spain, the United States, and the Indians.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded not guilty. The court, after mature deliberation on the evidence adduced, find the prisoner, A. Arbuthnot, guilty of the first charge, and guilty of the second charge, leaving out the words "acting as a spy;" and, after mature reflection, sentence him, A. Arbuthnot, to be suspended by the neck until he is dead.

Was also tried Robert C. Ambrister on the following charges, viz:

CHARGE 1st. Aiding, abetting, and comforting the enemy, and supplying them with the means of war, he being a subject of Great Britain, (who are at peace with the United States,) and late an officer in the British colonial marines.

CHARGE 2d. Leading and commanding the Lower Creek Indians in carrying on a war against the United States.

To which charges the prisoner pleaded as follows, viz: To the first charge not guilty; to the second charge guilty, and justification.

The court, on examination of evidence, and on mature deliberation, find the prisoner, Robert C. Ambrister, guilty of the first and second charges, and do therefore sentence him to suffer death by being shot. The members requesting a reconsideration of the vote on this sentence, and it being had, they sentence the prisoner to receive fifty stripes on his bare back, and be confined with a ball and chain to hard labor for twelve calendar months.

The Commanding General approves the finding and sentence of the court in the case of A. Arbuthnot, and approves the finding and first sentence of the court in the case of Robert C. Ambrister, and disapproves the reconsideration of the sentence of the honorable court in this case. It appears from the evidence and pleading of the prisoner that he did lead and command, within the territory of Spain, (being a subject of Great Britain,) the Indians in war against the United States, those nations being at peace. It is an established principle of the laws of nations that any individual of a nation making war against the citizens of another nation, they being at peace, forfeits his allegiance, and becomes an outlaw and pirate; this is the case of Robert C. Ambrister, clearly shown by the evidence adduced.

The Commanding General orders, that Brevet A. C. W. Fanning, of the corps of artillery, will have, between the hours of eight and nine o'clock, A. M., A. Arbuthnot suspended by the neck, with a rope until he is dead, and Robert C. Ambrister to be shot to death, agreeably to the sentence of the court.

John James Arbuthnot will be furnished with a passage to Pensacola by the first vessel.

The special court, of which Brevet Major General E. P. Gaines is President, is dissolved.

By order of Major General Jackson.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Aug. 14, 1818.

SIR: I enclose for your information a copy of the orders to General Gaines, growing out of the late decision of the President, relative to St. Mark's and Pensacola. [See letter to General Gaines of August 14, 1818.]

I was directed by the President to wait the reply of the Spanish Minister to Mr. Adams's letter to him, which, not being received until the day before yesterday has caused so great a delay as to render it necessary to send the orders direct to General Gaines, without passing them through you. HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 12, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your order of the 26th ultimo, which reached me last night; its contents are duly noted, and will be promptly attended to.

I have received no late advices from General Gaines, although I have for some time expected the return of the express sent to him on the 24th of November last. Taking into view the strength of the Seminoles and their adherents, as reported to you by General Gaines, and the aggregate of his strength, regulars and militia, amounting to but one thousand eight hundred men, which cannot possibly afford a like number of effectives; considering, likewise, that the greater portion of this force, are draughted militia, from Georgia, who may apply for their discharge at the expiration of three months from the time they were first mustered, and who may be disposed to claim this right, and abandon the campaign, about the time I could reach Fort Scott, I have deemed it both prudent and advisable to call from the west end of the State of Tennessee for one thousand volunteer mounted gun-men, to serve during the campaign. With this force, in conjunction with the regular troops, I can act promptly, and, with the smiles of Heaven, successfully, against any force that can be concentrated by the Seminoles and their auxiliaries. Viewing, however, the lives of our citizens as too precious to be risked in a contest with savages, with the odds of two to one, unless where real necessity demands the exposure, I have therefore written to the Governor of Georgia to continue in the field the one thousand men required by General Gaines.

The result of the appeal I have made to the patriotism of those brave men in West Tennessee, who have so often followed me to the field of danger, will be known by the 19th instant, and I hope to leave this for Fort Scott on the 22d. Of my movements, and success in raising the mounted volunteers, you shall be advised.

It may appear to the Government, on the first view, that mounted men are the most expensive; but when we consider the rapidity of their movements, the amount of quartermaster's expenditures for pack-horses, baggage-wagons, and other means of transport indispensable to footmen, in this instance saved, mounted gun-men, as auxiliaries in such a campaign as the one contemplated, will be found to save both blood and treasure to the United States. The volunteers that have been invited to the field are of tried materials, and such as can be relied on in the day of danger and trial. With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

I feel myself much at a loss for correct topographical information of the country occupied by the Seminole Indians, and particularly of that portion which may possibly become the seat of war. Should there be any maps, plans, or charts, of the section of country alluded to, in the secret bureau of the War Department, you will oblige me by having a copy transmitted to Fort Scott as early as practicable.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 13, 1818.

Sir: Being advised that the assistant deputy quartermaster general of General Gaines's brigade has resigned, and being unadvised as to quartermaster's funds within the seventh department, I have to request that necessary funds be forwarded to Quartermaster General Gibson, at Fort Scott, whom I have ordered to meet me at that place without loss of time.

Should the one thousand volunteer mounted gun-men attend to my appeal to their patriotism, I shall send on a confidential agent to Georgia, to have the necessary supplies for them procured and forwarded by the quartermaster, if any there, to Fort Gaines; and, if none, by the agent sent, with instructions to draw on Quartermaster General Gibson for the amount of his purchases; this is done to facilitate the march of the volunteers called for. I need not observe that, without quartermaster's funds, an army cannot be wielded either with promptitude or effect. Promptitude in the present campaign will be a great saving to the United States, both in character and purse.

I have the honor to be, &c.

No. 5.

Extract of a letter from Major General Jackson to Brevet Major General Gaines, dated

Nashville, August 7, 1818.

I am happy to find that the notorious Micco de Cozey is at length destroyed. The distress of the Indians for provisions I expected. Your providing for their wants meets my entire approbation; it will meet the entire approbation of the Government, as it corresponds with the usual humanity extended to the suffering Indians.

I have noted with attention Major Twigg's letter, marked No. 5. I contemplated that the agents of Spain, or the officers of Fort St. Augustine, would excite the Indians to hostility, and furnish them with the means of war. It will be necessary to obtain evidence substantiating this fact, and that the hostile Indians have been fed and furnished from the garrison of St. Augustine. This being obtained, should you deem your force sufficient, you will proceed to take, and garrison, Fort St. Augustine with American troops, and hold the garrison prisoners until you hear from the President of the United States, or transport them to Cuba, as, in your judgment, under existing circumstances, you may think best.

Let it be remembered, that the proceedings carried on by me, or this order, are not on the ground that we are at war with Spain. It is on the ground of self-preservation, bottomed on the broad basis of the law of nature and of nations, and justified by giving peace and security to our frontier; hence the necessity of procuring evidence of the fact of the agents or officers of Spain having excited the Indians to continue the war against us, and that they have furnished them with the means of carrying on the war. This evidence being obtained, you will (if your force is sufficient) permit nothing to prevent you from reducing Fort St. Augustine, except a positive order from the Department of War.

Orders, some time since, have been given to the officer of the ordnance commanding at Charleston, to have in readiness a complete battering train, the number and caliber of the guns pointed out. I have no doubt you will find them in readiness.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

I enclose you the report of Captain Henley of the naval force on that station. You will open a correspondence with Commandant A. G. Dallas, to insure his co-operation, provided it should be required. I trust, before this reaches you, you will have destroyed the settlement collected at Suwanee; this can easily be done by a coup de main, provided secrecy of your movements be observed, and a great expedition of march used. Without expedition of movement, and great caution, you will be discovered, and the enemy will flee, or endeavor to ambuscade you; both of which ought to be guarded against.

Have a careful eye to your supplies on hand, that, before they are consumed, others may be ordered and reach you. Without necessary supplies, an army cannot operate with effect. The late scarcity ought to teach us a lesson on this head, never to be forgotten. I therefore expect that no scarcity will happen at any place, post, or garrison, intrusted to your care. I shall expect to hear from you shortly; and that you and your brigade may be successful in all your operations, and cover yourselves with glory, is my heartfelt wish.

I am, very respectfully, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

No. 6.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, August 10, 1818.

Captain Gadsden will likewise deliver you his report, made in pursuance of my order, accompanied with the plans of the fortifications thought necessary for the defence of the Floridas, in connexion with the line of defence on our Southern frontier. This was done under the belief that Government will never jeopardize the safety of the Union, or the security of our frontier, by surrendering those posts, unless upon a sure guaranty, agreeably to the stipulations of the articles of capitulation, that will insure permanent peace, tranquillity, and security, to our Southern frontier. It is believed that Spain can never furnish this guaranty. As long as there are Indians in Florida, and it possessed by Spain, they will be excited to war and the indiscriminate murder of our citizens, by foreign agents and Spanish officers. The conduct of Spain for the last six years fully proves this. It was under the belief that the Floridas would be held, that my orders to make the report were given to Captain Gadsden. To this I refer you; its perusal will show you how important it is, not only to the defence and security of the frontier, but to the whole United States. It points to our vulnerable points, and shows our country can and was intended to be invaded, during the last war, from this quarter; and that the attempt would have been made, had not the Creek Indians been subdued previous to the arrival of the British troops; and, afterwards, their attempt to gain possession of Mobile bay was frustrated by the repulse they met with at Fort Bowyer. If possession is given of the points now occupied by our troops, and a war ensues, an attempt will no doubt be made to penetrate our country by the Appalachicola, and, by the aid of the Indians, to reach the Mississippi at or above the Chickasaw Bluffs. Should this be done with a formidable force, in our unprepared state, it is highly probable that the enemy might reach the banks of the Mississippi. Occupying these points will prevent the danger of such an occurrence; surrender them, and I would not, without a much stronger force, hold myself responsible for the safety of my division. But with those points fortified as recommended, and with an effective force of five thousand men, I pledge my life upon defending the country, from St. Mary's to the Barrataire, against all the machinations and attacks of the Holy Alliance and combined Europe.

By Captain Gadsden you will receive some letters, lately enclosed to me, detailing the information that the Spaniards at Fort St. Augustine were again exciting the Indians to war against us, and a copy of my order to General Gaines upon this subject. It is what I expected, and proves the necessity and sound policy of not only holding the posts which we are now in possession of, but likewise of our possessing ourselves of Fort St. Augustine. This alone can insure peace and security on our Southern frontier.

It is alone by a just and bold course of conduct that we can expect to obtain and insure respect from Europe, and not by a timid, temporizing policy. The first commands admiration and esteem, the latter contempt. But, from the composition of the present Administration, I can never suppose that they will abandon rights, or assume a timid and temporizing course of policy. I therefore conclude that the posts will never be surrendered, unless upon the terms agreed on in the capitulation, and then it guaranteed that those terms will be punctually fulfilled; particularly when it is recollected that, unless this is done, our frontier will be exposed to all the scenes of blood and massacre heretofore experienced; and to regain them will cost us much blood and treasure, in the event of a war. The security of the Western States renders it necessary that they should be held: the voice of the people will demand it. But upon this, as well as every other subject, I refer you to Captain Gadsden.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major General commanding.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Sept 1, 1818.

Sir: General Jackson has transmitted to this Department a copy of his letter to you of the 7th ultimo. It is to be presumed that his orders in relation to St. Augustine were given before he was apprized of the decision of the President in relation to St. Mark's and Pensacola; as the principle on which that decision was made would equally extend to the case of St. Augustine. You will accordingly not carry that part of General Jackson's order into execution, except to collect with care the evidence of such facts as go to prove any countenance or assistance from the Spanish authority in St. Augustine to the hostile Indians; and should you ascertain that they have afforded any, you will report the facts, properly supported by evidence, to this Department. You will also report the facts on which you ordered the issue of rations to the Indians, and the extent of the issue—I refer to the issue which is alluded to in General Jackson's letter to you of the 7th ultimo, as the Department has not yet received any information on the subject. I have, &c.

Extract of a letter from J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

SEPTEMBER 8, 1818.

I enclose a copy of my orders of the 14th ultimo to General Gaines for your information. I concur in the view which you have taken in relation to the importance of Florida to the effectual peace and security of our Southern frontier; and such, I believe, is the opinion of every member of the Administration. In fact, the grounds assumed are very far from being feeble. St. Mark's will be retained until Spain shall be ready to garrison it with a sufficient force; and Fort Gadsden, and any other position in East or West Florida, within the Indian country, which may be deemed eligible, will be retained so long as there is any danger; which, it is hoped, will afford the desired security. We ought, it is true, never to resort to timid measures to avoid war; but it appears to me that a certain degree of caution (not from the fear of the Holy Alliance) ought, at this time, to mark our policy. A war with Spain, were it to continue with her alone, and were there no great neutral Powers to avail themselves of the opportunity of embarrassing us, would be nothing; but such a war would not continue long without involving other parties, and it certainly would, in a few years, be an English war. In such a war I would not fear for the fate of our country; but, certainly, if it can be prudently and honorably avoided for the present, it ought to be. We want time—time to grow, to perfect our fortifications, to enlarge our navy, to replenish our depots, and to pay our debts. I speak to you frankly, knowing your zeal for our country, with whose glory yours is now identified. No one who has examined my political course will, I am sure, think that these opinions are influenced by timid councils.

[NOTE: The order of the 14th of August, referred to in the above extract, has been already communicated to Congress.]

FORT CRAWFORD, May 19, 1818.

DEAR SIR: Proceeding to Georgia for the purpose of bringing my family to this Territory, and desirous to provide for the safety of the inhabitants on the frontiers during my absence, I have sought an interview with the officer in command at this place. At Camp Montgomery I learned that you would probably reach this place in a few days, and indulged the hope of seeing you. An interview with you would have been to me a source of much pleasure, and I regret that my arrangements will not permit me to await your arrival.

The Indians commenced their murderous incursions on the frontier settlements in January last, when two men were killed in this neighborhood. No events occurred afterwards to excite apprehension until the 14th of March, when a house on the Federal Road, near Poplar Spring, was attacked, and eight persons killed. This intelligence reached me at Claiborne, from whence a detachment of mounted riflemen was immediately ordered to the place, for one month's service. A few days afterwards five men, while travelling the road, were fired at, and three killed; from whom fifteen hundred or two thousand dollars were taken. The people, for the most part, were flying for safety in every direction, and all communication by mail, or otherwise, with Georgia, wholly suspended. The Indians were known to be still in that quarter. In this state of things, three posts were established by my order, at which there are in the whole about one hundred men, who have instructions to scour the woods from day to day. A fortnight since they found a camp; but, on their approach, the enemy fled to a contiguous swamp, from whence they fired, and killed one man. The commanding officer informs me that he thinks the number of Indians now in the neighborhood considerable. I should have mentioned that, in April, a house, within fifteen or twenty miles of Claiborne, was attacked; the husband killed, and wife and two daughters wounded. Thirty dollars, a quantity of bacon, and every article which could be conveyed away, taken and carried to Pensacola, where I believe the murderers might still be found.

I yesterday learned that one Indian was killed, and another wounded, near the Poplar Spring. This detail of events however was probably unnecessary, as you will receive from Major Young every intelligence upon the subject. My principal object is to state that, in my efforts to protect the people over whom I preside, the territorial treasury being destitute of funds, has afforded me no supplies whatsoever; nor has it been in the power of the commanding officer here to render the aid which he has uniformly manifested the best disposition to afford. I am desirous that the troops should be considered as in the service of the United States, and the accounts adjusted when their term of service expires. One company rendezvoused at Poplar Spring, for three months' service, on the 10th April, and a detachment of twenty-five at Sepulger lately, for the same term of service. The expenditures incurred have been considerable, and altogether beyond my means of paying. You will readily perceive how unpleasant has been my situation without the means of affording the protection necessary to keep the inhabitants at their homes. The regular force in this quarter has been insufficient for the defence of the country; the militia I have not had time to organize; and, above all, not a dollar in the treasury. My views of the necessity of forwarding men and money to this section of the country have been repeatedly stated to Colonel Trimble, but I apprehend it has not been in his power to meet them.

Having endeavored in vain, with my limited resources, to arrest the enemy after their successive murders; and being satisfied that they sought refuge in Florida, I determined to raise a volunteer force, and order them to attack the hostile Indians without regard to our boundary. A part of the force is now under the command of Major Young, and Captain Stull is in possession of my order. Had I been furnished with funds, the enemy would have been driven from that retreat long before this time—persuaded as I am that it is the only effectual method of affording security to this territory.

I have this moment received intelligence which leaves no doubt of your approach to this quarter; and I shall now leave the Territory perfectly satisfied that the people will not suffer by my absence. Mr. Henry Hitchcock is appointed Territorial Secretary, and will act as Governor after I set out from Fort Jackson, which will be on the 26th or 27th of this month. I may however be detained a few days longer in arranging with the Big Warrior the reception of a party of Indians who have sued for peace, and delivered themselves to Major Young. This they did so soon as the Major convinced them, by a well-timed and well-executed expedition, that they would no longer be permitted to murder our citizens, and find refuge in the Spanish territory.

There are at this place forty volunteers, and the same number of militia at Camp Montgomery. Should you need any additional aid from the Territory it would be promptly furnished, should you notify me at Fort Jackson before my departure.

I enclose to you letters I have received from the commanding officer of the militia near Poplar Spring, which will present to you the state of things in that quarter.

Excuse this hasty scrawl, and accept the assurances of my regard and esteem.

No. 12.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 5, 1819.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the present date, enclosing a communication from the chairman of the committee of the Senate, requesting of you a copy of the letter addressed by Major White Young to Governor Mazot, on the 27th April, 1818. Not having received a report from Major Young relative to the correspondence with Governor Mazot, or his attack on the hostile Indians in the vicinity of Pensacola, the only information I possess on the subject is contained in the letter of Governor Bibb, dated on the 19th of May, 1818, to which I beg leave to refer to you.

On my return from Suwanee to St. Mark's, I was informed (through the medium of Mr. Hamblly) by the captain of a vessel direct from Pensacola, that a number of hostile Indians had assembled at that place. On interrogating the captain, he reluctantly stated that, at the time of his sailing, there were in Pensacola four hundred and fifty or five hundred Indians; that they had been fed and furnished with munitions of war, and were committing depredations on the persons and property of the citizens on the frontiers of Alabama, and also on the subjects of Spain. After receiving this information I informed you, in my letter dated at St. Mark's, on the 26th April, that I should leave that place for Fort Gadsden in two or three days, and, after making all necessary arrangements for the security of the position occupied, and detaching a force to scour the country west of the Appalachicola, I should proceed direct to Nashville. I then ordered Captain Sands to Mobile, to prepare and hold in readiness a train of artillery, should circumstances arising out of facts disclosed render its use in the field necessary. On this occasion, as on all others, I thought it my duty to be prepared fully to execute my orders in putting an end to the conflict.

On my arrival at Fort Gadsden my quartermaster general, Colonel George Gibson, who was charged with the defence of that post, handed me several letters, brought from Fort Montgomery by Major Hogan, from respectable citizens, confirming the report made by the captain of the schooner while at St. Mark's, and detailing the murder of eighteen of our citizens on the Sepulger, and the destruction of a family near Fort Claiborne. Major Hogan also confirmed this information, and added that the citizens at Montgomery were fortifying themselves. Similar information was received from two gentlemen who arrived in a vessel laden with sutler's stores for the troops at Fort Gadsden, but whose names are not now recollected, and by the captains of the sloop Hector and barge Peacock, direct from Mobile. In addition to the foregoing I was shown a letter (confidentially written) from a person of high respectability in Pensacola, detailing the facts as stated by the captain of the schooner at St. Mark's.

This information, corroborated by so many persons, determined me to go in person to Pensacola; and I ordered Colonel Gibson forthwith to Mobile, with instructions to give every facility to Captain Sands in having the artillery secretly moved to Fort Montgomery, there to await my orders; and immediately organized a force sufficient for the execution of my orders, under date of 26th December, 1817.

After crossing the Choctawhatchy, I despatched an Indian guide with a soldier express to Fort Crawford, with orders to Colonel Gibson and Captain Sands, at Fort Montgomery, to move on the artillery, and form a junction with me after I crossed the Escambia river; which order was promptly executed. On my reaching the Escambia I was met by Captain Boyle, express from Governor Bibb, with the letter of the 19th of May above mentioned, and, on reaching the west bank, received information that Holmes and his warriors were then in Pensacola, for which place I immediately marched. For my proceedings thereafter I refer you to my detailed report.

Should you wish information on any other points growing out of my military operations during that campaign, it will afford me much pleasure to give it to you.

I am sir, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

FORT COVINGTON, NEAR BALTIMORE,
February 5, 1819.

SIR: Yesterday I had the honor to receive your letter of the 3d instant, on the subject of the late war with the Seminole Indians, and, in answer to your interrogatories, on all of which I am unable to give you the information required. I was however, with the troops at Fort Scott, under the command of General Gaines, at the commencement of hostilities. I was never ordered with any detachment to remove the Indians from the lands of the United States. Brevet Major Twiggs, of the 7th regiment United States' infantry, commanded the first detachment that visited the Indian village called Fowltown, situated on the east side of Flint river, by the order of the General; the nature of his orders I know not, neither can I say who fired the first gun. I understood at the time, that, on the approach of our troops, the Indians fled from their houses to an adjacent swamp; they were fired on, and two warriors and, unfortunately, one woman were killed; there was one prisoner taken by the detachment, on its march to Fowltown, and who was afterwards confined as a prisoner at Fort Scott. This detachment brought, on their return, three or four Indian horses.

The second detachment that visited the village of Fowltown, was placed under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle, of the 7th infantry, who, on a near approach, detached me with a command to advance on the village by a different route from that which he took; my orders from him were to take prisoners, if possible, but if an attempt to escape was made, to fire; and to examine all the buildings for corn. We were, however, discovered when within two hundred yards, and the Indians took to flight, giving the war whoop, and firing alarm guns. Corn, cattle, and other provisions, I have no hesitation in saying, was the object of this visit. We had one or two wagons with the detachment, which were loading with corn from the cribs of the Indians, when an attack was commenced by them, in which we had one man killed; as the Indians fought in the edge of the swamp, their loss was not ascertained, otherwise than by their own acknowledgment, which was afterwards said to be five or six warriors killed. We brought off all the corn which we conveniently could, and, perhaps, fifteen or eighteen head of cattle, and a few horses. Previous to our return to Fort Scott, the detachment was halted on the Flint river, three miles from Fowltown, and twelve from Fort Scott, where they remained four or five days in building a small picket work, called Fort Hughes. The provisions thus taken was just sufficient for the support of the troops during their absence from Fort Scott.

The third and last visit paid the village by our troops, was during the absence of General Gaines, who was at Amelia Island. This detachment was also commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle, and, on our arrival, finding the place entirely abandoned by the Indians, it was destroyed by fire.

The horses taken by the detachment under Major Twiggs, as well as those taken by that under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Arbuckle, were considered of no value, but were ordered by the General to be turned into the quartermaster's hands. I afterwards saw some of them in his possession; others were claimed by the friendly Indians as their property, which were given up to them by the General's order. I believe, sir, that this is all the information which it is in my power to give on the subject that you have requested. I am, sir, &c.

JOHN N. MCINTOSH,
Captain 4th regt. U. S. Inf.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Milledgeville, Ga. Feb. 6, 1817.

SIR: I understand that the 4th regiment of the United States' infantry, which, for some time past, has been stationed on the frontier of this State, near the junction of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, is ordered to Fort Montgomery, on the waters of Mobile, and I have not heard of any other troops being ordered to supply their place. By this movement, not only the frontier of Georgia is left without defence, but the restless and dissatisfied part of the Creeks, who are concentrated within the Spanish line, and at no great distance from the post (Camp Crawford) lately occupied by the 4th regiment, under Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, will be without any check, and I have no doubt will indulge their propensity for mischief, by acts of murder or rapine, upon defenceless travellers and frontier settlers. It is a fact well known to Lieutenant Colonel Clinch, and to every officer with him at Camp Crawford, that nothing has kept those Seminole Indians, who have been joined by the most inveterate of the hostile fellows from the upper towns in check, but the presence of the troops; and, if they are removed, some serious consequences are to be apprehended. Besides, it is very evident that, by the removal of the troops from Camp Crawford and the neighboring country, that portion of the territory acquired by Jackson's treaty, as it is usually called, lying east of the Chatahoochee, and which, of course, falls to Georgia, will be abandoned to the Indians.

Against measures which, in my judgment, will produce these results, it is my duty, as chief magistrate of Georgia, to protest. I am very far, however, from believing that it is the intention of the President, with knowledge of the fact, to leave Georgia, as a frontier State, on the Indians and the Spanish provinces of Florida, unprotected; and that if the removal of the troops, under Lieutenant Colonel Clinch has been by him deemed indispensable, he will order their place to be supplied by a competent force.

I have to request that the substance of this letter may be communicated to the President, and that his determination thereon may be transmitted to the Executive of Georgia, with as little delay as possible. I am, sir, &c.

D. B. MITCHELL.

Hon. the SECRETARY OF WAR.

No. 15.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,
Milledgeville, Feb. 5, 1817.

SIR: Understanding that you are thus far on your way to Fort Montgomery, I avail myself of the present opportunity to communicate some facts, in the expectation that you will have it in your power, if your judgment approve, to adopt the measures I am about to propose.

You, no doubt, have already been informed that the notorious Woodbine has recently made his appearance again at the mouth of the Appalachicola, and that he has an agent now among the Seminole Indians and negroes in that quarter, stirring them up to acts of hostility against this country; and that Woodbine himself has gone in an armed vessel to some part of the West Indies for supplies. Connected with this fact is another, which may serve as an intimation of the future conduct of these people, when once in possession of the supplies, which it is said they expect on the return of Woodbine. About ten or twelve days ago, a small party of those Indians entered the frontier of Wayne county, and stole two horses and some cattle. They were pursued by some of the inhabitants, who peaceably demanded a restoration of the stolen property, and, instead of a compliance on the part of the Indians, they immediately fired upon the whites, who retired without firing a shot; one of the whites was mortally wounded.

Before this last circumstance came to my knowledge, I had addressed the acting Secretary of War, and desired the contents of my letter to be communicated to the President, in which I represented the evil consequences that were likely to result to Georgia, in particular, by the removal of the 4th regiment from Camp Crawford, without their place being supplied by an adequate force from some other quarter; and requested the order for the removal of that regiment might be countermanded, or their place supplied. To this communication there has not yet been time to receive an answer. One object of my present address is to know if you cannot suspend the march of the 4th regiment until I can hear from the War Department, if you do not feel authorized or disposed to order them back to their former station at Camp Crawford. Another object of the present address grows out of the following fact: some of our people have gone over the Ocklawaha, and settled between that river and the line run under the late treaty with the Creeks, on or near Goose creek, of which the Indians complain. I have appointed an agent to go and order them off, and bring me the names of all such as refuse to move from the Indian land. I am doubtful from the character of those intruders, that they will not remove without force is used to compel them; and it is doubtful whether I can legally apply that force; and the United States can. I have to request, if consistent with your duty, or the orders of the General Government, that you will order a detachment of troops to proceed to the spot, and remove those intruders. I am unwilling to give the Indians any just cause of complaint against us, and the more so, because I am determined, as long as I hold the station I now occupy, never to permit any aggression on their part to pass with impunity. I hold it a good rule, however, "to do as I would be done by," and am desirous of conforming to this rule in the present instance. I am, sir, yours, &c.

D. B. MITCHELL.

Major Gen. EDMUND P. GAINES.

No. 16.

Having been summoned to attend a committee of the honorable the Senate of the United States, to give evidence touching the Seminole war, I did attend accordingly, and, after a verbal statement, and examination by the committee, the following questions were asked me, with a request that I would answer in writing:

First, as to "the origin of the Seminole war, and the Fowltown affair."

It is, no doubt, within the knowledge of the honorable the committee, that, during the late war with the British and Creeks, posts were established and occupied on the Appalachicola by British officers and agents, and a considerable force there organized for the purpose of annoying the Southern frontier of the United States. It is also known that the hostile Indians of the Creek war, who had not embraced the terms of peace proposed by General Pinckney, and finally settled by the treaty of Fort Jackson, had taken shelter in the Floridas. From their resentment, and the motley crew collected by Nicholls, much mischief was to be apprehended by the inhabitants on the frontier of Georgia; and the post of Fort Scott, situate in the fork of the Flint and Chatahoochee rivers, and near their junction, was established and occupied by a considerable force of United States troops, for the protection of that frontier; and the same troops, with the aid of some naval force which ascended the Appalachicola, destroyed a fort about sixty miles below, built by Colonel Nicholls, occupied and defended by negroes. The blowing up of this fort, with its negro garrison, (for, except a few Choctaw Indians, who were taken, it is believed that no other Indians were in the fort,) had a salutary influence in restraining the fugitives from the Creek war, and those under the influence of Nicholls and his partisans. I say the fugitives from the Creek war and the partisans of Nicholls, because it is well understood that the Seminoles took no part in the Creek war, unless the receipt of goods, &c. from Nicholls or his sub-agents be considered as proof of this fact; but the truth is, they will receive presents from any party, without any intention of adopting his projects; and such, I have no doubt, was the case with the Seminoles upon this occasion. The troops occupying Fort Scott were, however, soon after removed, and the post abandoned, or so nearly so, that it was in the power of the Indians at any time, to have destroyed it. Filling, at that time, the Executive chair of Georgia, I addressed the then Secretary of War on the subject of the removal of the troops, pointing out some of the evils which were likely to result, and urging the necessity of the re-occupation of the post by a respectable force. To this communication an answer was received, by which I was informed that, although it was the intention of the Government to concentrate a respectable force further to the west, yet it never was contemplated to leave the frontier of Georgia exposed.

The peace of the frontier of Georgia has always been exposed and disturbed, more or less, by acts of violence, committed as well by the whites as the Indians; and a spirit of retaliation has mutually prevailed. These petty acts of aggression were increased and multiplied by a set of lawless and abandoned characters, who had taken refuge on both sides of the St. Mary's river, living principally by plunder. I believe the first outrage committed on the frontier of Georgia, after the treaty of Fort Jackson, was by these banditti, who plundered a party of the Seminole Indians, on their way to Georgia for the purpose of trade, and killed one of them. This produced retaliation on the part of the Indians, and hence the killing of Mrs. Garret and her child. The evidence of these plunderings and murders is on the files of the Executive of Georgia.

Early in March, 1817, I resigned the Government of Georgia, and accepted my present appointment; and, in July, of the same year, called a general meeting of the Creek nation, at Fort Hawkins. At this meeting I endeavored to impress upon the minds of the Indians the necessity, on their part, of preserving peace; that many of the people of the lower towns had been led astray by evil counsel, had received presents from the British agent, Colonel Nicholls; and although it was acknowledged that they had not taken an active part with the Red Sticks in the Creek war, yet their conduct had made them, in some measure, obnoxious to the friendly part of their own nation, and to the United States; and that it was the duty of the friendly chiefs to reclaim those people, and restrain the restless spirits among them, whose conduct might eventually, if not checked in time, bring them into much trouble, if not utter ruin; assuring them, at the same time, that the United States would punctually fulfil all their engagements with them, of which I had then given them substantial proof; and that all, except murderers, who should return to their duty, and renew their friendly relations with the nation, should receive protection and forgiveness.

I state these particulars on account of their connexion with what immediately follows: About the last of August of the same year, say something more than one month after the meeting at Fort Hawkins, I received a letter from Major Twigg, then at Fort Scott, dated the 4th of that month, written, as he says, at the request of the chiefs of three towns near that place, expressive of their willingness to agree to the talk delivered by me, in July, at Fort Hawkins. A copy of Major Twigg's letter, and the memorandum enclosed therein, is herewith exhibited. Of the three towns referred to, the Fowltown was one; but, before I had an opportunity of sending for those chiefs, or of taking any measures for meeting their proposition, General Gaines arrived with a detachment of troops from the West, sent for the chief of Fowltown, and for his contumacy in not immediately appearing before him, the town was attacked and destroyed by the troops of the United States, by order of General Gaines. This fact was, I conceive, the immediate cause of the Seminole war. The reasons assigned for the destruction of Fowltown, in addition to the contumacy of the chief, were, the refusal of the chiefs of the Seminoles to give up some murderers, and the hostile aspect which they had assumed. Of this demand and refusal I know nothing more than what has been published; but truth compels me to say, that, before the attack on Fowltown, aggressions of this kind were as frequent on the part of the whites as on the part of the Indians, the evidence of which can be furnished from the files of the Executive of Georgia, to which I have before referred.

The second question put by the committee is,

"the organization of McIntosh's brigade, how and by whom done, with a roster of the field and other officers; with the notice thereof given to the War Department; what answer, if any, was received?"

At the meeting at Fort Hawkins, in July, 1817, Colonel Brearly, of the 7th Infantry, attended, and stated to me that he was directed by General Gaines to apply for the assistance or services of General McIntosh and five or six hundred of his friendly warriors, in case he should go against the Seminoles. I immediately communicated the application to the chiefs in council, and received for answer that they would leave that business to McIntosh and myself. I then told McIntosh that he must hold himself and his warriors in readiness to join the United States' troops whenever ordered. This he readily agreed to. Whether I received a written communication from General Gaines upon this subject or not, I do not recollect; but I was told by some one that he had written to McIntosh for his assistance. However, before a call was made on the warriors to take the field, I received a letter from the then acting Secretary of War, communicating the fact to me that General Gaines was prohibited from crossing the Spanish line, without a special order from that Department. This I considered as notice, or rather as an order, to me not to permit the friendly warriors to cross the line under sanction of, or in the service of, the United States. This letter, I think I received some time in November; and a meeting of the chiefs having been called by the Little Prince, to take into consideration the affair of Fowltown, I informed them of the determination of the Government in this particular, and desired them to remain quiet until they heard from me again. This meeting was held in December, at the Broken Arrow, on the Chatahoochee; and, on my return to the Agency, I fell in with General Gaines to whom I communicated the contents of the Acting Secretary's letter and the course I had taken with the Indians. The General then informed me that he had received the order spoken of, but that, from the representations he had made, he did not doubt but that the prohibition to crossing the Spanish line would be removed. I had appointed another meeting with the Indians, to take place at the Agency, at the end of twenty-five days, expecting to hear from the War Department in the meantime; but, upon the subject of crossing the Spanish line, I received no immediate answer. A meeting was accordingly held at the Agency, which commenced on the 9th of January, 1819, at which Colonel Brearly attended; and, although he brought no communication in writing from General Gaines, yet he informed me that he knew the prohibition to crossing the Spanish line had been withdrawn, and that General Gaines had ordered him to muster as many of the friendly Indians into service as were willing to engage. Arrangements were immediately made, and a day assigned, for enrolling the friendly warriors, and Colonel Brearly attended at Fort Mitchell, for that purpose, and there mustered the greater part of them. Some companies were mustered into service at several other places, which were more convenient for the purpose, owing to the local situation of the Indians. The first organization was that of a regiment; but, on getting into the field, they were recognised by General Jackson as a brigade. All these proceedings were communicated to the War Department from time to time, to some of which answers were received, and some not. The rolls made out on mustering the brigade out of service are in the office of the Paymaster General, or, at least, were sent to that office by me. The staff of the brigade consisted of one brigadier general, two colonels, two lieutenant colonels, two majors, one assistant adjutant general, four assistant commissaries of purchases, and one aid-de-camp, who was omitted in the muster roll. The force of the brigade about fifteen hundred strong.

The third question put by the committee, is, "The force of the hostile Seminole Indians."

From the accounts I have been able to receive, from Indians and others, I have never estimated the number of the Seminoles at more than seven hundred warriors, and I doubt whether they have that number, exclusive of those towns on the Chatahoochee who were considered hostile during that war. The negroes have been estimated at two hundred and fifty or three hundred effective.

When General McIntosh and his warriors were mustered at Fort Mitchell, he divided his force, and, with that part which he retained under his own command, he descended the Chatahoochee on the western bank, and, on reaching the town called Red Ground, encountered their chief and warriors. In this affair he took fifty-three warriors, and one hundred and thirty women and children. The chief made his escape with a few warriors. Colonel Lovett, with the rest of the warriors mustered at Fort Mitchell, descended the Chatahoochee on the eastern bank, and, General McIntosh crossing the river below the fork, the two detachments united on their march to Mickasukee, where they all joined General Jackson. At Mickasukee, the Indians had generally fled, and but few were found at the town. On the march to Suwanee, McIntosh, with his warriors, encountered about two hundred of the hostile party, under Peter McQueen, of whom he killed thirty-seven, and made six warriors and one hundred and six women and children prisoners. The next enemy engaged were the negroes at Suwanee, amounting to about two hundred and fifty, of whom eleven or twelve were killed, and three made prisoners. The Indians of this part of the country fled before the army, and here ended the Seminole campaign, as far as the Indians were concerned. I will here observe that the Mickasukee Indians are not considered by the Creek nation as Seminoles. Those Indians under Bowlegs, are the only ones considered by them as Seminoles, although, in speaking generally of the Seminoles, in relation to the Seminole war, I include all the Indians who had a share in that war.

Being asked what became of the prisoners taken by McIntosh, I answer, they were generally sent into the nation, and are now there.

ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General of the southern division of the Army of the United States, being duly sworn, testifies, that, in the Summer of 1817, Mr. John Donnelson, of the neighborhood of Nashville, went to Pensacola and purchased lots of land there, with the approbation of the Governor. That the deponent has heard that Mr. James Jackson of Nashville was concerned with him, and was the only person concerned. He also understood that Donnelson's first view in going to Pensacola, was for the benefit of his health. That Mr. Donnelson is nephew of General Jackson's wife. That he does not know the amount of Donnelson's purchase. That he does not know, nor does he believe, that General Jackson had, or expected to have, any interest in said purchase; nor did he ever hear it suggested.

The deponent further saith, that there were two regiments of mounted gun-men, volunteers, raised by General Jackson in January, 1818. That General Jackson appointed the colonels, and most or all of the field officers. That Colonel Haynes appointed the platoon and staff officers. That there were also two companies of volunteers, called life guards, who appointed their own officers, and tendered their services to the General, by whom they were accepted. Tha according to the best of the deponent's recollection, the Governor of Tennessee was at Nashville at the time the officers of the gun-men were appointed.

That General Jackson's first determination to go to Pensacola was made at Fort Gadsden, after his return from Suwanee, and was made in consequence of information that there were, on or about the 15th of April, five hundred hostile Indians at Pensacola, who received ammunition and provisions from the Governor; and, also, information of several murders having been committed on the Federal road. That, on the march to Pensacola, General Jackson told the deponent, that if, on his arrival, he found the information true he would demand the surrender of the place. That, at Fort Gadsden, General Jackson saw a letter, which deponent thinks was from Innerarity, one of the house of Forbes, Leslie, & Co. at Pensacola, to Doyle, a trader, then at Fort Gadsden, giving information as to the number of Indians at Pensacola. That the letter also stated, that the property of the people of Pensacola was every day depredated on by the Indians. That, when General Jackson formed the determination to go to Pensacola, he ordered Lieutenant Sands to Mobile, to prepare artillery, to meet him after he should have crossed the Escambia, on his march to Pensacola, which order was executed.

That, at the time the army attacked Mickasukee, there were not more than five hundred Indian warriors embodied; nor does the deponent believe there were, at any time during the war, more than five or six hundred embodied at any one place. That, from the nature of the subject, this statement must be conjectural. That the enemy's warriors were in general well armed. That deponent was told there were about thirteen hundred souls at Suwanee, of which two hundred and fifty or three hundred were fighting men. That our army had one man killed and four wounded, in actions with the Indians, during the campaign, and two killed at the Barancas.

Deponent further says, that General Jackson received from a private source, a plan of the fortress of St. Augustine; and, as the deponent believes, it was sent to the General, at St. Marks, or Fort Gadsden, after his return from Suwanee.

That General Jackson had under his command, in Florida, about eighteen hundred militia, volunteers, and regulars, and fifteen hundred Indians under McIntosh. That these Indians were received into the service while General Gaines commanded, and were regularly mustered, in and out of service, by the United States officers.

No. 18.

Colonel GEORGE GIBSON, of the United States Army, being duly sworn, testifies and says, that he acted as quartermaster general in General Jackson's campaign against the Seminoles. That, on the 29th day of January, 1818, at New Orleans, he received an order from General Jackson to procure, and bring to Fort Scott a supply of rations, ordnance, and quartermaster's and hospital stores. That he joined the General at Fort Gadsden, on the 25th of March. That the General then placed him in command of the post, with orders to send stores round to Fort St. Mark's, which was done. That, in April, Major Hogan, paymaster, joined the army. He brought information of the murders committed in Alabama, and on the Sapogus, a branch of the Conecuh, by the Indians. About the same time information was brought by the sloop Hector to Fort Gadsden, from Mobile, that a large number of Indians were in Pensacola. This was confirmed by Captain Rogers, of the Peacock, from Mobile. In consequence of this information, the deponent held the transport in readiness, and sent thirty-three thousand rations to Fort Scott, believing, from the information he had, that the army would move to the West. On the arrival of General Jackson the deponent gave him the above-mentioned information, and a number of letters on the subject of the Indian war to the westward of the Appalachicola. That, on the 6th of May, the General ordered the deponent to Mobile, by water, with instructions to send artillery and ammunition to Fort Montgomery, and to be there ready himself to meet him with artillery, forage, and provisions. The General was to advise the deponent by express of the point at which he was to meet him. That the deponent accordingly received an express, and met the General twelve miles from Pensacola. The deponent further says, that he thinks it probable, that news of the assemblage of Indians at Pensacola reached General Jackson at or near St. Mark's by a schooner which went from Pensacola, and was sent by Innerarity, and was a trading schooner loaded with sutler's stores. That she arrived at Fort Gadsden, after leaving St. Mark's, between the 1st and 4th of May. That Lieutenant Sands was sent from St. Mark's to Mobile for ammunition and artillery, as deponent understood and believes, and conducted it to an artillery officer. That the army entered Pensacola on the day after the deponent joined, viz: on the twenty-third day of May.

That the deponent was at New Orleans at the time Captain Call was sent to Pensacola in February. That the schooner Italiana arrived at Pensacola in January with a load of provisions from the contractor, which were landed at Pensacola, and the duties paid by Innerarity, that a few months before this the contractor had been refused permission to send provisions up the Escambia, and had been obliged to carry them by land from Fort Montgomery to Fort Crawford. That, in the opinion of the deponent, it was impracticable to supply Fort Crawford in the Winter by land, and as that place was in a suffering condition for want of provisions, the attempt was renewed by water. That it is about sixty miles from Fort Montgomery to Fort Crawford. That Arbuthnot's schooner, as deponent understood, was given by him to Colonel Brady, who assisted him in his trial, and was sold, as he heard, for about three or four hundred dollars.

Statement of Doctor Bronaugh.

I was attached to General Jackson's staff during the whole Seminole campaign. At St. Mark's the General received information, by a vessel from Pensacola, of a large number of Indians having collected there; where they were furnished with provisions, arms, and munitions of war. Believe that Captain Sands was sent from St. Mark's for Mobile, in quest of a train of artillery, to have it at Fort Montgomery, subject to the General's orders. I understood from the General that he would have all his arrangements made and entered into, that everything might be in complete readiness, provided he should ultimately come to the conclusion to visit Pensacola. I am impressed with the belief that an actual determination to occupy this place, and the Barancas, was never formed until the protest of Governor Mazot was received on the line of March.

RICHARD K. CALL, captain United States 1st infantry, acting as an aid to General Jackson, being duly sworn, testifies and says, that, in the campaign against the Seminoles, he first joined General Jackson at Fort Gadsden, and afterwards, on the arrival of the Tennessee volunteers, he joined him again near St. Mark's; that he understood that General Jackson determined upon going to Pensacola, on hearing that the Governor of that place had protested against the passage of supplies up the Escambia river, and in consequence of subsequent information relative to the assemblage of Indians at Pensacola; that the deponent had been at Pensacola by orders of Colonel Trimble, commanding at New Orleans; that he arrived there on the 21st of February, 1818, and remained there until the 26th; that his orders were to obtain a passage for supplies up the Escambia to Fort Crawford; that the Governor of Pensacola stated to the deponent, that he considered it unsafe for him to give the privilege asked for, as he was under great apprehensions, if he did so, the Indians would take possession of St. Mark's, or give the Spaniards in that place great annoyance; that deponent made report of the above to Colonel Trimble, and also gave information of this protest or objection of the Governor to General Jackson; that, on the return of the army from Suwanee, Lieutenant Sands was sent from St. Mark's to Mobile for cannon; that, at Fort Gadsden or St. Marks, deponent heard that General Jackson had a letter from Innerarity to Doyle or Hambly, informing that there were a number of hostile Indians at Pensacola; the number he thinks was said to be five hundred.

Deponent further says, that Arbuthnot's schooner was given by him to Colonel William Brady, who, as the deponent understood, defended him before the court-martial; that he does not know what became of the property on board of the schooner, consisting of skins and some wearing apparel, among which was Ambrister's uniform; that the property taken at Suwanee consisted principally of horses and cattle; that the army subsisted on the cattle, and that the other property was given to the friendly Indians; that the negroes taken were given to the Indians; that, as he understood, Colonel Arbuckle gave fifty dollars a head to the Indians for every negro delivered to him at Fort Gadsden, intending to deliver them to their owners when called for. Deponent further says, that General Starks, from Georgia, purchased some of the surrendered property.

Statement of John H. Eaton.

Some time in the Fall of 1817, I proposed to Mr. James Jackson, of Nashville, to join with me in the purchase of lots in Pensacola, and lands in and about there: he united with me; and six other gentlemen were afterwards associated. We employed John Donnelson (who became also concerned) to proceed to Pensacola and make the purchases, taking care not to extend them beyond sixteen thousand dollars. My inducement to making this adventure was, that I believed the country would ultimately belong to the United States, and I was impressed with the belief that it would be at no distant period; this, however, was a mere impression, and founded on information derived from no source except my own opinions.

I proposed asking a letter of introduction from General Jackson to the Governor of Pensacola, which the General gave; this was thought by us necessary from a knowledge that the Indians frequently interrupted American citizens while in that city; and this danger we believed would be avoided by having the protection of the Governor, which we supposed could and would be attained by introductory letters from respectable sources. I think it was some time in November that Mr. Donnelson proceeded on his mission from Nashville, in company with a Mr. Gordon, who we employed to go with him.

The purchases were made, consisting of a number of unimproved lots in Pensacola, sixty acres of ground adjoining the town, on the lower side, and about two thousand acres on the bay two or three miles out. The deeds I have seen, and are now at Nashville, written in the Spanish language, made to Mr. Donnelson, and by him since conveyed to the eight gentlemen interested originally. Mr. Donnelson stated to me that his first purchase was refused to be acquiesced in by the Governor of Pensacola, alleging that American citizens should not buy lands there; his objection, however, was withdrawn afterwards, and Mr. Donnelson was permitted to go on and complete his purchases.

I aver that General Jackson is not, nor ever was, in any manner concerned with this company; nor was it entered into from any conversation, hint, or opinion ever given by General

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &amp;c.

Jackson, but arose entirely from the circumstances first stated in this affidavit—the belief that the country would, ere long, belong to this Government; and that, if so, the speculation would prove a beneficial one.

The eight gentlemen concerned are as follows:

James Jackson, sen.,	John McCray,
James Jackson, jr.,	John Jackson,
John H. Eaton,	Thos. Childress,
John C. McLemore,	John Donnelson.

The above gentlemen bearing the same name are in nowise connected or related to General Jackson; the General, in fact, has no relatives; all his family having perished during the Revolutionary war, in this country, as I have ever understood. Mr. Donnelson is nephew to Mrs. Jackson, the wife of General Jackson.

Question. Did you have any conversation with General Jackson before or after getting his orders to go to the Seminole war?

Answer. After getting his orders I did not; shortly after our association was formed I saw General Jackson, and named to him what had been done; and his remark was, that he had no doubt but that our project would turn out advantageously, or in words to this effect; but General Jackson's opinion rested on no better foundation than our own, a belief prevailing through the country at that time that the country was about to be ceded. Many purchases were made in Pensacola last Fall, I have understood, founded, no doubt, on this general public impression.

Colonel King to Major General Jackson.

PENSACOLA, October 15, 1818.

SIR: Captain Boyles returned to this place on the 13th, having been wounded in an affair with a party of hostile Indians near the Choctawhatchy.

He reports, that, on the 6th instant, he left his boats in Yellow Water, and, with a detachment of twenty-two men on foot, pursued a party of Indians whose track he had discovered. He overtook them on the 8th, about twenty-five in number, attacked and defeated them, killing four, wounding many, and making some prisoners. A large quantity of ammunition, and all their plunder, fell into his hands.

The following morning, just before day, the party defeated the day before, supposed to have been reinforced, attacked him in his camp; but he succeeded in repulsing them with loss, notwithstanding one-half of his men fled at the first onset, and were never again brought into action. In this affair, the captain himself received a musket ball in the side, and had one of his men dangerously wounded; this, together with the want of provisions, compelled him to return to Pensacola, bringing with him sixteen prisoners. He reports to have made seven scalps during the expedition.

The rangers being very much fatigued, I shall permit them to rest a few days. I hope Captain Boyles will be sufficiently recovered to resume his command. I shall then once more order him to the Choctawhatchy, where he is of opinion a party is concealed, of from forty to fifty warriors, who have resolved never to surrender, confiding in the expected return of the Spaniards, when they are sure of protection and supplies, and will again commence their depredations on our settlements. This expedition, I flatter myself, of Captain Boyles's will disappoint and render them harmless, before the province is evacuated.

I cannot close this communication without again calling your attention to the meritorious conduct of Captain Boyles. In zeal, activity, and perseverance, he is surpassed by no partisan I have ever known.

W. KING, Col. 4th regiment.

Major Gen. A. JACKSON,
Com. Division of the South.

Major Fanning, commanding St. Mark's, to Major General Gaines.

FORT ST. MARK'S, EAST FLORIDA.

November 27, 1818.

SIR: From an Indian family arrived here yesterday, from Tampa Bay, I learn that the Seminoles have received from St. Augustine ten pack-horse loads of ammunition, and that it was distributed among them sixteen days ago. That an English trading vessel was at Tampa a month since. Some provisions and ammunition were procured from her by the enemy. That, ten days past, two English trading vessels were at Snake island, not far from the mouth of Sukaney river.

Thus, there can be but little doubt of the Seminoles being now well supplied with ammunition and provisions.

The Spaniards recommended to the enemy united and vigorous operations against us, telling them that they themselves were going to take St. Marks, which they expected to do without fighting, in the same manner it was taken from them. That from St. Mark's they would go to Fort Gadsden, where they expected some little resistance, and finally to Pensacola.

These circumstances have put new life among the Sukaney Indians, but Kinbajah says he has heard such talks too long, and that he will collect his people and go back to his old situation, and be on friendly terms with the United States. The other Indians who left their towns and went to Sukaney, during our last campaign, are moving, or about to move, back again, and wish to have nothing further to do with the war.

There is too much appearance of truth in this relation, not to deserve attention; and, in conformity to the spirit of the general order of the 16th September, I shall not give up this post to the Spaniards, should they arrive, until I may be convinced of the falsehood of the report respecting their conduct, or until I may receive orders so to do from superior authority.

Extract of a letter from General Jackson to the Secretary of War, dated

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, November 28, 1818.

I enclose you a copy of a letter from Colonel King, detailing a conflict between Capt. Boyles, of the Rangers, and a detachment of hostile warriors. The conduct of the captain, in this affair, was meritorious, and I trust, ere this, he has recovered from his wound, and disappointed the hopes of the warriors of the Choctawhatchy. A short time since every mail from the South reported the pleasing intelligence of the general submission of the Seminoles; the cause of the resumption of hostilities is stated in the Colonel's communication. The fact that the news of the restoration of Pensacola to Spain had revived their hopes, and again excited them to war, is an additional evidence of the propriety of my operations in the Floridas, and has confirmed me in my unalterable opinion, that the Seminole conflict could not have been terminated by any other means than those adopted. My only apprehensions are, that my operations were not sufficiently extensive to insure permanent tranquillity in the South. St. Augustine is still in possession of the Spaniards, and the whole peninsula is beyond the control of our garrisons. The situation of Florida, in relation to our country, is peculiar, and demands the early attention of our Government. Bordering almost on the Creek nation, and within the vicinity of the four southern tribes of Indians, her territory will always prove an asylum to the disaffected and restless savages, as well as to a more dangerous population, unless some energetic Government can be established to control or exclude these interlopers. The savages and negroes who have not submitted to our authority have fled east of the Suwanoy river, and whether settled in the Atoch-away plains, near St. Augustine, or more southwardly, we have yet to learn. Their force, no doubt, is too inconsiderable to create any serious disturbances with this country; but, if unmolested, they may acquire confidence with their strength, and prove a destructive enemy to our frontier settlers. They should be pursued before they recover from the panic of our last operations.

I submit to your consideration military operations for this Spring, connected with the occupancy of the bay of Tampa. The plan proposed is to embark, from Fort Gadsden or Pensacola, five hundred regulars, for the bay of Tampa, together with a force, say one hundred and fifty or two hundred men, adequate to the maintaining of the work to be constructed at that point. Simultaneous with this movement, to push a force of five or six hundred men up to the St. John's, and occupy a position at or near the old Indian town Pecolota. This force, as soon as strongly fortified, to be actively employed in scouring the country as far west as Suwanoy, forcing to, or receiving the submission of the hostile Indians, who will be sent into the interior of the Creek nation. The troops detached to the bay of Tampa having constructed and garrisoned a suitable work, having reconnoitered the neighboring country, and destroyed Woodbine's negro establishment, to march to the position occupied on the St. John's, deviating only where Indian villages or settlements (if there are any in the country) invite their attention. From the best information I can collect, the march from Tampa to the point proposed on the St. John's would not exceed seven days. Each man, from my own experience, can march with eight days' rations on his back, which, with due economy, will last twelve—time sufficient to perform the operation intended. The expense of the expedition would be trifling, as it is proposed that none but regulars should be employed, and the advantage to the nation incalculable, as finally crushing savage hostilities in the South, and affording active service to some of our regiments who have grown sluggish from the inactivity of garrison duties.

Major General Gaines to Governor Coppingier.

HEADQ'RS, AMELIA ISLAND,
December 28, 1818.

Sir: I have received information that Augustus Santee, a sergeant of the United States artillery, who had obtained from his commanding officer a temporary leave of absence, was a few days since fired on, arrested, and imprisoned, by a party of armed men at St. John's, headed by a person assuming the rank and character of a Spanish officer.

It is likewise reported, that two citizens of the United States were by the same party fired on, wounded, and imprisoned; and that the perpetrators of this outrage, with a view to shelter their conduct under the veil of Spanish authority, took the sergeant and citizen by force towards St. Augustine, whither it was understood they were to be carried, under a pretext that they would there be arraigned and tried as offenders.

Presuming that the information given me upon this subject is correct, I hasten to demand of you the immediate liberation of the sergeant and citizens thus arrested, wounded, and imprisoned, within your government.

Major James M. Glassell, of the general staff of the army of the United States, is instructed to hand you this letter, and to take charge of, and order to this place, the persons confined; and, by this officer, I shall expect to receive from you a proper explanation, with the assurance that the perpetrators of this outrage will be punished as its enormity demands. I have, &c.

E. P. GAINES, Maj. Gen. com'd'g.

His Ex'y Gov. COPPINGIER, St. Augustine.

HEADQ'RS, FERNANDINA, E. F.,
December 29, 1818.

Sir: I have received information from several persons, lately from St. Augustine, that a party of armed men, headed by a person called Captain Miller, assuming the rank and authority of a Spanish officer, about the 23d instant, fired upon Augustus Santee, a sergeant of the United States artillery, with two citizens of the State of Georgia. The sergeant had obtained a short leave of absence, to accompany his brother on a visit to St. John's. This brother and the other citizen are reported to have been badly wounded. The sergeant and one of his companions (the other being unable to travel) were seen on the 24th, marching under guard towards St. Augustine.

I have addressed a note to Governor Coppingier, demanding the immediate liberation of the sergeant and other persons confined; a copy is enclosed herewith, marked No. 1.

The Captain Miller above mentioned is reported to be a deserter from our service; he is, nevertheless, understood to be a captain of the Florida militia, and to have acted under the authority of the Spanish Governor.

The sergeant was absent without my knowledge; the unfortunate citizens who were wounded are represented to be disorderly men, and are suspected of having gone to Florida with a design to arrest some fugitive offender who had escaped from prison in Georgia. This impression, however, appears to be founded only in vague rumor. Be this as it may, there is, notwithstanding, much ground to believe that the Spanish authorities only want the means to enable them to give us open and unequivocal proofs of their settled hostility, and intimate connexion with our red enemies. In support of this opinion, I enclose herewith No. 2, a copy of a letter from Major Fanning, commanding St. Marks, received by the last mail. By this it appears, from Indian testimony, that the Spaniards at St. Augustine, with all their affected purity, have lately furnished hostile Indians, at the bay of Tampa, with ten horse-loads of ammunition, recommending to them united and vigorous operations against us. I shall hold myself in readiness to do what can be done with the limited means under my control, and shall strike at any force that may present itself.

Permit me to request, that an officer of the Quartermaster General's department may be ordered to join me, with the sum of twenty thousand dollars, for defraying the expenses of that department; and that a battalion of infantry may be ordered to this place, in addition to my present command. I have the honor to be, &c.

EDMUND P. GAINES.

15th CON. 2d SESS.—73

[Mr. Lacock communicated the following additional documents to the Senate, March 3, 1819.]

WASHINGTON, March 3, 1819.

On an examination before the Special Committee of the Senate, on the subject of the Seminole war, I was told by the honorable Mr. Burrell, one of the committee, that what he (Mr. Burrell) then took down of my testimony was a memorandum; and if used, that my deposition should be written out, and submitted to me for correction. The deposition was not submitted, but was sent at once to the printer, who, believing that several words were omitted, sent it to me for revision. I then waited on two of the committee Mr. Lacock and Mr. Burrell, and obtained leave to strike out a part; but they would not permit me to make any additions. The parts struck out were not material. What I wished to add was the substance of an order, the following extract from which I beg leave to make a part of this deposition.

GEORGE GIBSON.

Extract of an order to Colonel Gibson, dated

CAMP, 26 miles east of St. Mark's,
24th April, 1818.

General McIntosh and his warriors will be at Fort Scott, and will probably take much of the supplies ordered up, and as the Tennessee volunteers will pass from Gadsden to that point, he wishes you to despatch a boat with a further supply, and should the corn have arrived from New Orleans last ordered, you will forward a considerable quantity also to enable the volunteers' horses to reach Fort Hawkins.

ROBERT BUTLER, Adj't Gen.

The order from which this extract is made, together with the order from which the following is extracted, were submitted through Mr. Eaton to the committee. I beg leave also to make the second extract a part of this deposition, to wit:

Extract of another letter to Colonel Gibson, dated

BEFORE ST. MARK'S, April 9, 1818.

This is caused by one of those deluded wretches who have asked for peace, and it is granted them. Seventeen men, eighteen women, and thirty children, have surrendered; and they ask permission to pass by water to Fort Gadsden. This is granted them, and they will remain here until the runner returns by whom you will write to the commanding officer of St. Mark's, Captain Vashon, under what badge you know them.

ANDREW JACKSON.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
County of Washington, to wit:

On this 3d day of March, 1819, George Gibson personally appeared before the subscriber, a justice of the peace in and for the county aforesaid and made oath, in due form of law, that the matters and things, as set forth in the annexed statement, are true as stated.

Sworn before

JOSEPH FORREST.

ROBERT BUTLER, adjutant general of the southern division of the Army of the United States, being duly sworn, testifies that, in the Summer or Fall of 1817, Mr. John Donnelson, of the neighborhood of Nashville, went to Pensacola, and purchased lots of land there, with the approbation of the Government; that the deponent had heard that Mr. James Jackson, of Nashville, was concerned with him, and was the only person concerned; he also understood that Donnelson's first view in going to Pensacola was for the benefit of his health; that Mr. Donnelson is nephew of General Jackson's wife; that he does not know the amount of Donnelson's purchase; that he does not know, nor does he believe, that General Jackson had, or expected to have, any interest in said purchase, nor did he ever hear it even suggested.

The deponent further saith, that, on the 10th January, 1818, General Jackson addressed a circular to the old volunteer officers, to raise volunteers for the Seminole campaign, in which the following clause is found: "The grade of the officers to be determined by themselves, or the platoon officers of the regiment. The officers raising companies to command." The deponent has heard that an election was held, and the rank of the field officers established in that way, and not appointed by General Jackson, as stated in the deponent's affidavit, before the committee of the Senate, as positive, when the deponent then stated it as matter of opinion only. Also, that the Governor of Tennessee was at Nashville, which appears, from reference to papers, was not the case. The deponent further states that General Jackson received information at St. Mark's, on his return from Suwanee, that there were about five hundred hostile Indians at Pensacola who received ammunition and provisions from the Governor. In consequence of which, the General ordered Lieutenant Sands, of the artillery, to Mobile, to hold two field pieces of field artillery in readiness for his orders. On the arrival of the army at Fort Gadsden, the General received information of several murders having been committed on the Federal Road, and was shown a letter, said to be private, from a gentleman at Pensacola to Mr. Doyle, as the deponent believes, stating that a large number of Indians were in Pensacola, and depredating on the property of the citizens; this information determined the General to change his route for Tennessee by Pensacola, and orders were given to Colonel Gibson to proceed to Mobile, and afford Lieutenant Sands every facility in moving the artillery to Fort Montgomery to await the General's order, which was given, on nearing the Escambia, by express, requiring the artillery to form a junction with the army, after crossing that river, which was executed. The General remarked to the deponent, on march to Pensacola, that if he found the information true on reaching that place, he would demand a surrender of it; and the deponent believes that the determination of the General to occupy Pensacola and Barancas was made on receiving the protest of the Governor, and learning that his provisions were stopped by him at the former place. That at the time the army attacked Mickasuky, there were not more than five hundred Indian warriors imbodyed, nor does the deponent believe there were, at any time during the war, more than five or six hundred imbodyed at any one place; that, from the nature of the subject, this statement must be conjectural; that the enemy's warriors were in general well armed; that deponent was told there were about thirteen hundred souls at Suwanee, of which two hundred and fifty, or three hundred, were fighting men; that our army had one man killed and four wounded, in actions with the Indians during the campaign, and two killed at the Barancas. Deponent further says, that General Jackson received from a private source a plan of the fortress of St. Augustine; and, as the deponent believes, it was sent to the General at St. Mark's, or Fort Gadsden, after his return from Suwanee; that General Jackson had under his command in Florida, from recollection, about eighteen hundred regulars, volunteers, and militia, and about fifteen hundred Indians under McIntosh; and that the Indians were received and mustered into the service of the United States, under the orders of Brevet Major General Gaines, and mustered out of service under orders of Major General Jackson, by a regular officer.

This deponent deems it due to himself to state that the deposition published with the report of the committee of the Senate, under his name, was not written by him, but was taken down by Mr. Burrell of that committee, and a promise given to the deponent that, when it was thrown into form, it would be submitted for correction and signature, which was not done, although the committee were twice informed, by one of its members, at the request of this deponent, that parts thereof were not correct, hence the deponent was not able to give the necessary correction which he would have done from an examination of papers, and necessary reflection.

ROBERT BUTLER.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,

County of Washington, to wit:

On this 3d day of March, 1819, Robert Butler personally appeared before the undersigned, a Justice of the peace in and for the county aforesaid, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that the matters and things, as set forth in the foregoing, are true as stated.

Sworn before

JOSEPH FORREST.

[On the 23d of February, 1820, Mr. Rufus King presented to the Senate the following memorial and documents:]

Memorial of Andrew Jackson, Major General in the Army of the United States, and Commander of the Southern Division.

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

On the 18th of December, 1818, your honorable body resolved "that the Message of the President, and documents relative to the Seminole war, be referred to a select committee, who shall have authority, if necessary, to send for persons and papers; that said committee inquire relative to the advance of the United States troops into West Florida; whether the officers in command at Pensacola and St. Mark's were amenable to, and under the control of Spain; and particularly what circumstances existed to authorize or justify the commanding General in taking possession of those posts."

In conformity with this resolution, a select committee of five persons of your honorable body was appointed, who, on the 24th of February, 1819, made a report.

The committee had ample time for a correct examination of the subject submitted to their consideration, and means by which to have been fully satisfied of the innocence of your respondent; yet, in their report, has he been accused of crimes against the laws and constitution of his country. Upon a review of that document, your respondent is free to declare that both the narrative of facts, and the arguments deduced from them, are unsound and erroneous. The incorrect impressions with which the committee seem to have labored have, in the opinion of your memorialist, given to this subject a distorted aspect, and thrown around it a deceptive coloring.

With striking a deadly blow at the liberty of his country, and with acts of wanton usurpation, which, for their enormity, would vie with the most absolute despots—with the Directory of France, during their short career of madness and folly—has your respondent been charged. These accusations have for their object the rendering your respondent obnoxious to his fellow-citizens. Still, he will not so far forget the duty he owes himself, and the respect due the Senate and the American people, as to indulge recrimination. It is not the means by which truth can be arrived at, or the cause of justice and impartiality promoted. But, to vindicate himself from reproach, to ward off unmerited imputations, and to stand in opposition to a report of a committee of your body, which casts the severest censure, is a right secured to him, because it is the right of every citizen.

With all the respect, therefore, that is due to an august branch of the Government, but with that frankness and sincerity which conscious innocence demands to assume, does he present himself. It is a duty which he owes to himself, to his office, to his family, nay, to his country, for which he has encountered privations, and whose interest has always been dear and paramount to all other considerations. In doing this, he will not depart from that respect which is proper to be observed; nor will he hesitate to believe but that the Senate, on an impartial examination of the facts, will come to conclusions different from what their committee have arrived at.

The manner in which the inquiry was conducted by the committee is believed to have been novel; a mass of testimony, tending seriously to affect the reputation of an individual, was collected; and, although it was proposed, yet was an opportunity denied him, of appearing before them to offer any statement or explanation in his power, in relation to those subjects upon which doubts and difficulties might arise. He was deprived, by this refusal, of the privilege of confronting his accusers, and of interrogating and cross-examining witnesses summoned for his conviction. Such testimony only as the committee chose to select was heard, and, when published to the world, declared a language different from what the witness intended.

By refusing the accused an opportunity to confront and cross-examine witnesses, how easily may be indulged in rancorous invective, and occasions sought to vent malignant and implacable resentments. Your respondent does not pretend to assert that anything of the kind occurred during the present investigation, but has barely adverted to it as forming a portion of the evil consequences which might arise from so informal a method of inquiry. To adopt such a course, is to prostrate the rules of judicial proceedings, to violate every maxim of justice, and to trample down all the sacred guaranties of the Constitution. He has been taught to believe that, agreeably to the provisions of our magna charta, every individual was secure in his life, liberty, property, and reputation; and that he could not be tried before any constituted authority of the nation without being heard in his defence, permitted to introduce exculpatory evidence, to cross-examine and confront his accusers. This is one of the choicest fruits of our republican institutions, and is an essential preservative of liberty; it should be guarded with vestal vigilance, and for no purpose whatever subjected to violation by any branch or department of the Government. In its maintenance there is safety, but danger in departure.

The committee, whilst advertent to the origin of the Seminole war, have omitted to enumerate the Spanish and Indian aggressions on our rights, as a justification of the measures which were adopted in its prosecution. They have rather employed palliatives for the outrages of the enemy, and given an aggravated aspect to the measures which were adopted for the peace and security of our frontiers. Add to this the manner in which the testimony was collected, the misconception of facts and incorrect arguments contained in the report, the time at which it was published, and the style in which it was composed; and your respondent cannot forego the belief that it evinces an hostility to the Executive, and to the military officers under his command.

It is a subject of no small surprise that this spirit of opposition should have diffused itself, after the luminous arrangement of facts, with the conclusive reasoning and inferences arising from the laws of nations and the United States, by Mr. Secretary Adams, as well as the ample and satisfactory discussion in the House of Representatives, the great inquest of the nation. Moreover, Congress had made provision for a vigorous prosecution of the Seminole war in the Spring of 1813, in conformity to the suggestion of the President in his Message of the month of March, when he detailed to them every information in relation to that subject. The citizens of Georgia and Alabama had made repeated calls on the General Government for protection; and, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances touching the causes and progress of that war, Congress authorized the calling out an additional brigade of militia, and made liberal appropriations for the payment of the Georgia troops then in service. The President, too, who is commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States, and who should be the proper judge to determine whether his orders be faithfully executed, had made the acts of his officers his own, not only by the express authority which he had conferred, but by subsequent adoption also.

With a large majority of the people of the United States the defensive measures adopted by the Government, as also the reasons by which they had been governed, were entirely satisfactory, in consequence of its being perceived that no other course could have been pursued which would have secured the indispensable purposes for which the Seminole war had been prosecuted. That those measures should be denounced as a violation of the laws and Constitution, by those very persons who originally gave them their suffrages, is certainly calculated to excite the astonishment of every impartial observer.

Under such circumstances it was to have been anticipated that all controversy, relative to the agency of your respondent in giving rise to the war, would have been completely put to rest. It was confidently expected that he would have escaped the censure of your committee; reproaches which, if sanctioned by your honorable body, are little inferior to cashiering; besides, no instance is to be found on record where a similar course was adopted in relation to any of the Indian wars in which the United States have been engaged.

After all the above circumstances had transpired, and it was supposed that the subject of the Seminole war had been finally disposed of in the House of Representatives, your committee took it up with avidity, prosecuted it with an assiduity that was unexampled, and animadverted upon the conduct of the Executive, and his official agents, in a manner which is believed to be altogether strange and novel. By reiterations of mal-conduct they seem to have evinced a disposition to stamp upon the whole transaction, and those connected with it, infamy and disgrace.

Should the time ever arrive when a majority of any of the superior tribunals of the nation, influenced by party feelings, shall proceed to criminate a public officer, or effect his removal, in order to create a vacancy, or to gratify the ambition of a favorite partisan, then may private resentment, and the most angry passions, acquire an unbounded and dangerous control over their proceedings. Every sentiment of justice and humanity will be completely stifled, as well as all regard for the Constitution and laws. The patriot will have ample cause to tremble for the honor of his country, and the perpetuity of her republican institutions. The venerable fabric of our liberties, which has been consecrated by the blood of our heroes, and the wisdom of our sages, will be imminently endangered, if not entirely buried in ruins.

That the charges preferred should have been published to the world, at a time to preclude all investigation, is a circumstance but little calculated to impart consolation, or to quiet the alarms of reputation assailed. No other sentiment can be indulged than that it was intended, by counteracting the decision of the House of Representatives previously made, to produce an unfavorable impression on the public mind, before anything could be offered as an antidote to the impressions it was intended to disseminate. Twelve months have almost elapsed since the publication of the report; all investigation has been necessarily postponed, and hence has additional, unmerited injury been sustained. The effect has been to excite prejudice, and thereby prevent that impartial examination which is so essential to correct determination. Calumny has been aided, suspicion left free to act, and the means of exciting public odium amply afforded. Resting on the eternal principles of truth and justice, and claiming for himself the high prerogative secured by the Constitution, this respondent asks to appear in his own vindication, and to submit the grounds of his defence, and the "motives" by which he has been actuated.

The first consideration which presents itself, is the authority under which your committee acted. Three propositions only are contained in the resolution of your honorable body, upon the second of which no report has been made, nor has your committee stated "what circumstances existed to authorize or justify the commanding General in taking possession of the Spanish posts." Instead of confining themselves within the pale of their powers, they have travelled over the whole ground occupied by the House of Representatives, in search of new subjects of inquiry not before touched on, or embraced within their powers.

So far as the committee have embraced within their investigation the original causes of the war; the withdrawal of the regular troops from the frontiers of Georgia; the employment of volunteers and friendly Indians; the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; the order to take possession of St. Augustine, and the reasons and motives of your respondent in the conduct and management of the war, it is believed to be an act of supererogation, and a departure from sound practice. This objection is not made by your respondent upon the ground that he considers his conduct vulnerable, or from a wish to elude inquiry; but is barely mentioned as presumption of the strong disposition of your committee to affix censure upon his motives and actions.

Upon a careful examination of the discretionary orders which were directed to your respondent from the Department of War, there can be no question but that they authorized and justified every measure which was adopted during the Seminole war, and should, at once, have acquitted him of all censure and responsibility. He was ordered to engage in offensive operations; to bring the war with the Seminoles to a speedy and successful termination, with exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked; and to establish a peace on such conditions as would make it honorable and permanent. He was, in effect, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. No orders could have been more ample, as to the selection of means, as well as to their application.

The massacre of Mrs. Garret and children, and the butchery of Lieutenant Scott and comrades, your respondent is informed, were the events which induced the Government to order him to take command of the operating army, and to prosecute the war with vigor and effect. They had determined to abandon the cautious and defensive policy hitherto adopted, and to pursue a new system of operations against the enemy. The orders directed to your respondent and General Gaines, subsequent to those tragical events, were entirely different from former ones; inasmuch as they were peremptory as to carrying on operations in Florida against the Seminole Indians.

The first order to your respondent had no reference to those issued to General Gaines, save that of the same date with his own, which was directed to him at Amelia Island, requiring his co-operation in the attack upon the Seminoles. In no part of it was a reference to any previous order to your respondent, or any other person, pointing out the most advisable means to be adopted, or limiting him in their choice or application. And even had the orders of General Gaines been obligatory, as the case which they contemplated never occurred, they must entirely have lost their force and effect. An order to perform a particular service, or to effect a specific object, without any limitation as to the means to be employed, leaves, it is conceived, an entire discretion with the officer as to their character and application—it then becomes a general power. It is also believed to be true that the limits of such an order cannot be transcended without an entire desertion of the object contemplated. The orders of your respondent completely superseded those directed to General Gaines; and, if so, he must stand acquitted of the high charge of having been guilty of their violation. Yet, if any doubt could exist upon this subject, the subsequent approval of the measures and motives of your respondent, by the Executive of the United States, completely settles all controversy.

In the first page of the report an effort is made to induce a belief that the Treaty of Fort Jackson was negotiated by your respondent, and that the hostilities of the Seminoles proceeded from its unjust and tyrannical demands. Upon this branch of the subject your respondent begs leave to remark, that the General Government had some time previously settled the terms of capitulation, and your respondent, not as a commissioner or negotiator, but as the conqueror of the country, received their submission upon those terms—terms which demanded the surrender of their prophets, as well as the instigators of the war.

Those Indians, having been routed at Hoithle-wallee, in April, 1814, fled to Pensacola, where they were protected, clothed, fed, and supplied with munitions of war, by the Spanish authorities. They never were parties to the treaty at Fort Jackson; and, however they might have been dissatisfied with its conditions, as demanded by the Government, their dissatisfaction and hostility were excited by Spanish agents and British emissaries resident among them; one of whom was the infamous Woodbine, who was then engaged in enlisting them in his service by the distribution of presents, and in disciplining them for war. These facts might have been ascertained by a reference to the correspondence between your respondent and the Governor of Pensacola, which were on file in the War Department.

Upon the subject of occupying the Spanish posts your respondent thinks proper to observe, that he deemed it essentially necessary to the execution of his orders. It would have been impossible to have obtained a speedy and effectual termination of the war, so long as the commandants of those fortresses furnished the enemy with supplies and munitions of war, and aided, abetted, and encouraged them in their savage hostilities against our frontier settlements.

They had both become the rendezvous for embodying hostile negroes and Indians, and for giving them comfort and protection. According to the acknowledgments of her own commanding officers, the authority of Spain over Florida had ceased, and was to be considered as derelict to all intents and purposes. Your respondent did not believe himself under any obligation to respect an authority that did not exist; a sovereignty that was not asserted or exercised; reason nor law could require him to respect rights that were suffered to be usurped for the purpose of promoting a most cruel and sanguinary war against the citizens of the United States. These posts had been alternately substituted for the fort, on the Appalachicola, and thither the negroes and Indians had retreated for shelter and protection, after their defeats at Mickasuky. They constituted the laboratories of the war, and there were their materials collected and organized for active service. They were in reality Indian forts and store-houses, attempted to be protected by the Spanish flag; and had they been in the exclusive possession of our savage enemies, they could not have derived greater advantages, been more benefited, nor be more seriously injured.

Against such an enemy, what measures were to be adopted under orders that required a speedy and effectual termination of the war; and which were to give permanent peace and security to our Southern frontier? They were not to be met and fought in the open plain, where a decisive blow might be given, and the contest ended; but were to be sought for in the fortresses of Spain, and in the swamps of a wilderness, where they might contend at leisure, and recede from the contest, the moment it became hazardous. Partial remedies to prevent such evils had already been adopted by the American Government. During the war of 1812, Spain had suffered Great Britain to violate her neutrality in Florida, to the injury and annoyance of the United States. In 1814, Pensacola was entered by United States troops, and a lesson, it was hoped, enforced, that however this Government was disposed to cultivate peace, she could not preserve it by permitting Spain, regardless of existing treaties, to outrage her dearest rights. She was called upon to maintain her neutrality according to the injunctions of the law of nations, and the provisions of the treaty of 1795. She pleaded inability to comply, and the American Government forgave the injury. Peace was at length restored to the United States; yet still Spain, regardless of her obligations, permitted British agents to reside within the bosom of Florida, and to excite the Indians and negroes to pillage and to bloodshed. Remonstrance was again employed, but in vain. Inability was still the pretext, and the same tragical scenes, witnessed in 1814, were now repeated. The savages who had causelessly made war, and who were shedding the blood of our border settlers, being thus openly received and comforted by the Spanish authorities, were such acts of hostility, were so flagrant a violation of the good understanding existing between the United States and Spain, as, in the opinion of your respondent, wholly to merge the neutral character. And your respondent considers that he would have been guilty of a dereliction of duty, had he drawn up his troops by way of cordon, and remained on the Georgia frontier, receiving the reports of Indian robberies and massacres, only that he might transmit them to the Secretary of War; for he could have done no more.

Both of those fortresses were clearly identified as "associates" in the war, and were both equally under the control of the negroes and Indians. Ambrister had appeared before St. Mark's with four or five hundred under his command; and an equal number had been seen about Pensacola, the most of whom were equipped for war by Governor Mazot. In both instances, the strength of the enemy was amply sufficient for a forcible occupation of the posts. Moreover, the Governor of Pensacola had refused the passage of provisions up the Escambia, destined for our starving troops at Fort Crawford. An United States schooner, called the Amelia, had been detained at that place until the town was taken, when were obtained from her provisions for the troops. Another provision vessel, ordered into the Perdido, had been captured by boats sent from the Barancas, and placed under the guns of the fort, but fortunately made her escape under cover of the darkness of the night.

In this state of things, had your respondent been compelled to suspend operations, and to wait for additional orders from the War Department, the object of anticipating the enemy would have been entirely defeated. He would have been compelled to retrograde to the interior, for the want of supplies, leaving many points of the frontier exposed to the ruthless barbarities of exasperated savages. The militia force would have become inactive and discontented; their time would have expired before anything effectual could have been done; and the campaign thus rendered completely abortive. If St. Mark's was necessary to the defence of the frontier of Georgia, Pensacola was much more so for the peace and security of Alabama. In consequence, too, of its being located on the seaboard, it afforded much greater facilities to our enemies, for it commanded the navigation of the Escambia, up which had, necessarily, to pass, all the supplies for our forts erected on its tributary streams. The occupation of this post was not determined upon, until the reception of Governor Bibb's letter, at the Escambia, detailing many outrages, and communicating the intelligence that Holmes and his warriors were then in Pensacola; as also, the receipt of Governor Mazot's protest, complaining of a violation of his neutrality, and ordering your respondent to retire from West Florida, accompanied with a threat to coerce him, if he did not comply. Lieutenant Sands had been despatched from St. Mark's, with orders to hold his artillery in readiness to meet future contingencies, should they occur; but he never was directed to convey it to a given point, until after your respondent reached the Choctawhatchy.

Nor were those proceedings considered acts of war, as represented by the committee. By adverting to the correspondence with the commandant of St. Mark's, the Governor of Pensacola, and the Secretary of War, it may be distinctly seen, that your respondent entered the territory of Spain as a friend, to chastise an enemy of both nations, and to enforce those obligations and duties which the Spanish authorities had pleaded inability to perform; that all his operations were bottomed on the broad principle of self-defence, authorized by the law of nature and of nations. They were not directed against the Government of Spain, but against the fortresses which had become the strongholds, the rendezvous, of negroes and Indians, and whose neutrality was prostrated to the basest purposes. They were seized because they were Indian posts to all intents and purposes. Spain has disavowed the conduct of her official agents; and the American Government has declared that a war was not intended with that nation.

Although the Spanish authorities were guilty of many open and undisguised acts of hostility, yet the sovereignty of Spain over Florida was altogether ideal. Her commandants had repeatedly acknowledged that they were unable to restrain the savages, and that the Indian chiefs and British emissaries were proceeding contrary to their wishes, and in violation of their laws; hence were these fortresses occupied, as the only measure which could give a speedy and permanent peace to our bleeding frontiers. The Spanish Government did not consider it an act of war, nor did Mr. Pizarro or Don Onis complain of it as a measure of that description. The two Governments have acknowledged themselves at peace, and have since kept up a regular and friendly intercourse with each other in the shape of negotiation.

Neither were the garrisons made prisoners of war, or treated like conquered enemies, as is stated by your committee. The contrary will be made clearly apparent, by an examination of the conditions upon which the Spanish posts were occupied; to which your respondent begs leave to refer. Your committee acknowledge that the Spanish authorities in Florida were guilty of acts of war against the United States; but that her neutral character was not wholly merged in that of the enemy, in consequence of her employing moral and not physical force. If giving the negroes and Indians encouragement in their outrages, by the purchase of their plunder; furnishing them with aid and protection, supplies and munitions of war, did not wholly merge the neutrality of the Spanish authorities, and make them associates in the war, your respondent confesses that he is at a loss for a definition of terms.

Agreeably to this idea, it would be improper to consider the population of a nation, with whom we were at war, as enemies, save those who were in the field; for it is only the latter who resort to "physical force." This distinction is entirely new, and is in contradiction to many of the most clear and long established principles of good sense and national law.

It is stated by your committee, that all authority at Pensacola was put down by the sword, and that a new Government was established, "the powers of which, both civil and military, were vested in military officers." Every one would be induced to understand, from this, that the terms of capitulation were arbitrarily and tyrannically imposed upon Governor Mazot, when, in fact, they were proposed by himself, and the civil and military Government was dissolved at his own instance. The temporary Governor, Colonel King, was an officer of the United States' army; but civil officers were appointed to the different departments from among the citizens; and Mr. McKinsey, a citizen of Mobile, was placed at the head of the magistracy. All that was contemplated was to organize some kind of civil authority for the protection of the lives, liberty, and property, of the citizens, during the temporary occupancy of the fortress. The same Government to which the people had been accustomed was retained. It became absolutely necessary to establish the revenue laws of the United States, in order to check the smuggling which had been carried on successfully in this quarter for many years, as well as to admit the American merchant to an equal participation in trade, which would have been denied under the partial operations of the Spanish commercial code.

The executions of the Indian chiefs and British outlaws are justifiable on the ground of precedent and the laws of nations. One of the former was a prophet, who had employed his superstitious influence, and the promises of his transatlantic friends, to stimulate his deluded brethren to deeds of rapine and massacre. The other commanded in person the party who perpetrated the cold-blooded butchery of Lieutenant Scott and his unfortunate companions. Both had been engaged in most of the murders committed, and were active instigators of the savage war which raged on our defenceless frontier.

Acting as chiefs of the negroes and Indians, Arbuthnot and Ambrister, by numerous acts of atrocity, had become identified with those monsters—associates in the war. They were the principal authors of the hostilities of the ferocious savages, who observed none of the rules of civilized warfare, who never gave quarter, and only took prisoners for the purpose of torturing! They were, without authority, principals in an unlawful war. Their mode of carrying it on was characterized by plunder, massacre, destruction, and revenge; and was in open violation of the laws of war and of nations. Great Britain would not interfere to prevent those miscreants from instigating the fugitive negroes and the Indians from burning, and pillaging, and scalping, the inhabitants of Georgia and Alabama; but she disowned them, and left them to their fate. The Spanish authorities would not, or could not, interfere, and the Indians regarded them as friends and associates. Both acted as chiefs of the motley banditti, giving them counsel and exciting them to war; and one of them actually led those black and red combatants to battle. They both officiated as Indian agents, in writing to Spanish Governors and British Ministers, stating their grievances, and soliciting assistance; and sometimes as quartermasters, procuring supplies, and furnishing munitions of war.

Under these circumstances, it is believed that they merited death, whether they were placed upon an equality with the outlawed Red Sticks, or fugitive negroes, who were in a state of open rebellion. Indeed, their criminality was of a deeper dye than that of the Indian chiefs. They were the paymasters for human scalps; and, to discharge that high trust, had exiled themselves from their native land, plunged into the recesses of the wilderness, and groped their way to the Indian camp, for the express purpose of working upon the feelings of the ignorant and untutored savages, to instigate them to lay waste the abodes of industry and innocence, and stain our soil with the blood of slaughtered women and children! Enjoying the light of education, yet devoted to this infamous employment, the active agents in a war which was marked in its progress by plunder and massacre! Should mercy have been extended to wretches who excited such a war, and who, within a short period, would have renewed the same tragical scenes? As associates of savages, who respected none of the laws of civilized warfare, they could not claim the benefit or protection of those laws, for they were not parties. They were as much outlaws to all its provisions, as a pirate of the ocean. Such wretches are more criminal than any painted Red Stick; and to pardon them would be treachery to mankind. If, in the ordinary course of justice, it has been deemed wise and politic to take the life of an offender for the murder of a single individual, both religion and humanity must recommend the infliction of the same penalty upon him who has been conspicuously instrumental in the murder of every age, sex, and condition. Although retaliation might have been employed upon the innocent, for such horrid crimes, yet, in these cases, it fell upon the guilty. Let it be borne in mind, that the Indian chiefs and British outlaws were the monsters demanded to be surrendered by the treaty of Fort Jackson, the terms of which had been antecedently settled by the Government, ratified by your honorable body, and carried into effect by the Congress of the United States; and let it also be recollected, that these were the prophets and instigators of the war, upon whom was ordered to be inflicted "exemplary punishment for hostilities so unprovoked."

The two British incendiaries were not executed upon the general charge alone of "exciting the Indians to war," as stated by your committee, but upon that and other general charges subjoined hereto, which they omitted to notice, but which may be seen by a reference to the proceedings of the court of inquiry on that occasion.

The case of Arbuthnot and Ambrister was not within the reach of any rules or articles of war. The rights and privileges here secured belonged only to our own countrymen; and, as the offences charged were committed by foreigners beyond our own territorial limits and jurisdiction, our municipal code contained nothing by which to visit the offence. To it the principles of national law was alone applicable, which attached no penalty to their crimes other than death. In organizing the court of inquiry, it was only intended (as in councils of war) that the opinion should operate directory, and as advice, not to become binding. In the second sentence pronounced by the special court upon Ambrister, there was a departure from the rules of that law upon which alone it was believed jurisdiction was had of the offence. Nor was it less a violation of the rules and articles of war; for those rules had denounced corporal punishment. The sentence, therefore, was void, because known to be no law. Your respondent, therefore, conceived himself authorized to carry into execution the first sentence, because it awarded the only punishment that was legal to be inflicted; and because his lawless, guilty conduct entitled him to die. Besides, Ambrister was the most criminal. He had commanded, in person, a corps of negroes, with the view of anticipating your respondent in the occupation of St. Mark's, and was actually taken in arms against the forces of the United States.

The General commanding, as in all such cases, possessed the right, by the law of nations, to retaliate and to punish; nor could the organizing of the court deprive him of the power. The court of inquiry derived its existence, and its whole authority, from the order for its organization; and no more could they exercise a power not delegated to them, than could a committee of your honorable body inquire into matters not contained in the resolution which created them. The order calls it a special court, and directs it to perform special duties. It only asks for opinions; and gives no right to carry those opinions into execution. It details a recorder, by which a court of inquiry is ever distinguished from courts martial; the latter having a judge advocate, without which no proceedings can be had, and no sentence pronounced.

Censure is endeavored to be attached, in consequence of the withdrawal of the regular troops from the posts on the Georgia frontier, and concentrating them at Fort Montgomery, on the Alabama river, a considerable distance west of the Georgia line. In the commission of this military error your respondent had no participation; it was done in pursuance of an order of Mr. Crawford, then Secretary of War; an order which he was bound to obey, although contrary to his own opinion.

Upon the subject of raising and organizing the volunteers of West Tennessee, which has called forth the severest animadversions, your respondent did not, as he conceives, "disregard the orders of the War Department, the Constitution, and laws." His orders were, to call upon the Governors of the adjacent States for such additional military force as he might deem necessary to beat the enemy. The order was entirely discretionary, as no number or description of troops were mentioned. In the language of the Secretary of War's letter to Governor Bibb, your respondent was "vested with full powers to conduct the war in the manner he might judge best."

When his appeal was made to the citizens of West Tennessee, the frontier settlements were threatened on every side with danger and distress, as well as our troops at Fort Scott and on the Appalachicola. Major Muhlenberg was endeavoring to ascend that river with provisions, &c., and was arrested in his progress, and surrounded, by eight or twelve hundred Indians. Colonel Arbuckle, commandant at Fort Scott, was also about to abandon his post for want of supplies. The one thousand Georgia militia, who had been called out for sixty days, after advancing forty miles from Hartford, to the neighborhood of Fort Early, were returning home, leaving the command of Colonel Arbuckle, as also the Georgia frontier, in an exposed and perilous condition. Not only from the public journals, but from the communications of Colonel Arbuckle, had this intelligence been received. Under these circumstances, Major Fanning was despatched to Georgia, with a request that the Governor should continue those troops in the field for an additional period, or supply the deficiency, as early as practicable, by an equal number of volunteers.

As it was not known, at this time, whether the Governor of Tennessee was at Knoxville or in the Cherokee nation, your respondent made his appeal to his old and tried comrades in arms, desiring them to follow him to the field, in defence of their invaded country. In affording the desired relief, no time was to be lost. Delay was replete with danger; and defeat and disaster would have been the result, had the dilatory process of draughting been resorted to. The same day on which the appeal was made, the Governor of Tennessee was written to, and apprized of the attempt to obtain volunteers; and that one thousand draughted militia would be required, should the appeal not be promptly and successfully answered. In reply, the Governor gave his entire approbation to the measure, and co-operated in raising an additional company of mounted volunteers, which was commanded by Captain Dunlap, and which joined the army at Fort Gadsden.

All the volunteers were raised and organized under the laws of Tennessee, the officers of whom were elected by themselves, and not appointed by your respondent, as asserted by your committee. Although earnestly solicited to appoint them, he peremptorily refused. To the officers who had served him in the late Creek and British war, he stated, not only in his appeal, but also upon their meeting at Nashville, that they were to organize themselves in the manner they might think proper; that the grade of the officers was to be determined by themselves; and that those raising companies were to command them. The only agency of your respondent, in the whole transaction, was the appointment of Colonel Hayne, inspector general of the Southern division, to superintend their organization, and lead them to Fort Scott, where he took the command. Every measure touching the raising and organizing this volunteer corps was regularly communicated to the Secretary of War, and received his unqualified approbation.

The committee admit, that the laws of Congress authorize the President to call on the Governors of the different States for such portions of the militia as he may deem requisite; but deny that there is any law in existence vesting him with authority to accept the services of volunteers. Here they have endeavored to make an impression on the nation, that volunteers are not militia; and that the circumstance of volunteering their services, in preference to being draughted, essentially and radically changes their character. There is certainly no position more unsound; as is clearly evinced by the fact, that most of the calls of the General Government have been met in this way, by the patriotic and gallant yeomanry of our country; until now, it has never been complained of.

When a requisition is made by the President on any State in the Union, for a quota of militia, it is sufficient if they are forthcoming; and it is believed that he has no authority, under the laws or Constitution of the United States, to inquire into the mode in which they have been raised and organized. This is a question to be determined exclusively between the Governor of a State and its own citizens. It is one of the attributes of State sovereignty, guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, and with which the Executive and Congress cannot interfere. If an officer of the United States' Army should be guilty of an infringement of this State prerogative, the complaint of its Governor or Legislature should be considered as the only basis to authorize an inquiry into his official conduct.

It is stated by your committee, that it was not found necessary to furnish the President with a list of the names of the militia officers; "and not until the pay-rolls were made out, and payment demanded, were the persons known to the Department of War." A majority of your committee were within reach of all the information necessary to the correction of this error. Colonel Hayne's communications to the Secretary of War were on file in that office; from which they might have been informed of the number and grade of the officers, as well as of every particular relative to the organization of the volunteers; together with the express and decided approbation of that department of the Government. Appended to the report are the pay-rolls, filed in the office of the Paymaster General. Why they omitted to examine the muster-roll in the War Office, from which the pay-roll was transcribed, your respondent is at a loss to determine. Upon an examination of the pay-rolls, they should have known that, agreeably to the rules and articles of war, they must have been made out from the muster-rolls, which designate, by name, the number and grade of the officers mustered into service. The muster-roll, together with the letters of Colonel Hayne, would have satisfied the committee that the volunteers had been organized agreeably to the laws of Tennessee; and that it was a procedure over which the General Government could exercise no control.

By the rules and articles of war, "troops of all descriptions shall be mustered once in two months, for payment; nor shall any payment be made, but upon muster-rolls, signed by the inspector general or his assistant; or, in the absence of these, by some officer of the Army of the United States, especially assigned to this duty by the general or other officer commanding the department in which the troops so mustered shall be."

Again, "the officers and soldiers of any troops, whether militia or others, being mustered, and in the pay of the United States, shall, at all times, and in all places, when joined or acting in conjunction with the regular forces of the United States, be governed by the rules and articles of war, and shall be subject to be tried by courts-martial, in like manner with the officers and soldiers of the regular forces, save only that such courts-martial shall be composed entirely of militia officers."

From these extracts it must appear evident, that no payment can be made, but upon muster-rolls, signed by the inspector general, &c.; and that, from the time they are made out and received at the War Office, the militia are considered in the service of the United States. Neither Congress nor the President have any authority to inquire how their officers have been appointed; whether they have been received as volunteers, or raised by the more tedious and vexatious method of draughting. Were the idea of your committee correct upon this subject, the people of the different States would be deprived of the invaluable privilege of selecting between these two modes of complying with the calls made upon them for the defence of our common country. The General Government had the services of those troops, which is all that can be required; and they have long since been mustered out of service, and paid from the public Treasury.

The committee confess that the Secretary of War approved the manner in which the Tennessee volunteers were raised and organized; but say, that "it is but justice to the Department to state, that it was not until the officers that had assisted in thus officering and organizing this corps were examined by the committee, that they were apprized of the illegality of the measure." Surely, the Secretary of War must have examined the communications of Colonel Hayne and your respondent, stating every particular touching the mode agreeably to which they were raised and organized, as also the muster-rolls, giving the grade and number of the officers by name; all of which were transmitted, and acknowledged to have been received, at an early period, at that office. He certainly could not have compromised himself so far, as to give his approbation to a measure before he was made acquainted with its nature and tendency.

Troops, of the same description of the Tennessee volunteers, were received and employed by the Government, on our northern frontier and southern borders during the late struggle with England, and in the war with the Creek nation of Indians. They fought the battles of Talladega, Emucklaw, the Horseshoe, and New Orleans, and protected Mobile from British visitation. Volunteers, similarly raised and organized, were commanded by Governors Shelby, Harrison, Edwards, and General Porter, of New York, during the same period. The field officers of the Georgia militia were appointed in the same manner on the west bank of the Ockmulgee; and one of the present Senators from Tennessee actually appointed the officers of his own regiment, which he raised without any authority, and which he commanded on an expedition against the Seminole Indians, in 1812. The most of these troops were paid off by the United States, received the approbation of the General Government, and the applause of the nation.

It is stated in the report of the committee to the Senate, that the "whole strength of this miserable, undisciplined banditti of deluded Indians and fugitive slaves, when combined, did not exceed one thousand men. Opposed to whom, previous to General Jackson's taking command, and under General Gaines, were a force of one thousand eight hundred regulars and militia, besides the one thousand five hundred friendly Indians illegally subsidized by the last mentioned General; what, then, in this case, becomes of the plea of necessity?" It is plainly to be inferred, then, that this motley horde of negroes and Indians were too inconsiderable to justify raising the volunteer force which was employed in reducing them to a state of submission.

It is well known to all those acquainted with the character of Indians, and their peculiar mode of warfare, that it is almost impossible to form a correct estimate of their aggregate force, until the termination of the war. In this case, General Gaines had computed them at two thousand eight hundred; and Arbuthnot, who officiated as a military chief of the savages, had represented them, in a communication to the British Minister, Mr. Bagot, to be three thousand five hundred strong. This calculation was by no means extravagant, when it is considered that from eight to twelve hundred had been concentrated at a single point, when Lieutenant Scott and party were attacked, and that they were daily increasing in number. Whatever might have been their whole effective strength, at any period of the war, it could have been augmented by auxiliary bands in Florida; and it was certainly the duty of the commanding General to call out such additional force as should insure success in every emergency. Furthermore, the greatest portion of the Georgia militia, then in the field, could be retained in service only for about three months. And it was expected that they would apply for discharges so soon as their time expired. Your respondent considered the lives of our citizens as too precious to be risked, in a contest with Indians, where there was an odds of two to one, unless dire necessity demanded the exposure. The consequence of an opposite policy was, that the decisive and rapid movement of our overwhelming numbers distracted and dispersed the enemy, compelled them to seek refuge in the Spanish fortresses, woods, and swamps; and they never were afforded an opportunity to display their whole force by concentration. The war was speedily and effectually terminated, and much blood and treasure saved to the nation.

With regard to the Indian and militia force, under the command of General Gaines, previous to the time your respondent assumed the command of the army, he has to remark that, until a few days anterior to his arrival at Fort Scott, not a single Indian warrior had joined the standard of the United States; nor had the first requisition of Georgia militia ever united with the command of General Gaines; the latter had returned home, in consequence of which it became absolutely necessary, on the part of General Gaines, to make a second call on the Governor of that State, for the double purpose of defending the frontier and occupying Amelia Island.

A few of the friendly Indians joined your respondent before he reached Fort Scott, and a considerable number at that place, making, in the aggregate, about four or five hundred. The balance of the force under his command was not, at that time, more than nine hundred effectives; and he confidently affirms that, when he took up the line of march from Fort Gadsden, on the 25th of March, 1818, his whole command, fit for duty, consisted only of three hundred and sixty privates of the regulars, about eight hundred Georgia militia, and Major Lovet's detachment of friendly Creeks. McIntosh and his warriors were organized at Fort Mitchell, after the arrival of your respondent at Fort Hawkins, and never united with him until the 1st of April, about six miles in the rear of Mickasukv. All these facts were accessible to your committee, had they been disposed to examine the letters of your respondent on file in the Department of War. To this Department all his communications were made; and there they should have applied for correct information, if it had been wanted.

The next subject which has exposed your respondent to bitter reproach from the committee, is the order which was directed to General Gaines, to occupy St. Augustine. A letter from Major Twiggs had conveyed the intelligence that our savage enemies had been fed and furnished from that garrison; and it was rendered highly probable that, aided, abetted, and encouraged, by the commandant, they were recruiting and embodying at that place, with a view of renewing hostilities. A strong presumption was created, that this, like the other Spanish posts, had become a depot and rallying point for negroes and Indians, to which they had retreated for refuge and protection, after being driven from Negro Fort, St. Mark's, and Pensacola.

The order given to General Gaines was entirely conditional and prospective; and had the facts reported been established, as directed, there would have existed the same incontrovertible reason for the occupancy of St. Augustine as of the Spanish fortresses. The orders of your respondent had undergone no modification; and the measure would have been indispensably necessary to their execution, as well as to the peace and security of our frontiers. Besides, he had transmitted to the War Department regular information of his proceedings in Florida, with the reasons and motives by which he had been governed, from the 25th of March to the 7th of August, without a sentence of dissatisfaction ever having been expressed by the Government.

Your committee also report that, "long before this period, the commanding General had, by his letter to the Secretary of War, declared the Seminole war at an end; and, after which, not a single new act of hostility had been committed." It is true, after the defeat of the negroes and Indians at Mickasuky, the destruction of Suwanee, and the asylum of St. Mark's had been wrested out of their occupation, that your respondent persuaded himself that the war was ended. But subsequent information proved this opinion to be erroneous. The letter of Governor Bibb, appended to the report of the Senate, as well as the deposition of Charles Baron, details sundry outrages committed subsequent to the date of your respondent's letter to the Secretary of War; and it is also known that six men were murdered in the interior, which it is believed was communicated by General Gaines to the War Department. The communications of General Gaines and Major Fanning, annexed to the report, also give a very different aspect to this question, and to which your respondent begs leave to refer your honorable body.

In the animadversions upon the motives of your respondent, he cannot withhold the opinion that there has been exhibited an unusual share of asperity, as also a want of charity and forbearance, which was not to have been anticipated from members of so august and enlightened a body as the Senate of the United States, deliberating upon a subject which they have represented to be of great national magnitude. Leaving the motives of the committee on this occasion to their own private review and examination, your respondent will barely observe that they have imperfectly recognised the maxim that innocence is always presumed until the contrary appears by proof. Why they should have inquired into the motives of your respondent at all he is at a loss to determine, as it was a matter entirely beyond their control and jurisdiction. The only subject of investigation was the legality of his official acts, as designated in the resolution of the Senate of the 18th of December.

Your respondent has no objection to this course, except as a pernicious precedent, and a violation of authority. He has no secrets, and will never shrink from a rigid and impartial examination into his official conduct. Had the committee adverted to the order to take possession of St. Augustine, as well as the communications of your respondent to the Secretary of War upon the subject of his military operations, they must have been satisfied that his motives were to promote the public good; to obey his orders, by carrying on a vigorous and efficient war against the savage enemies of the United States, by which the blood and treasure of the nation was to be economized; to establish a peace that would be honorable and permanent, and to give repose and security to our exposed and defenceless borders.

In this instance, as well as in some others, the report of the committee is contradicted by the evidence of its own documents. The depositions of Colonel Butler and Major Eaton (a member of the committee) conclusively prove that your respondent had no agency in speculating in Florida lands, which is in direct opposition to the inference drawn by your committee. No member of that committee can, for a moment, seriously and candidly harbor the opinion that your respondent would lead a gallant army into the field, jeopardize the lives of valuable citizens, risk the ruin of health and reputation, and "violate the Constitution" of his country, for the purpose of speculating with security in Spanish lands. The "motives of his own, unconnected with his military functions," were, a desire to end speedily a savage war, and to save the blood and treasure of the country; and not, as charged, to adventure his health and reputation, and the lives of brave men, in quest of titles to Florida lands. The supposition is unwarranted and unjust, and has its refutation in the very testimony which the committee have published. The dignity of his office, which, at every exposure, he has sought to maintain, never has been prostituted to the purposes of speculation in any way, and it never will. Strange, then, that honorable men should make so foul an accusation without proof, nay, without even circumstances to support it.

Your respondent would beg leave, in this place, to remark upon the depositions annexed to the report. He ventures the opinion that such documents never before have been published to the world as evidence upon which to predicate a report. Eaton's and Mitchell's are the only depositions presented in legal form. To those two gentlemen regular interrogatories were proposed, to which they deliberately responded and affixed their signatures, as required by law; Doctor Brounagh's deposition is signed, but not given under oath; Colonel Butler's, Colonel Gibson's, and Captain Call's, are neither sworn to nor signed. The depositions of the last four gentlemen were published without their knowledge, although they had received a promise from the members of the committee who took down the testimony that it should be copied, and again submitted to them for correction and signature.

Until depositions are fully examined, amended, and signed by the witnesses, they cannot be considered good and complete evidence. This is a rule which, it is believed, is uniformly adhered to in all judicial tribunals; it never should be departed from on any occasion, as it is essentially necessary to an impartial administration of justice. Every opportunity should be given the witnesses to make a fair and full disclosure of the facts; to consider the force and effect of their expressions, as well as the import of every sentence. By an opposite procedure, irreparable injustice may be done, and the rights of a public agent sacrificed by those who should afford him security and protection.

There are several minor points touched upon by the committee, to which your respondent considers it unnecessary to give a particular reply, as they are of inconsiderable importance, and could not be noticed without swelling this memorial to an unwieldy size. He flatters himself they have been satisfactorily answered in the discussion of the other subjects out of which they have accidentally arisen. They will all, however, be more amply and minutely explained by an examination of the documents heretofore communicated to Congress relative to the Seminole war, and others on file in the War Office, and to those accompanying this memorial; to all of which your respondent respectfully refers your honorable body.

To conclude: your respondent has devoted his services to the cause of his country, and to the perpetuation of her liberties. Her Constitution and laws are objects of his sincere veneration, and every anxiety of his heart has been enlisted to promote the glory and happiness of his country. How far he has been instrumental, under the guidance of Providence, in effecting those desirable objects, he submits to the decision of his enlightened fellow-citizens. He does not pretend to be exempt from the errors common to human nature. Surrounded as he was by every privation and embarrassment, in all the hurry and bustle of war, it was next to impossible to attend particularly to every minor consideration. But, upon the great errors charged—a breach of his orders, a departure from the Constitution, and a violation of the rights of humanity—he openly maintains his innocence, and denies that the charges are correctly made. He calls upon the Senate, by the high claims they prefer to unanimity, to protect his reputation from the unmerited censure cast by their committee. He asks for justice, and nothing more; to extend it is due to your respondent, to the Senate, and to the nation.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General com. Southern Div.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 24, 1814.

SIR: Since the date of my last letter it has occurred to me that the proposed treaty with the Creeks should take a form altogether military, and be in the nature of a capitulation; in which case, the whole authority of making and concluding the terms will be in you, exclusively, as commanding General. In this transaction, should it take place, Colonel Hawkins, as agent, may be usefully employed.

I am, very respectfully, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Maj. Gen. PINCKNEY.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 24, 1814.

SIR: In the event of your acceptance of the appointment suggested by my letter of the 22d instant, I have to suggest the wish of the President that you should proceed, without delay, to Fort Jackson, and consummate the arrangements committed to Major General Pinckney, in relation to the hostile Creeks. A copy of the instructions given to General Pinckney is enclosed.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major Gen. JACKSON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, March 17, 1814.

The policy dictated, as well by the unprovoked and ungrateful conduct of the hostile Creeks, as by a due regard to the future safety of the South-western frontier, may be brought under the following heads, viz:

1st. An indemnification, (for expenses incurred by the United States, in prosecuting the war,) by such cession, or cessions of land, as may be deemed an equivalent for said expenses.

2d. A stipulation on their part that they will cease all intercourse with any Spanish post, garrison, or town; and that they will not admit among them any agent or trader who does not derive his authority or license from the United States.

3d. An acknowledgment of a right in the United States to open roads through their territory; and also to establish therein such military posts and trading houses as may be deemed necessary and proper; and

4th. A surrender of the prophets, or other instigators of the war, who will be held subject to the orders of the President.

With these outlines as your guide you are authorized, in conjunction with Colonel Hawkins, to open and conclude a treaty of peace with the hostile Creeks, as soon as they shall express a desire to put an end to the war.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.

JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Major General PINCKNEY.

R. K. CALL, Aid-de camp.

I, James Gadsden, a captain in the army of the United States, on oath declare, that during the whole period in which the transactions below detailed took place, I was an aid-de-camp to Major General Andrew Jackson, and that the following narrative contains a true statement of facts to my knowledge:

Early in January, 1818, General Jackson received orders from the War Department to repair to Fort Scott, assume the command of the army, and to bring the conflict with the Seminole Indians to a speedy termination. The Secretary of War stated the enemy's force to be two thousand seven hundred, or two thousand eight hundred strong, and gave authority to the General to call, from the neighboring States, such a force as would insure the desired object. The regular brigade under General Gaines, did not, according to the last reports, exceed six hundred men. He had called upon Georgia for not more than one thousand two hundred militia; and it was uncertain at that period whether the friendly Creek warriors would accept the invitation tendered. Some additional force was therefore deemed necessary, and the speediest mode of raising it was a subject of solicitude to General Jackson. Governor McMinn, of Tennessee, was engaged about this period in carrying into effect a treaty with the Cherokee nation; and it was a matter of great uncertainty whether a letter would find him at his usual place of residence, near Knoxville, or not. He was not at the capital of the State; and his friends in and about Nashville were generally under the impression that he was still in the Cherokee nation. General Jackson determined therefore to make an appeal to his old companions in arms; many of whom held commissions in the militia of the State. His circular to these men, and his letter to the Governor, notifying him of what he had done, have been published.

I was present at the meeting of field officers of the volunteers at Nashville, and heard no remarks of General Jackson calculated to control or influence them in the selection of their officers. The only subject of anxiety with him appeared to be that the men should be raised by the first of February. He desired that the number should be completed; that the men should be satisfied with their officers; that they should rendezvous at Fayetteville; be mustered into service, and overtake their General on the frontiers of Georgia. Colonel Hayne, inspector general, was instructed to command the detachment on their march to Fort Scott. He received authority to appoint no other officers than those attached to his personal staff; a privilege enjoyed alike by regular and militia commanders. The Nashville company elected their own officers; and the Kentucky company was raised without even the knowledge of General Jackson. Their own feelings led them into the field upon the mere knowledge of the fact that the frontier was exposed to Indian aggressions.

I accompanied General Jackson through a part of Tennessee, previous to his departure South. In every village we passed through, much interest was taken in the approaching campaign; and the citizens were generally inquisitive as to the nature of the appeal to their patriotism. I was directed by General Jackson to explain its character; and, in every instance, expressed but one opinion, as derived from him; that one thousand men were wanted to put a speedy close to the Seminole war; that, in consequence of the confidence which the General had in his old comrades in arms, and the facility with which volunteers could be raised, he had made this appeal; that they must be satisfied with their commanders, and elect their own officers. On this subject I found many individuals exceedingly scrupulous. They were assured that no intention was entertained to impose commanders on them; that the men were wanted, and the General was well aware that, to be efficient, they must be contented with their officers.

General Jackson left Nashville with one company of Tennesseans. A company of Kentuckians overtook him in the Cherokee nation; and the Tennessee brigade had orders to join him, as soon as organized, on the frontiers of Georgia. From Hartford Gen. Jackson moved with the Georgia brigade, and was reinforced, on his march to Fort Scott, by about six hundred friendly Creeks.

From Fort Gadsden, where the operations of the campaign may have been said to have commenced, the movement was made with a force of regulars, Georgians, and Indians, not exceeding two thousand men. The strength of the enemy was not known, at this time, to be less than that stated by the Secretary of War, two thousand seven hundred. A detachment of Tennesseans, and General McIntosh's warriors, overtook the army on the morning of the attack on the Mickasuky villages; and all the troops called into the service were not finally concentrated until the day after the movement from St. Mark's towards the towns on the Savannah river. The actual force of the enemy was never ascertained, until their final dispersion from the Savannah river. Rumor often magnified their strength beyond that stated by the Secretary of War.

The demand of the surrender of St. Mark's was made in amity. General Jackson received intimation that the Indians and negroes, combined, wished to throw themselves into that work, as a dernier retreat; and the Governor of Pensacola had stated that the work and garrison were both too weak to resist their meditated attacks. He was intrusted with the communication to the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's, and directed to urge the propriety of an amicable permit for the fort to be occupied by an American garrison, until the close of the war, on the ground that the Seminole Indians were enemies to both nations; and that every facility should be afforded the American arms in closing a war so injurious to both parties. In the course of the negotiation facts disclosed themselves developing the real character of the Spanish commandant, and, in a measure, implicating him as a party in the war. These facts were reported to the General; and, not until then, was the order issued for entering the fort by violence.

On the return of the army to Fort St. Mark's, from the towns on the Savannah river, General Jackson expressed to me his determination to return to Nashville, conceiving that the war was closed. On the next day information was given, by the captain of a small schooner from Pensacola, that hostile Indians were lurking about that town; that they had frequently sought refuge to the west of the Appalachicola river, and were committing depredations on the road leading from Georgia to the Alabama. On this information General Jackson observed, that it would be necessary to leave strong garrisons in St. Mark's, Forts Gadsden, and Scott, and send a party to scour the country west of the Appalachicola; but he still expressed his intention to return to Nashville. So well persuaded were the officers, generally, that all operations were over, that many of them sought leave of absence. An officer attached to General Jackson's staff, as volunteer aid-de-camp, left him at this place for New Orleans. Previous to his departure, he was told by General Jackson that his services would no longer be necessary, as he was determined to return to Nashville.

Lieutenant Sands was not sent to Mobile to forward on a train of artillery to a given point. This officer had commanded for many years in Mobile; and, being attached to the place, expressed a wish to visit it, with a view of being reinstated in the command, if possible. His request was granted, and he received an order, at the same time, to have a few pieces of ordnance as a condition for field service. Colonel Gibson received instructions, subsequently, from Fort Gadsden, to have the artillery, ammunition, provisions, &c., transported to Fort Montgomery.

On the return of the army to Fort Gadsden, General Jackson received a reply from the Governor of Pensacola, to his letter relative to provisions ascending the Escambia river. At the same time letters were received by individuals, and further information from the captain of the schooner, that Pensacola was under the control of the Indians; that more than four hundred warriors were in the vicinity, preparing for the renewal of hostilities on the Alabama frontier. Major Hogan, who had recently arrived from Fort Montgomery, reported some murders lately committed by Indians direct from Pensacola, and who had returned with their plunder and scalps to that place. On the receipt of this information, General Jackson observed to me that he must himself command the troops destined to scour the country west of the Appalachicola. He did not at that time intimate an intention of occupying Pensacola. To give security to the frontiers of Alabama was his object; and that his operations must be governed by circumstances which might occur.

On the third or fourth day of March, an express was sent to Colonel Gibson, at Fort Montgomery, to endeavor to join the army with the artillery and provisions, at or near Durand's Bluff, the lower crossing place on the Escambia.

At this place a letter was received, by express, from Governor Bibb, detailing the murders which had been committed by hostile chiefs from Pensacola; and the next day after the army had crossed the Escambia, the protest of the Governor of Pensacola was received. The bearer was despatched with a note, promising a reply to the protest that night. The same day I was sent to Pensacola with a reply. The Governor had left his capital. The next day the communication demanding the occupancy of Pensacola and its dependencies, until Spain should control, by an adequate military force, the Indians within Florida, was delivered to the Governor at the Barancas; and on his refusal to accede to the terms of that communication, the army took up its line of march for that place. The result is known.

The plan of St. Augustine was sent to General Jackson at my request, and is now in my possession. As an engineer attached to the Seminole army, it was my duty to be prepared for any events, by obtaining accurate knowledge of the country which might be the scene of operations. I did not request the plan of the proprietor, from any intimation from General Jackson that he intended or wished to visit that fortress.

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
City and Parish of New Orleans:

Be it known that, on this 30th day of June, 1819, before me, John Lynd, notary public in and for said city and parish, duly commissioned, personally appeared James Gadsden, who in my presence signed his name to the foregoing instrument of writing, and, having been duly sworn, deposed that the contents thereof are true and correct. In faith whereof I grant these presents, under my signature and seal of office.

JOHN LYND, Notary Public.

Mr. Sebastiano Caro, a citizen of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, being in Mobile during the early part of the Seminole campaign, he knew nothing of the Indians being at that time in Pensacola; that in the Spring of 1814, about two hundred Indians were in Pensacola, and it was generally understood by the citizens, and believed by them, that those Indians procured ammunition and provisions from the public stores, for the purpose of carrying on their depredations on the American frontier; and that this proceeding was much commented on by the citizens, and generally condemned. Mr. Caro did not himself see ammunition and provisions issued to the Indians; but it was a thing of public notoriety.

Jose S. Caro, a citizen of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, early in the present year, 1818, a party of hostile Indians were in Pensacola, their numbers not known, but probably fifty; that, on hearing of the approach of the American army under General Jackson, the Governor of Pensacola furnished those Indians with provisions and ammunition, and sent them in public boats across the bay. The deponent saw the rations issued, and the party embarked. The deponent further states, that, subsequent to this, he saw three parties of hostile Indians furnished with provisions, the ostensible object of which was, to enable those Indians to march to the interior, and give themselves up; but it was generally believed, that those Indians had no such intention. The deponent saw those Indians set out, and states that they had their arms.

Charles Baron, a resident of Pensacola, being sworn, states that, about the latter end of April or beginning of May, 1818, a party of Indians, amounting to near one hundred, were in Pensacola, with a quantity of plunder, which, it was generally believed, was taken at the time Stokes's family were murdered on the Escambia. The Indians sold this plunder, openly, to the inhabitants of Pensacola; and the deponent could not learn that the Spanish authorities at Pensacola made any inquiries respecting it. The deponent further states, that, at several times in the present year, 1818, he saw parties of Indians furnished with provisions and ammunition, from the King's stores; but he does not recollect the dates of these transactions.

The deponent further states, that he has frequently heard Spanish officers at Pensacola justify the conduct of the Indians towards the United States, manifesting, in their conversation, a decided hostility towards the Americans.

Pierre Senac, being solemnly sworn, declares as follows: That he has resided in the town of Pensacola constantly since the month of November last past; that, since that time, and until the arrival of Major Young near this town, there were always considerable numbers of hostile Indians in or near the town; that, on many occasions within that period, he has seen from one hundred and fifty to two hundred Indians here; that their forces were regularly provisioned from the King's store here; that he has seen large quantities of sheet lead in possession of the Indians, and considers it as greatly resembling the lead aprons of cannon; that the Government must have furnished the lead in question, as there were no other means here of getting such lead; and that the said lead was run off into balls, which the deponent saw.

That on the day that Major Young attacked a party of Indians near this town, there was then in town a considerable number more, who were set across the bay, in boats provided for that purpose, by the Spanish Governor.

Deponent further states, that, about the 1st of March last past, three considerable parties of hostile Indians, one party under the command of Leon Lesassier, another under the command of Arnaud Gilmar, (both lieutenants in His Catholic Majesty's service,) and the third commanded by an Indian chief, retired out of this town, and went down towards the neighborhood of Barancas, where provisions and ammunition were regularly supplied to them by the Spanish Government; that the said Indians were armed with guns, which they had received from the English during the late war; and that they remained encamped within from one to three leagues from Barancas for the space of nearly a month; that these Indians, besides being armed with guns, had also tomahawks, which deponent understood and believes were furnished by John Inerarity; and that, when the Government caused the said parties to be thus assembled and equipped, they were collected at Barancas, for the purpose, as deponent conceives, to elude the vigilance of such individuals in Pensacola as would not concur in such measures.

Defeat of the Seminole Indians, &c.

Deponent further states, that, since the said month of November last past, he has seen brought in here, by the Indians, a quantity of cottonade and women's clothing, brought, or said to have been brought, from the American frontier; that these things were publicly sold in this town, notwithstanding it was notoriously known here that those articles and property had just been taken from those whom the Indians had killed on the American frontier.

M. MCKINSEY, SEN., J. P.

I, Isaac McKeever, a lieutenant in the Navy of the United States, on oath declare, that the following narration contains a true statement of facts, to the best of my knowledge. I commanded the naval force which convoyed the store-ships, transports, &c., from New Orleans to Fort Gadsden, and from thence to the bay of St. Mark's during the Seminole war. I arrived in the said bay on the 1st of April, 1818, with British colors flying at my masthead; on the next day I was visited by a Spanish lieutenant, the second in command at Fort St. Mark's. The lieutenant was inquisitive as to the character of my vessels and the nature of my visit, and wished to know whether I had any authority from the Captain General of Cuba for entering the territories of His Catholic Majesty. In reply, I asked him if he had seen my colors on entering the bay of St. Mark's, and intimated that the nature of my visit could not be satisfactorily explained until the arrival of Captain Woodbine, at the same time intimating that it was of an illicit character, and that succor, aid, &c., to Hillis Hajo and his warriors, in their present distress, was intended. At the mention of this he expressed much satisfaction, stated that Captain Woodbine and the Spanish commandant of St. Mark's were good friends, and voluntarily gave me every information as to the movements of General Jackson's force, and his strength; the situation of the hostile Indians he detailed at length, and stated what rejoicing the reception of the long promised and expected succor would occasion. He stated that Hillis Hajo and the Spanish commandant were on intimate terms; that the former was then in the vicinity, and had lately been at the fort of St. Mark's, when he had urged, with menaces, the commandant to send on board to ascertain to demonstration the character of the strangers; and, having satisfied himself, he would see Hillis Hajo that evening, after which we might expect a visit from the latter, who accordingly came on board the following morning. He likewise informed me that Arbuthnot, a friend to the hostile Indians, and an acquaintance of Woodbine's, was at Fort St. Mark's. On my expressing to him some apprehension of being blockaded by an American squadron reported to be on the coast, or of my retreat being cut off by Jackson, he replied, that the latter was impossible; that Jackson had but five pieces of artillery, and the impracticability of the swamp would prevent his assuming any position below me; but that I need apprehend no danger from any quarter; that, as allies, by anchoring under the guns of the fort, protection would be afforded me.

About this time we were informed by the Spanish officers and Indians who came on board, that, on our arrival within the bay, the Indian camp demonstrated much joy at the approach of their expected supplies of munitions, &c.

NEW ORLEANS, June 5, 1819.

Sworn this 5th June, 1819.

DOM. A. HALL,

Dist. Judge U. S. Louisiana Dist.

The following statement is made by request:

About the 1st of May, 1818, I was sent by the officer commanding at New Orleans in charge of a public transport schooner, with provisions for the garrison at Fort Crawford, with orders to touch at Pensacola, and obtain permission of the Governor of that place to ascend the bay of Pensacola and the Escambia river, through the Spanish territory, to my destination. I arrived at Pensacola on the 16th of May, and immediately reported the schooner, her cargo, and destination, to the Governor; notifying him, at the same time, of my wish to proceed without delay. On the 18th the Governor informed me that he was not authorized to let the provisions proceed without the payment of a transit duty of two per cent., and required an invoice of the cargo to be rendered at the custom-house, in order that an estimate might be made of the duties imposed. I remonstrated with him against the payment of duties on public supplies, on board a public vessel, and designed for public service; and urged a free passage as an act of friendship only, which neighboring nations at peace were bound, in common justice, to extend to each other—all without avail. Fort Crawford being then short of provisions, I was forced by necessity to accept the passage on the terms offered; and, accordingly, entered the cargo at the custom-house, and paid the duties required into the royal treasury.

I inquired of the Governor whether transports, charged with public supplies, and destined for Fort Crawford, would thereafter be suffered to pass Pensacola free of the duties imposed in the present instance; and was informed that a categorical answer could not then be given to the inquiry, as the Captain General of Cuba had not yet given a decision on that point, and whatever he might resolve would be communicated.

When the transport came to anchor in the port of Pensacola, I distinctly discovered several groups of Indians on the water's edge; and, aware of the impotency of the Spanish authority, I was apprehensive I should not be permitted to land in safety. Before I was ready to leave the vessel, however, the Governor's aid came on board, and before we reached the shore the Indians had mostly disappeared. I was afterwards informed that, at the time the transport came to anchor, there were upwards of a hundred in the town, who immediately retired to the neighboring woods by order of the Governor. I was further informed, by a respectable citizen of Pensacola, that, a few days preceding my arrival, a considerable number of Indians, who had taken refuge in that place, had been transported, by the Governor's authority, to St. Rose island, on the opposite side of the bay.

The undersigned certifies, upon honor, to the correctness of the substance of the foregoing statement.

T. CROSS, Capt. U. S. A.

WASHINGTON CITY, Feb. 1, 1820.

I was Quartermaster General of the southern division on the Seminole campaign. At Fort Gadsden I received orders to proceed to Mobile and Fort Montgomery, for the purpose of forwarding supplies to the army, then on its march west. From Mobile I sent the schooner Little Sally, Captain Pastes, loaded with provisions, to the Perdido river, with instructions to remain there until the approach of the army, or until further orders. Two days after we arrived at the Barancas, Captain Pastes joined, and informed us, that his vessel had been taken by a Spanish launch near the mouth of Perdido, and brought under the guns of the Fort Barancas, and detained several days. This was confirmed by several Spanish officers after we took possession of the fort.

I certify, on my honor, to the truth of the above statement.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, March 27, 1818.

SIR: In the present state of hostilities between the Indians and the United States, your aid and co-operation may be required by the General commanding the United States army in the South; you will therefore afford all the aid and support in your power, and keep up a correspondence for this purpose.

Despatch immediately two gunboats and two of the smaller vessels to Mobile and to the Appalachicola, to protect the convoys of supplies, and to remove any obstructions to a free communication between the forts and forces of the United States. It will be your duty also to adopt such further measures as the circumstances of the case or the development of events may render necessary.

B. W. CROWNINSHIELD.

P. S.—Commandant J. D. Henley is also ordered to send one of the small vessels of his squadron to the Appalachicola, which vessel will be subject to your order.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Oct. 2, 1816.

SIR: Your communication of the — ultimo, with its enclosures, have been received, and submitted to the President, as well as my letter of the 27th ultimo to you.

Since the date of that letter information has been received directly from Spain, which gives additional force to the impressions entertained in relation to Colonel Jesup's communications. The improbability of the information given by that officer will not, in the opinion of the President, justify any arrangement which is calculated to produce public excitement.

A judicious disposition of the force under your command, with a view to meet an event of that nature, is all that is considered necessary at the present moment, except the transportation of the arms and munitions of war to the menaced point of attack, which such a measure renders indispensable.

These dispositions you will carry into execution agreeably to the instructions contained in my letter of the 27th ultimo, with such modifica-

Extract of a letter from William H. Crawford, Secretary of War, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated 27th September, 1816.

The destruction of the Negro fort, at the junction of the Appalachicola and Flint rivers, may have removed the necessity of keeping up so large a force in that quarter. It must, however, be admitted, that every means of exciting those Indians to hostility will be resorted to in the event of a Spanish war. But even in that event, it is questionable whether we should keep so large a portion of our active force pent up in a fort, acting on the defensive, when, in fact, there is nothing worth defending. The militia of Georgia would be competent to the chastisement of the hostile Indians in that quarter. If the danger becomes more threatening, all the posts in the interior of the Indian country may be occupied by the militia of that State and Tennessee, so as to admit of the assemblage of the whole regular force at the point immediately menaced. Your knowledge of the situation of the posts within your command, will enable you to adopt the necessary measures to secure the object presented in this communication.

In withdrawing forces from posts now occupied, you will keep in view the preservation of the military stores which may have been deposited in them, which can only be done by transporting them with the troops, or by leaving a sufficient number of them for their protection, until the post can be manned by the militia, or troops brought from the northern division.

SIR: I have received your letter of the 18th ultimo, and have to regret the situation in which you are unfortunately placed. Every effort will be made, however, to relieve you. I shall leave this place for Fort Hawkins on the 22d, and two regiments of mounted volunteers will rendezvous at Fayetteville, Tennessee on the 31st instant, and proceed, by forced marches, direct to our southern frontier.

Extract of a letter from Major General Jackson to Brevet Major General Gaines, dated

HEADQ'RS, NASHVILLE, Aug. 17, 1818.

DEAR SIR: I am happy to find that the notorious Mecodicoxy is at length destroyed. The distresses of the Indians for provisions I expected. Your providing for their wants meets my entire approbation. It will meet the full approbation of the Government, as it corresponds with their usual humanity, always extended to the suffering Indian.

I have noted with attention Major Twigg's letter, marked No. 5. I contemplated that the agents of Spain, or the officers of Fort St. Augustine, would excite the Indians to hostility, and furnish them with the means. It will be necessary to obtain evidence substantiating this fact, and that the hostile Indians have been fed and furnished from the garrison of the fort of St. Augustine. This being obtained, should you deem your force sufficient, you will proceed to take, and garrison, with American troops, Fort St. Augustine, and hold the garrison prisoners, until you hear from the President of the United States, or transport them to Cuba, as in your judgment, under existing circumstances, you may think best.

Let it be remembered, that the proceedings heretofore carried on by me, or this order, is not on the ground that we are at war with Spain; it is on the ground of self defence, bottomed on the broad basis of the law of nature and of nations, and justified by giving peace and security to our frontier. Hence the necessity of procuring evidence of the fact of the agents or officers of Spain having excited the Indians to continue the war against us, and that they have furnished them with the means of carrying on the war. This evidence being obtained, you will (if your force is sufficient) permit nothing to prevent you from reducing fort St. Augustine, except a positive order from the War Department.

Orders, some time since, have been given to officers of the ordnance commanding at Charleston, to have in readiness a complete battering train, the number and caliber of the guns pointed out; I have no doubt but that you will find them in readiness. I enclose you the report of Captain Henley, of the naval force on that station; you will open a correspondence with Commandant A. J. Dallas, to insure his co-operation, provided it should be required.

I trust, before this reaches you, you will have destroyed the settlement collected at Suwanee. This can easily be done by a coup-de-main, provided secrecy be observed, and great expedition of march used; without expedition of movement, and great secrecy is observed, you will be discovered, and the enemy will either flee or endeavor to ambuscade you; both of which ought to be guarded against.

Have a careful eye to your supplies on hand, that before they are consumed others may be ordered, and reach you: without necessary supplies an army cannot operate with effect. The late scarcity ought to teach us a lesson on this head never to be forgotten; I shall, therefore, expect that no scarcity will exist at any place, post, or garrison intrusted to your care.

I shall expect to hear from you shortly, and that you and your brigade may be successful in all your operations, and cover itself with glory, is my heartfelt wish; and, with this feeling, I am, very respectfully, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 7, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 9th, and three of the 15th instant. I have the pleasure of expressing to you my entire approbation of all the measures you have adopted to insure a prompt movement of the patriotic volunteers confided to your command.

It is a subject of regret that there is no public arsenal in that section of the country, from which arms and equipments could be drawn. The course which you have taken to remedy the evil, I trust, will be effectual. So far as it may be practicable, let the arms be preserved and returned, after the campaign closes, to the owners. Where this cannot be done, let the account, properly vouched, be paid by the quartermaster's department.

The bills drawn on account of supplies of every kind will be paid when presented to this Department. Upwards of one hundred thousand dollars have been forwarded to the paymasters of the fourth and seventh regiments, for the payment of the militia, before they are discharged. General Jackson will adopt such measures as will be proper to secure this object. The desire of the President, that the disbursing officers of the regular forces should be charged with the expenditures of the campaign, is the only obstacle to appointing the gentlemen recommended by the officers of the Tennessee brigade. Every attention will be given to secure the object of their wishes.

I am well aware of the difficulties to be overcome to organize efficiently, and satisfactorily to the officers and men, a volunteer corps for the field. In the present instance, the pride and spirit of veterans, aided by patriotism, and directed by superior intelligence, have handsomely surmounted every obstacle. The alacrity with which the brave Tennesseans have again resumed their arms in defence of their country, is a sufficient earnest that their efforts will be successful, and that their efficiency, joined with the gallant exertions of other corps, will speedily terminate the conflict. I have the honor, &c.

I, Richard K. Call, captain of the United States army, and aid-de-camp to Major General Jackson, do swear, that, some time during the last session of Congress, I was summoned to appear before a committee of the Senate of the United States, to give evidence in relation to the occurrences of the Seminole campaign; that, after giving the statement, which appeared as one of the documents accompanying the report of the committee, (which statement was taken in writing by one of its members,) I was told by Mr. Lacock, chairman of the committee, that my testimony could not then be copied in order to receive my signature, but that by the next morning at ten o'clock it should be prepared; at which time I should have an opportunity of comparing it with the original, and of correcting any mistake which might arise in its being transcribed. I accordingly repaired on the day appointed to the Senate Chamber, and was informed by Mr. Lacock, chairman, that the committee would not meet that day, and that my testimony was not yet copied. I again mentioned to him, that, from the number of mutilations and erasures which had been made in recording my evidence, if it was copied, I should expect the right of seeing it before it should be given to the public. He replied that he did not know that the committee would make any use whatever of my deposition; but if they should ultimately determine to introduce it as a document on which a report would be framed, it should be previously copied, submitted to my inspection, and receive my signature; none of which promises were complied with. After my interview with Mr. Lacock, I remained in Washington five or six days, to the best of my recollection, during which time I heard nothing from Mr. Lacock or my deposition; neither did I learn that my statement had been applied to any purpose until my return from Philadelphia to Baltimore, at which place I saw it attached to the report of the committee.

My deposition, however, though published without my having an opportunity of correcting errors which might arise in transcribing it, and in direct violation of Mr. Lacock's promise, is, according to my recollection, correct, with a trivial exception. It is not, however, without error; and this error will be found in the omission of the expression, I believe. When interrogated by the committee, in relation to the purpose for which Lieutenant Sands had been ordered to Mobile, my answer was, I believe he was ordered there for artillery; and not positive to the fact. I, moreover, observed to the committee, that I did not, at that time, belong to the personal staff of General Jackson; my duties were remote from his person, and therefore I was little acquainted with the views and opinions of the commanding General.

That, when I appeared before said committee, I was questioned upon the subjects contained in my deposition, which is published in the documents accompanying their report of the 24th February, 1819; that the substance of my answers was taken down by Major John H. Eaton, a member of the committee; and that it was expressly declared to me by John Forsyth, another member, "that if my testimony was used by the committee, I should have timely information, for the purpose of affording me an opportunity of correcting it." That this promise made me by Mr. Forsyth was violated; and that I never saw the deposition afterwards, until it was published in the documents accompanying the report.

SIR: In a conversation with Mr. Forsyth on the subject of the report of the committee of the Senate, I stated that the committee had misstated several facts in relation to the occurrences of the Seminole war. "First. That the Governor of Tennessee was in Nashville when you received your instructions to call for a portion of the militia of the State, and that you neglected to make any requisition upon him for the number for which you were authorized to call; informing him that he was not then in Nashville, and that you had written him immediately on receiving your instructions. I further told him that you were prepared to prove that you had not appointed the officers to their respective commands as alleged by the committee." To all which Mr. Forsyth replied, that it was much to be regretted that, in an investigation so important to the country and the character of the individual, evidence so closely connected with the matter in consideration had not been earlier before the committee. SIR: I have just received orders from the President of the United States to repair to Fort Scott, Georgia, with instructions to call on the Governors of the neighboring States for such additional militia force as may be deemed necessary to co-operate with the disposable regular troops of the southern division, against the Seminoles.

I have this night addressed circulars to several of those brave officers who served with me during the Creek campaign, under a hope that a timely address to the patriotism of our citizens will enable me to effect, by voluntary enlistment, what would otherwise have to be done by draughts.

I have called for one thousand mounted men; and, should the appeal prove inefficacious, will embrace the earliest opportunity of making a requisition on you for a like number of draughted militia.

I have received your letter of the 4th instant, and am happy to hear of the ratification of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 11, 1818.

SIR: The Seminole Indians have raised the war hatchet. They have stained our land with the blood of our citizens; their war spirit must be put down, and they taught to know that their safety depends upon the friendship and protection of the United States. To accomplish this, the aid of one regiment of mounted gun-men, of one thousand strong, completely armed and equipped, and to serve during the campaign, is asked from West Tennessee. Can you raise them, and be ready for the field, in ten days? If you can, your General, who led you to victory on the plains of Talledega, Emuckfau, and Tohopeka, asks you to accompany him to the heart of the Seminole towns, and there aid in giving peace and safety to the southern frontier. An answer is expected in five days, and it is anticipated that the number required is now ready. This is a private appeal to the patriotism of West Tennessee, and is not to appear in a newspaper. If the regiment is raised and marched, all expenses for expresses shall be paid. By the return of the express you are expected to give your opinion of the probability of the result, that preparations may be made accordingly. Colonel R. H. Dyer, Colonel Gibson, Colonel Williamson, Colonel George Elliott, Major William Mitchell, Major John Smith, of Montgomery county, Colonel Martin, of Williamson, and Captain F. Ellis, of Dixon county, have alone been addressed on this subject. The grade of the officers to be determined by themselves or the platoon officers of the regiment. The officers raising companies to command them. Upon further reflection, it is requested that those officers named above, and all such as can raise a company, will meet me at this place on the 19th of the present month. Punctuality in this is much desired; and it is further requested, that all those officers, who have served in the late war will be confidentially notified of the foregoing.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major General commanding.

NASHVILLE, January 19, 1818.

SIR: In my last I informed you of the late order received from the President of the United States, and the appeal I had made to the patriotism of West Tennessee. This day the officers who heretofore commanded the volunteers met me, and report, that two regiments of mounted gun-men will rendezvous, on the 31st instant, at Fayetteville, prepared and equipped for a tour of six months. Thus you see, that my best hopes of Tennessee are realized. Had circumstances permitted, and time allowed, and the emergency demanded an appeal to the whole State, I have no doubt but five thousand men could have been raised. There appears no difficulty but the want of arms. With those two regiments, and the regulars, should the time of the Georgia troops have expired, I will be able to act promptly, and, I hope, with effect.

The last account from Fort Scott, on the 19th ultimo, left the regular force in an unpleasant situation. I set out on the 22d, in the morning.

I have the honor to be, yours, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON.

His Excellency Governor McMINN.

Act of the Legislature of Tennessee. [See chap cxviii, sec. 112.]

Be it enacted, That, when it may be conceived that the public good eminently requires it, the Governor is hereby authorized to call out such parts of the cavalry of this State as he thinks proper; and, when so called out, they shall be considered, ruled, and regulated, as mounted gun-men, for the time he may so order them.

JUNE 20, 1818.

DEAR SIR: I am happy to hear of your return, as also those brave men who volunteered their services with you.

I have never heard from you since you left the Lookout Mountain; but hope, from what I have learned from others, that you have silenced the disturbers of our peace. I am prodigiously pleased to hear of your leaving the posts of St. Mark's, and Pensacola in possession of the Americans out of which I trust in God they will never be taken.

Extracts of two letters from the Governor of Tennessee to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated MURFREESBOROUGH, April 6, 1819.

Your favor of the 3d instant is now before me, and with pleasure I make the following reply:

Your letter, dated Nashville, 11th January, 1818, reached me at Knoxville, seat of Government.

Your letters of the 11th and 19th January both reached me by due course of mail; the former advising of your having received instructions from the President of the United States to call on the Governors of the neighboring States for such militia force as you might deem necessary, to co-operate with the regular troops of the southern division against the Seminole Indians; but that you had made an appeal to the officers who had served with you in the Creek campaign, by which you expected that the necessity of calling on the State of Tennessee for one thousand draughted men would be superseded; which expectation must have been realized, by the advice contained in your letter of the 19th above referred to; in which you state that the officers have given you assurances that they would furnish two regiments at the earliest notice. Your mode of raising those regiments met my entire approbation; and I gave it my support in aiding Captain Dunlap in raising a company of mounted volunteers, at Southwest Point, which I have since learned joined your army at Fort Gadsden.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 5, 1819.

SIR: The enclosed is a copy of a letter from the chairman of the committee of the Senate, on the subject of the Seminole war.

Governor Bibb's letter to you of the 19th of May last is all the information now in the possession of this Department relative to the inquiry of the committee.

I will thank you to communicate, as early as practicable, whatever information you may possess on all the points of inquiry contained in the letter of the chairman, and not comprehended in the letter referred to.

I have, &c.

Arthur P. Hayne, inspector general of the southern division of the Army of the United States, and late commandant of the Tennessee volunteers, being duly sworn, testifies: That, in the month of January, 1818, Major General Andrew Jackson, of the United States' Army, addressed circular letters to Colonels Dyer, Williamson, Elliott, Mitchell, Phillips, and others; and stated to them that the southwestern frontier was in danger, and that he had determined to make an appeal to the patriotism of the people of West Tennessee; that it was his wish to raise two regiments for that object. And deponent further testifies, that, on the arrival of the field officers at Nashville, they, the said field officers, settled among themselves their own rank; and the deponent further declares that the said field officers were not, in any way or manner, either directly or indirectly, mediately or immediately, controlled, governed, or influenced by the said Major General A. Jackson; and the deponent further testifies, that the field officers determined, at their first meeting at Nashville, that individuals who first succeeded in bringing to the rendezvous full companies should rank as captains, and command their own men; and that the same principle should govern the election of subalterns. And the deponent further testifies, that he never received any authority from Major General Andrew Jackson, nor was he concerned himself, any way or manner whatever, either directly or indirectly, mediately or immediately, in any of the appointments of the officers of the Tennessee brigade, with the exception of those of his immediate staff, a privilege allowed to all commanding officers, either in regular or militia service. The deponent further testifies, that the muster-rolls of the Tennessee brigade were forwarded on to the Adjutant and Inspector General's Office, at Washington City, on the 13th of February, 1818, from Ditto's landing, on the Tennessee river; that the said rolls reached Washington in safety, and in the ordinary course of mail.

ELM GROVE, May 21, 1819.

DEAR GENERAL: I have just returned home from the western district, and have recently seen the report of the Senate of the United States relative to the Seminole war, wherein I find you charged, by a committee of that honorable body, of organizing and appointing the officers to take the command of the volunteers from this State engaged in that war. Certainly that committee could not have received the proper information respecting the particular subject; and, believing that you, sir, have a wish that the facts should be stated in all questions wherein you are concerned, I have thought proper to make the following statement, which every field officer belonging to the two regiments, I have no doubt, will recollect to be facts.

Seminole War—Strictures on Mr. Lacock's Report.

In the month of January, 1818, you made an appeal to a number of those officers who had accompanied you in the Creek war, and to Mobile, Pensacola, and New Orleans, and named to them that there were one thousand men wanting, and that volunteer mounted men would be received; and requested that those officers would meet at Nashville, on the 19th January, 1818; at which time and place a number of officers met. After assuring you that the men could be raised with ease, it was proposed by myself, and some other officers then present, for you to name the officers to command those troops. This you refused, and said, "Agree among yourselves on your officers;" and then stated to the officers present that you would appoint Colonel A. P. Hayne to lead us on to Fort Scott, and, on our arrival at that point, you would then take the command yourself. We then left you, and withdrew to a room, where it was agreed that I should take the command of the first regiment, and Colonel Thomas Williamson should take the command of the second regiment, and that we should officer and organize them in the same way that the volunteer mounted gun-men were organized in 1814, when we marched to Mobile, Pensacola, and New Orleans; the other field-officers were then agreed on, and our names reported to you, in writing, who would command the two regiments. You then named to the officers the law regulating the Peace Establishment, and how the regiments were officered under that law. It was then named to you by myself, together with several other officers, that, by experience, we had found that horsemen required more officers than footmen, on account of horsemen covering a much larger space. You then said, "Organize yourselves in a way that you may think proper; it will rest with the Government." A number of those officers you made the appeal to were commissioned by James Madison, Esq., then President of the United States, in 1812; and a part of them, under all privations, stuck to the service with you, without a murmur, during the war with Great Britain and the hostile Creek Indians.

I am, sir, with great respect, yours, &c.

R. H. DYER,

Late Colonel 1st reg't Tenn. volunteers.

The facts stated in the above letter are known by the undersigned, who was present at the time alluded to, to be correct.

THOMAS WILLIAMSON,

Late Colonel 2d reg't Tenn. Volunteers.

MURFREESBOROUGH, Sept. 23, 1819.

SIR: In answer to your note of this date, just received, I have to reply that I was of the volunteer corps raised in East Tennessee, in the latter part of the year 1812, by Colonel John Williams, and marched into East Florida in the same year, or in January in the year 1813, as well as I recollect. I was an officer in the said corps, and held a commission signed by Colonel John Williams.

This volunteer corps was raised under the influence of Colonel Williams, organized by him, and the officers commissioned by him. We marched into East Florida, and had an engagement with the Indians and negroes. This campaign was approved by the General Government, and the officers and men paid for their services.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAMUEL BUNCH.

Major General JACKSON.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON:

In answer to the interrogatories this day proposed by you to me, I declare I held no office or appointment whatever under Colonel John Williams, or any other person, in the Florida or Seminole campaign, commonly so called, set on foot and commanded by Colonel John Williams, in 1812.

I was one of the privates composing that service, and my services were wholly voluntary. I did not know that any commissions were made out in form for the officers; but I know that the officers were selected or named by Colonel John Williams, and I know those selected by him served in the capacity for which they were selected. I know it, because I was consulted on that occasion; the selection having been made, as I believe, with a view, in part, to the feelings and interest of the individuals composing the command. We had an engagement with Indians, and perhaps negroes; but I do not know that there were any negroes in the engagement. I received my pay from the General Government, and I believe all others did. I know of no authority given by the General Government to raise such company, nor have I ever understood that there was any; and I believe the same to have been wholly voluntary.

Given under my hand, this 22d of September, 1819.

[Communicated for publication.]

STRICTURES ON MR. LACOCK'S REPORT ON THE SEMINOLE WAR.

The author of this article has had access to documents, the perusal of which convinced him that the report of the select committee of the Senate, on the Seminole War, is alike unjustifiable in temper, argument, and statements. Its temper is harsh and vindictive, its arguments are childishly weak, and its statements are, in many instances, grossly and unaccountably erroneous.

The report has been read with astonishment and regret; regret that such a document should go before the world unanswered in Senatorial discussion; and astonishment, as well as the institution of such an inquiry into the conduct of General Jackson as at the anomalous and unfair manner in which the investigation has been conducted.

But independently of the peculiar hue of this instrument, it is also objectionable—1st. Because it is designed to impute the cause of the war to our own officers and Executive, laying aside all provocation and aggression on the part of the Indians; 2d. Because it directly implicates the President and Secretary of War; for, although they were not, in the first instance, guilty of what the committee calls "a gross violation of the Constitution," yet they made the act theirs by adoption; and, if this implied accusation is just, those officers ought to be impeached; and, 3d. Because the Senate should not prejudge a case which they may be required to examine judicially; and on which this anticipation of censure would disqualify them to act.

This subject was, on the 18th November, referred, by the House of Representatives, to two committees, the military and foreign; and, one month after, on the 18th December, Mr. Lacock moved, in the Senate, for a committee on the same subject. He appears to have been the moving principle throughout the whole investigation in the Senate. To his exertions are the public indebted for the commencement of the business, its peculiar character of virulence, and the singular document by which it is terminated.*

The Seminole war was discussed in the lower House for more than three weeks, and yet not a single member suggested the slightest censure either on General Jackson, for the employment of volunteers, or on General Gaines, for the unauthorized call on the Creek nation. It was reserved for Mr. Lacock to make the discovery of a violation of the Constitution in these acts; and the hostility of his views, in advancing such a charge, is to be found in the time at which he made his report—when the Senate had but six days to sit, and it could not be discussed; and in declining to annex the customary resolution, so as to admit of discussion and afford the friends of General Jackson an opportunity for defence. In fine, it was obviously intended to counteract the effects apprehended from the vote of the House and the force of public opinion; and was, incontestably, designed to inflict a wanton blow on the feelings and character of General Jackson, under the imposing sanction of a regard for public duty.

It is needless to consume time in an exposition of reasons for thinking such a trial of any man's motives and conduct unfair and unconstitutional. It is enough to remark, that justice consists, not merely in awarding punishment for crime, but in giving to individuals accused of misconduct a full and impartial hearing, and an opportunity of advancing all accessible testimony for the elucidation of their acts and the uprightness and innocence of their intentions. This justice has been denied to General Jackson. His public acts and private character have both been made the subjects of systematic investigation; and, without a hearing, he has been pronounced guilty of the awful crime of striking at the liberties of his country, by an infraction of its Constitution; and has received, in a sentence of censure, the cruellest punishment that can pierce the bosom of a soldier.

* Mr. Lacock's son was contractor's agent, and failed in supplying Fort Scott. It has been intimated that the father was interested in the contract.

And what is the motive to which all the General's acts in Florida have been attributed? His operations, say the committee, were conducted "on reasons of his own, unconnected with his military functions"—and these "reasons" were mercenary views and speculations, which the occupancy of the Spanish territory would facilitate and mature! It is to be hoped that General Jackson will never degrade himself by answering a charge as foul as it is ridiculous—a charge totally unsupported by any of the documents, and abundantly refuted both by them and by his character. No man in public life, who marches steady and erect along the path of duty, can fail to awaken enmity among those who envy his reputation, without ability to emulate his virtues. But, surely, the deadliest foe of General Jackson cannot, for a moment, credit such a charge as this. I dare venture to assert, that not a single member of the select committee, malignant as appears to be the hostility of some of them to the General, believes that he led an army to the field, and jeopardized the lives of valuable citizens, in order to speculate with security in Spanish lands; or that he risked the ruin both of health and reputation, and prostrated the Constitution, to secure the paltry advantage of buying a few acres in Florida. We read of men whose dangerous political ambition prompted to the commission of awful crimes towards their country; but the monstrous act of overturning a free constitution and making unauthorized war, with the despicable view of trifling pecuniary emolument, is yet, and may it long be, unheard of and unrecorded. If that committee do not believe the charge they have advanced, what can be their views, and how will they explain their motives to their country? It would be both indecorous and useless to indulge in the language of resentment and recrimination; but it would be injustice to the country to withhold the expression of a deep conviction, that this most unjust and illegal trial originated in dishonest motives—from feelings of personal hostility in one of the members, and, in others, of a disposition to gratify a junta. It is right to state, that two members of the committee were opposed to the report. One of those, who was not personally acquainted with the General, and who sat in the convention which framed the Constitution, was too well acquainted with the principles of that sacred instrument, to sanction any proceeding calculated to do it vital injury; and the other had too long known Gen. Jackson to enertain any doubt of his purity. When the course of these gentlemen is contrasted with that of the majority in the committee, the people will have no difficulty in conceiving the impure motives by which that majority were governed.

The principles which guided the Commander-in-Chief, in the movements of the Seminole campaign, have been so ably developed and supported by men of integrity and talents, that it is deemed unnecessary now to review them. The orders which governed him are before the world. The selection and use of the means for their complete execution are well known. If he left anything undone which was necessary "to give peace and security to the Southern frontier;" or if he unnecessarily superadded to the sufficient means of effecting this object any act injurious to the country and destructive of the Constitution, the grounds for a fair judgment are with the nation, and its award, either of blame or approbation, will doubtless be just. This article shall be confined to the elucidation of some obscurities, and the correction of several misstatements of facts in the narrative of the report. The argumentative part shall only be touched incidentally.

It is stated in the first page of the report "that, in the Spring or Summer of 1817, the regular troops were withdrawn from the posts on the Georgia frontier, and concentrated at Fort Montgomery, on the Alabama river, a considerable distance west of the Georgia line." This is calculated to create an impression that General Jackson issued the order for evacuating the posts south of Georgia, and thereby jeopardized that frontier, by opening the way for savage incursions. But, in the commission of this military error he was no way instrumental. The order for the movement of the troops to the Alabama was issued from the War Department, by Mr. Crawford, contrary to the General's opinion, who considered the movement both dangerous and impolitic.

In page 2 it is stated that General Gaines ordered Major Twigg "to surround and take an Indian village, called Fowl Town, about fourteen miles from Fort Scott, and near the Florida line." The order to Major Twigg was, to bring to Fort Scott the chief of Fowl Town, who had repeatedly been called to an interview, and as often contumaciously refused to appear. The object of General Gaines was to have a definitive understanding with the Chief, respecting his hostile or friendly intentions; and the importance of such an understanding induced the General to order his forcible capture, if gentle means proved inefficient.

In the same page is this remarkable paragraph: "On the receipt of this order," (the order under which General Jackson proceeded on the Seminole campaign,) "General Jackson, instead of observing the orders of the Department of War, by calling on the Governor of Tennessee, then in Nashville, near the place of his residence, chose to appeal (to use his own expressions) to the patriotism of the West Tennesseans, who had served under him in the last war. One thousand mounted gunmen and two companies of what were called life-guards, with the utmost alacrity volunteered their services, from the States of Tennessee and Kentucky, and repaired to his standard. Officers were appointed to command this corps by the General himself, or other persons acting under his authority. Thus organized, they were mustered into the service of the United States."

At the time this order was received, the Governor of Tennessee was either in Knoxville or the Cherokee nation; and to have waited the result of the usual process of draughting would have produced the two evils, of much loss of valuable time and the raising of a force reluctant in disposition and inefficient in character and equipment. General Jackson immediately despatched a letter to Governor McMinn, apprizing him of the call for volunteers, and informing him that in case the call should not be promptly and effectually answered, he should require of him one thousand draughted militia.* The Governor warmly approved the step the General had taken, and added to his force one company of mounted volunteers, who joined the army at Fort Gadsden. General Jackson's letter of the 12th January, apprized the Department of the measure, and the Secretary approved and sanctioned it.†

Corps of the same character with the Tennessee volunteers were raised in other parts of the country, and under different officers, during the late war with Great Britain. In the Northwestern campaign, General Harrison was joined by a body of volunteers, led by Colonel Johnson; and Governor Shelby authorized the General to form them into corps, and appoint such officers as the men might elect. Another body of men, from Ohio, joined the army on the march of General Harrison for the relief of Fort Wayne, without any authority, and uncommissioned by the State Executive. These organized themselves and appointed their officers. Their services were accepted for ten days, and they received pay for that period.

It is well known that exactly the same kind of troops followed General Jackson into the Creek nation, and achieved the victories of Taledaga, Emucklaw, and the Horse-Shoe. The same men who penetrated the swamps of Florida, covered Mobile from British visitation; and the same troops, officers, and men,‡ defeated Wellington's veterans on the shore of the Mississippi, and saved New Orleans from incendiary pollution. Did Congress, then, adjudge the act of raising them "unconstitutional," or did they approve the measure and make appropriation for paying them? I will not say that the sanctioning an act by one Congress obliges every succeeding Congress to approve all similar proceedings. But, where a measure of important necessity is adopted on personal responsibility, and approved by the Government or the nation, it must be some motive, different from a regard for principle, that could prompt a committee of Congress, at another period, to censure a similar measure, urged by similar necessity, and productive of similar benefit.

* See Doc. B. † See Docs. C. D. L. K. I.

‡ It is worthy of remark, that the same regiments, similarly officered, and nearly the same men who were at New Orleans, were in the Seminole campaign. They assembled in 1814, at the call for volunteers, chose their officers, and cheerfully obeyed them, although none were commissioned. They followed the same course exactly in 1817-18, and, in both cases, victory followed their march.

The muster rolls of the volunteers, in 1814 and 1818, now on file in the War Office, establish this fact.

It is thought unnecessary to enter minutely into an inquiry on the powers of either the War Department or a Major General Commanding, to raise, on emergency, a body of mounted volunteers. We shall leave this discussion to those who are fond of cavilling at forms, and raising technical objections to the most important and necessary measures. Suffice it to say, that General Jackson had to choose between two modes of raising the requisite force: the one productive of pernicious delay,* and calculated to insure ultimate defeat; the other, more simple, less expensive, and creative of an army, fraught with ardent enterprise, and willing to endure every privation in giving safety to their brethren of the South. To select was not difficult. It was a choice between defeat and victory; the full performance of an urgent duty, or the disgrace of the General and the destruction of his army.

The committee are grossly erroneous in asserting that General Jackson appointed the officers of the volunteer corps.† He did not appoint one of them. It is true that he appealed to the officers who had gallantly fought with him in the wilderness of the Creek nation, and on the plains of New Orleans, and again roused them to the defence of their frontiers.‡ But their appointments to command were in all cases made by the choice of the men they brought into the field; and many of the officers, high in rank, accepted subordinate commissions. Colonel Hayne was ordered to take command of the volunteers, to organize, muster, and march them to the frontier. It may be well to remark, before quitting this subject, that the field officers of the Georgia troops were appointed by choice of the men, after the concentration of the militia on the west bank of Ockmulgee, and beyond the civil jurisdiction of Georgia.

In page 5, the committee remark that the whole strength of the Seminoles, when combined, did not exceed one thousand men, opposed to whom, under General Gaines, were "1800 regulars and militia, besides 1500 Indians, illegally subsidized by the last mentioned General. What, then, in this state of the case, becomes of the plea of necessity?" I will ask, if the committee did not know, that correct information of the numbers and positions of the Indians was only obtained * See Doc. A. † See Doc. M.

‡ The importance of rapid movement, at that time, is best proved by a reference to Doc. F. containing an extract of a letter to Colonel Arbuckle, then at Fort Scott, in an extremely difficult situation.

after the termination of the campaign? General Gaines was led to believe, from his inquiries on this subject, that the number of the Seminoles exceeded 2,800 warriors. Would it have been prudent to march half this number of men to the frontier, had the General even believed the numbers of the enemy to be exaggerated? The strength of the Seminoles might easily have been augmented by auxiliary bands from the more easterly parts of Florida, and it became General Jackson's duty, under this consideration, to raise such a force as would insure success in every emergency. Can it be wrong to act against an enemy, with a larger force than his own: or is it impolitic and unamilitary to use that superiority which will insure success? Such a principle may govern those who lead men to battle to gratify ambition, and weave barren laurels for their brows. But such battles General Jackson never has fought, and never will fight. He has too dear a regard for the character of his country and the lives of her citizens, to endanger either in useless contests; and far may it ever be from him, to draw either on the purse or the blood of the Republic, to purchase the wreath of unprofitable glory.

It is said that the Indians were illegally subsidized by General Gaines. General Mitchell's letter of the 14th December, 1817, to the Secretary of War, apprizes the Department that the friendly Indians should be employed; and General Gaines, in a letter of the 2d December, also informs the Secretary of the contemplated employment of Indians; which communication was received at Washington, on the 26th December. If, then, the Executive were early apprized of General Gaines's intention, the Secretary, by not disapproving the measure, adopted it; and the committee knowing this fact, in attributing improper and illegal views to General Jackson, only afford an additional display of splenetic hostility to the army, and the most wanton and studied disregard of truth.

The committee accuse the General of disobedience of orders, inasmuch as he disregarded the injunction to General Gaines to abstain from attacking Spanish garrisons, without special instructions from the Department.

It is a clear principle that no order given to one officer can be made part of an order subsequently given to another officer, for the performance of the same duty, without a special reference to the first, and an express direction to be governed by it. Jackson's orders were general: he was told to terminate the conflict, and give tranquillity to the frontier; and, in these orders, no instructions can be found for his government by the orders previously given to General Gaines. In selecting the means of accomplishing the objects of the campaign, the commanding General's powers were discretionary, and for his judgment, in using those powers, was he alone responsible. The only mode in which he could have disobeyed the order, was either to have remained inactive at Nashville, or to have adopted such measures as would have been more pernicious than inactivity. In either case, his conduct would have been justly reprehensible.

But admit the orders of General Gaines to be obligatory on General Jackson—the case contemplated by these orders never occurred. The Indians were not found under the guns of the Spanish fort, but were sheltered within it. It was their depot, from whence they drew their public stores, both of ammunition and provision. Spanish officers escorted parties of Indians to place them in security from our attacks. The war was planned in St. Mark's. The Indian power of attorney was executed there, and countersigned by F. C. Luengo, the commandant; and the councils for the arrangement of every warlike movement were held in the quarters of that officer.

If these facts had been known at the War Office, it is not to be doubted, that an order would have been issued for the seizure of St. Mark's. For when they, and the acts of the General induced by them, were known, the President approved of the measure. It had not been conceived that the Spanish officers had made themselves parties in the war; and no previous order could have been expected to meet a case which was not supposed to exist.

In page 6, the committee remark, that "here also at (St. Mark's) were taken two Indian chiefs, one of whom pretended to possess the spirit of prophecy; they were hung without trial, and with little ceremony." The committee have forborne to state, that Francis the Prophet had long been one of our direst and most dangerous foes—that he had a Brigadier's commission from Great Britain—and that he successfully employed his superstitious influence and the promises of his trans-atlantic friends to instigate his deluded brethren to deeds of rapine and massacre. They seem also to have forgotten that Homathlimico, the other chief, had headed the party who in cold blood murdered Scott and his unhappy companions—struck the reeking tomahawk into the bosoms of defenceless women, and "dashed out the brains of their infants against the boat."

Was it mere "technical retaliation" under which these monsters were executed, or, was their death an awful but just punishment for their unhallowed crimes? It is wrong to speak of the policy of executions; and I trust that mere policy shall never be urged as an excuse for depriving a fellow-being of existence; but criminals are executed both for example and punishment, and the awful example made of Francis and Homathlimico had a wide-spread influence. Two Indians had been taken with them and released; and, in a few days, the whole Ocheese tribe surrendered at discretion. They were treated humanely, furnished with transportation and provision, and sent into the Creek nation.

An effort is made by the committee to show, that, at the time General Jackson believed the war to be ended, he had resolved on occupying Pensacola. To establish this charge, they more than once refer to extracts from his letters, wherein he states that the Seminoles are dispersed and their means of annoyance destroyed. It will be recollected, that these letters were written after the end of that part of the campaign which was conducted in East Florida, and had a necessary reference to the General's success in securing that portion of our frontier immediately open to the incursions of the Eastern Seminoles. At the time the despatches were written, the numbers of hostile Indians in West Florida were unknown; and, without attributing to General Jackson the powers of prophecy and magic, it was impossible, in stating "the Seminole war was ended," that he meant to extend the remark to all future aggressions, both on the eastern and western extremities of our Southern border. The Seminoles in East Florida were dispersed, not exterminated; their towns were burnt and their cattle taken from them; of course, when scattered and in a state of starvation, the commanding General safely said the war with them was at an end. But the means of subsistence they might soon again procure from labor and the sympathy of their Spanish friends east of Savannah—and, these obtained, they still possessed the power of concentration and incursion; although it was confidently trusted that the awful lesson which they received would have a permanent salutary influence.

In West Florida, the same outrages had for some time been committed, almost daily, on the frontier of Alabama; and the letter from Governor Bibb of the 19th May, which was received on the arrival of the army at the Escambia, plainly showed that the territorial border called as loudly for defence and security as the frontier of Georgia.

East and West Florida were similarly situated; both were inhabited by Indians hostile to the United States, in both had British instigation cherished and matured this spirit of hostility, and in each, had the savages a depot, whence they drew their warlike munition, and on which they could retire in case of defeat. Of all these facts, the General had the fullest proofs; and with these proofs before him, he had to choose between retiring from Florida into Tennessee, content with doing half his duty by securing half the frontier, or executing his orders entire, by pursuing the same course to tranquillize the West, which he had successfully adopted in the East.

I mean not now to enter upon a defence of the occupancy of Pensacola. General Jackson believed it necessary, and therefore he did it. If it saved the life of a single frontier settler, it was right; and it can only be proved wrong by showing, that there was not a single body of Indians in West Florida at the time Pensacola was occupied. The savages west of Pensacola Bay were scattered in the swamps, obtaining, after their dispersion by the movements of Major Young's and General Jackson's advance into the country, a miserable subsistence by hunting and depredating on the cattle of the inhabitants. Had these Indians, irritated by defeat, been granted access to their old depot, they would, in parties of ten and twenty, have committed more murders on our open borders than could ever have sat easy on General Jackson's conscience, had any act or neglect of his facilitated their commission. Common sense as well as national law prohibits any violation of neutrality to prevent an evil remotely prospective. But, where the expected danger is both of vital character and certain occurrence, to neglect any means of preventing it is not only falsely generous but grossly criminal. Individuals may make such sacrifices, when mere personal danger or inconvenience is apprehended, but to avert so dreadful an evil as the murderous incursion of a savage foe, all accessible means of security and prevention are imperiously called for. Men, who know the Indian character, are well aware of the folly of defensive operations to restrain their massacres and predatory expeditions. If the whole army had been extended in a cordon, along the Southern frontier, they would have been laughed at by the Indians. Relieved from all apprehension of attack, and the privation of their Spanish depots, they would have leisurely concentrated their forces, and broken the cordon at almost any point. It was then necessary to attack them, and, as in West Florida they never were imbodyed the General had either to march his whole army in pursuit of each little squad of warriors, and exterminate them in detail, or to adopt such measures as would relieve his army from useless toil and bloodshed, and his country from unnecessary expense. This measure was the provisional occupation of Florida. It was an act of necessity; the necessity we were under, in all cases, to protect the lives and liberties of our citizens. If the occupation of Amelia Island is justifiable, the seizure of Pensacola is still more so; for the lives of our citizens are of infinitely greater importance than the plunder of our commerce, and the security of a frontier from Indian invasion, of much greater interest than the prevention of smuggling.

To destroy the scattered parties in West Florida, Captain Boyles, with two companies of rangers, was ordered to scour the country, and his gallantry and success are well known.

In page seven of the report there is a sentence calculated to induce a belief that the terms of capitulation were forcibly imposed upon the Governor and garrison of Pensacola. These terms were proposed by the Governor himself, before surrendering the Barancas; and were fully acceded to, except in such points as affected the security of the occupancy, and the objects of the campaign.

It was unnecessary to remark that General Jackson abolished the revenue laws of Spain, (p. 6.) The capitulation engaged for the transportation of all the officers of Government, civil and military, to Havana. What then became of their revenue laws? The Governor virtually abolished them himself.

It is not a fact that all the officers of the new Government were military men. The temporary Governor, Colonel King, is an officer of the Army; but civil officers were appointed in the different departments from among citizens; and Mr. McKenzie, a native of Mobile, was placed at the head of the magistracy. The civil rights of the inhabitants were secured to them, and in some instances particular privileges of individuals were held sacred, which were totally repugnant to the nature of our political institutions.

In the ninth page of the report, there is a remark, that, before General Jackson could make a hostile movement on the Spanish possessions, they must have "opposed him by physical, not by moral force." It is not easy to understand this distinction; but I presume the committee mean by moral force, the use of persuasion and instigation among the Indians, and furnishing them with arms and ammunition. If the use of such a moral force is not to be opposed and avenged without an infraction of natural law and the Constitution, in what a situation are we placed! The adoption of such a principle forever puts a stop to frontier emigration, and the proud spread of our hardy population. It declares to the enterprising settler of the wilderness, that it is illegal to protect him from Indian incursion; and it says to the infamous emissaries of Britain, Your safety is now secure; go among our Indians, and by gold and superstition spirit them to reiterated outrage; deluge our frontier in blood—we dare not touch you—standing under the shelter of our Constitution, your punishment would be a stab to the liberties of our country.

In regard to General Jackson's order to General Gaines to occupy St. Augustine, it is only necessary to say, that it was issued in conformity to the same principle which governed the General in all his movements in Florida, viz: That, where the Spaniards identified themselves with the Indians, by arming or sheltering them, they were to be treated as enemies in our own defence—one of the most sacred necessities imposed on man.

In page eleven, the committee ask, "If these things are admitted in the South, will not they be considered as authorized in the North? I answer, yes.

It is needless to remark on that part of the report which regards the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister. The committee admit, "that, having left their country and united their fate with savages with whom the United States were at war, they forfeited their claim to the protection of their own Government, and subjected themselves to the same treatment which ought, according to the principles and practice of the American Government, to be extended towards those with whom they were associated." If their crimes merited punishment, (and where in the catalogue of depravity can we find a blacker crime than the excitement of savages to butcher women and children?) and the civil powers of our country had no jurisdiction over their acts, it remains only to state, that General Jackson had the right and the power to execute the law of nature and nations upon them. If the two great points are admitted—the guilt of the prisoners and the power of the General—what object have we in cavilling at the mode of their trial? An error in the formal part of the proceedings would not have proved the innocence of the accused, and of course could not vitiate the whole transaction. If the conduct of these men had been such as was imputed to them, their death was richly merited. And if it is even admitted that General Jackson in punishing such monsters erred in formalities, the establishment of their guilt and the application of the corrective not only consummated his duty, but repaired all the insubstantial defects which might have given impunity to crime.

To conclude: these remarks are presented to the world from a deep conviction that the report of the committee not only does the greatest injustice to General Jackson, but in its character and tendency is destructive of our dearest rights. Every citizen of the Republic is wanting in duty to his country who does not solemnly protest against so novel and unconstitutional a proceeding. If inquisitorial investigations can be instituted into the character of individuals, at the will of the legislative branch of our Government, why did the great framers of our Constitution give us a Judiciary and Executive? If the Senate can assume the judicial and Executive functions, why may not the President usurp the legislative power? If such a precedent is acquiesced in by the honorable body from one of whose committees it emanated, it is greatly to be feared that such an usurpation will be infinitely more dangerous than the open efforts of ambition, even when supported by the licentiousness of standing armies.

WASHINGTON, March 5, 1819.

P. S. It has been intimated that some gentlemen of the committee have expressed their regret, that all the facts on the subject of their inquiry had not been obtained before they made their report. No excuse is left them for not procuring all the facts; for, General Jackson stated to one of the select committee that he was willing to appear before them as a witness, and expose to them all the documents in his possession. It should be recollected that the General himself furnished the copy of his order to General Gaines respecting the seizure of St. Augustine.

CIRCULAR. A.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, Jan. 11, 1818.

SIR: The Seminole Indians have raised the war-hatchet. They have stained our land with the blood of our citizens. Their war spirit must be put down, and they taught to know that their safety depends upon the friendship and protection of the United States. To accomplish this, the aid of one regiment of mounted gun-men, of one thousand men, completely armed and equipped, and to serve during the campaign, is asked from West Tennessee. Can you raise them, and be ready for the field in ten days? If you can, your General, who led you to victory on the plains of Talledega, Emuckfau, and Tohopeka, asks you to accompany him to the heart of the Seminole towns, and there aid in giving peace and safety to the Southern frontier. An answer is expected in five days, and it is anticipated that the number required is now ready. This is a private appeal to the patriotism of West Tennessee, and is not to appear in a newspaper. If the regiment is raised and marched, all expenses for expresses shall be paid. By the return of the express, you are expected to give your opinion of the probability of the result, that preparations may be made accordingly. Colonel H. Dyer, Colonel Gibson, Colonel Williamson, Colonel George Elliott, Major William Mitchell, Major John Smith, of Montgomery county, Colonel Martin, of Williamson, and Captain F. Ellis, of Dixon county, have alone been addressed on this subject. The grade of the officers to be determined by themselves, or the platoon officers of the regiment. The officers raising companies to command them. Upon further reflection, it is requested that those officers named above, and all such as can raise a company, will meet me at this place on the 19th of the present month. Punctuality in this is much desired; and it is further requested that all those officers who have served in the late war will be confidentially notified of the foregoing. I have the honor, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, Jan. 11, 1818.

SIR: I have just received orders from the President of the United States to repair to Fort Scott, Georgia, with instructions to call upon the Governors of the neighboring States for such additional militia force as may be deemed necessary to co-operate with all the disposable regular troops of the Southern division, against the Seminoles. I have this night addressed circulars to several of those brave officers who served with me during the Creek campaign, under a hope that a timely address to the patriotism of our citizens will enable me to effect, by voluntary enlistment what would otherwise have to be done by drafts. I have called for one thousand mounted men, and, should the appeal prove inefficacious, will embrace the earliest opportunity of making the requisition on you for a like number of drafted militia.

I have received your letter of the 4th instant, and am happy to hear of the ratification of the treaty with the Cherokee Indians.

With respect, your most obedient servant,
ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 12, 1818.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your order of the 26th ultimo, which reached me last night; its contents are duly noted, and will be promptly attended to.

I have received no late advices from General Gaines, although I have for some time expected the return of the express sent to him on the 24th of November last. Taking into view the strength of the Seminoles and their adherents, as reported to you by General Gaines, and the aggregate of his strength, regulars and militia, amounting to about one thousand eight hundred men, which cannot possibly afford a like number of effectives; considering, likewise, that the greater portion of his forces are draughted militia, from Georgia, who may apply for their discharge at the expiration of three months from the time they were first mustered, and who may be disposed to claim this right, and abandon the campaign, about the time I could reach Fort Scott, I have deemed it both prudent and advisable to call from the west end of the State of Tennessee for one thousand volunteer mounted gun-men, to serve during the campaign. With this force, in conjunction with the regular troops, I can act promptly, and, with the smiles of Heaven, successfully, against any force that can be concentrated by the Seminoles and their auxiliaries. Viewing, however, the lives of our citizens as too precious to be risked in a contest with savages, with the odds of two to one, unless where real necessity demands the exposure, I have therefore written to the Governor of Georgia to continue in the field the one thousand men required by General Gaines.

The result of the appeal I have made to the patriotism of those brave men in West Tennessee, who have so often followed me to the field of danger, will be known by the 19th instant, and I hope to leave this for Fort Scott on the 22d. Of my movements, and success in raising the mounted volunteers, you shall be advised.

It may appear to the Government, on the first view, that mounted men are the most expensive; but when we consider the rapidity of their movements, the amount of quartermaster's expenditures for pack-horses, baggage-wagons, and other means of transport indispensable to footmen, in this instance saved, mounted gun-men, as auxiliaries in such a campaign as the one contemplated, will be found to save both blood and treasure to the United States. The volunteers that have been invited to the field are of tried materials, and such as can be relied on in the day of danger and trial. With respect, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
Nashville, January 13, 1818.

Sir: Being advised that the assistant deputy quartermaster general of General Gaines's brigade has resigned, and being unadvised as to quartermaster's funds within the seventh department, I have to request that necessary funds be forwarded to Quartermaster General Gibson, at Fort Scott, whom I have ordered to meet me at that place without loss of time.

Should the one thousand volunteer mounted gun-men attend to my appeal to their patriotism, I shall send on a confidential agent to Georgia, to have the necessary supplies for them procured and forwarded by the quartermaster, if any there, to Fort Gaines; and, if none, by the agent sent, with instructions to draw on Quartermaster General Gibson for the amount of his purchases; this is done to facilitate the march of the volunteers called for. I need not observe that, without quartermaster's funds, an army cannot be wielded either with promptitude or effect. Promptitude in the present campaign will be a great saving to the United States, both in character and purse.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Sir: You will repair to Fayetteville, Tennessee, on the 31st instant, and there muster and receive into the service of the United States for six months, if not sooner discharged, two regiments of mounted volunteers. As soon as mustered, you will assume the command of these troops, and make every preparation to facilitate their march, via Fort Jackson by the most direct and practicable route to Fort Scott, on the Flint river. DEPARTMENT OF WAR, March 7, 1818.

Sir: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 9th, and that of the 15th ultimo.

I have the pleasure of expressing to you my entire approbation of the measures you have adopted to insure a prompt movement of the patriotic volunteers confided to your command.

It is a subject of regret that there is no public arsenal for that section of the country, from which arms and equipments could be drawn. The course which you have taken to remedy the evil, I trust, will be effectual. So far as it may be practicable, let the arms be preserved, and returned after the campaign closes to the owners. Where this cannot be done, let the account, properly vouched, be paid by the Quartermaster's Department.

The bill drawn on account of supplies of every kind will be paid when presented to this Department. Upwards of one hundred thousand dollars have been forwarded to the paymasters of the fourth and seventh regiments, for the payment of the militia before they are discharged. General Jackson will adopt such measures as may be proper to secure this object. The desire of the President, that the disbursing officers of the regular forces should be charged with the expenditures of the campaign, is the only obstacle to appointing the gentlemen recommended by the officers of the Tennessee brigade. Every attention will be given to secure the object of their wishes.

I am well aware of the difficulties to be overcome, to organize efficiently and satisfactorily to the officers and men, a volunteer corps for the field. In the present instance, the pride and spirit of veterans, aided by patriotism, and directed by experienced intelligence, have handsomely surmounted every obstacle. The alacrity with which the brave Tennesseans have again resumed their arms in defence of the country, is a sufficient earnest that their efforts will be successful, and that their efficiency, joined to the gallant exertions of other corps, will speedily terminate the conflict. I have the honor to be, &c.

Extract of a letter from J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated 29th January, 1818.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 6, 1818.

Sir: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 20th ultimo, and to acquaint you of the entire approbation of the President, of all the measures which you have adopted to terminate the rupture with the Indians.

The honor of our army, as well as the interest of our country, requires that it should be as speedily terminated as practicable; and the confidence reposed in your skill and promptitude assures us that peace will be restored on such conditions as will make it honorable and permanent.

Major Gen. A. JACKSON,
Fort Scott, Georgia.

M.

ROBERT BUTLER, Adjutant General of the southern division of the Army of the United States, being duly sworn, testifies, that, in the Summer or Fall of 1817, Mr. John Donelson, of the neighborhood of Nashville, went to Pensacola and purchased lots of land there, with the approbation of the Governor. That the deponent has heard that Mr. James Jackson of Nashville was concerned with him, and was the only person concerned. He also understood that Donelson's first view in going to Pensacola, was for the benefit of his health. That Mr. Donelson is nephew of General Jackson's wife. That he does not know the amount of Donelson's purchase. That he does not know, nor does he believe, that General Jackson had, or expected to have, any interest in said purchase; nor did he ever hear it suggested.

The deponent further saith, that on the 11th January, 1818, General Jackson addressed a circular to the old volunteer officers, to raise volunteers for the Seminole campaign, in which the following clause is found: "The grade of the officers to be determined by themselves, or the platoon officers of the regiment—the officers raising companies to command." The deponent has heard that an election was held, and the rank of the field officers established in that way, and not appointed by General Jackson, as stated in the deponent's affidavit before the committee of the Senate as positive, when the deponent then stated it as matter of opinion only; also, that the Governor of Tennessee was at Nashville, which it appears from reference to papers was not the case. The deponent further states, that General Jackson received information at St. Mark's on his return from Suwanee, that there were about six hundred hostile Indians at Pensacola, who received ammunition and provisions from the Governor; in consequence of which the General ordered Lieutenant Sands, of the artillery, to Mobile, to hold two pieces of the field artillery in readiness for his orders. On the arrival of the army at Fort Gadsden, the General received information of several murders having been committed on the Federal road, and was shown a letter, said to be private, from a gentleman at Pensacola to Mr. Doyle, as the deponent believes, stating that a large number of Indians were then in Pensacola, and depredating on the property of the citizens; this information determined the General to change his route for Tennessee by Pensacola, and orders were given to Colonel Gibson to proceed to Mobile, and afford Lieutenant Sands every facility in moving the artillery to Fort Montgomery, to await the General's order, which was given on nearing the Escambia by express, requiring the artillery to form a junction with the army after crossing that river, which was executed. The General remarked to the deponent on march to Pensacola, that, if he found the information true on reaching that place, he would demand a surrender of it; and the deponent believes that the determination of the General to occupy Pensacola and Barancas, was made on receiving the protest of the Governor, and learning that his provisions were stopped by him at the former place.

That, at the time the army attacked Mickasukee, there were not more than five hundred Indian warriors embodied; nor does the deponent believe there were, at any time during the war, more than five or six hundred embodied at any one place. That, from the nature of the subject, this statement must be conjectural. That the enemy's warriors were in general well armed. That deponent was told there were about thirteen hundred souls at Suwanee, of which two hundred and fifty or three hundred were fighting men. That our army had one man killed and four wounded, in actions with the Indians, during the campaign, and two killed at the Barancas.

Deponent further says, that General Jackson received from a private source, a plan of the fortress of St. Augustine; and, as the deponent believes, it was sent to the General, at St. Mark's, or Fort Gadsden, after his return from Suwanee.

That General Jackson had under his command, in Florida, from recollection, about eighteen hundred regulars, volunteers, and militia, and about fifteen hundred Indians under McIntosh; and that the Indians were received and mustered into the service of the United States, under the orders of brevet Major General Gaines, and mustered out of service, under the orders of Major General Jackson, by a regular officer.

This deponent deems it due to himself to state, that the deposition published with the report of the committee of the Senate, under his name, was not written by him, but was taken down by Mr. Burrill, of that committee, and a promise given to the deponent that, when it was thrown into form, it would be submitted for correction and signature, which was not done, although the committee were twice informed by one of its members, at the request of the deponent, that parts thereof were not correct; hence the deponent was not able to give the necessary correction which he would have done, from an examination of papers and necessary reflection.

ROBERT BUTLER.

N.

WASHINGTON, March 3, 1819.

On an examination before the special committee of the Senate, on the subject of the Seminole war, I was told by the honorable Mr. Burrill, one of the committee, that what he (Mr. Burrill) then took down of my testimony, was a memorandum; and if used, that my deposition should be written out, and submitted to me for correction. The deposition was not submitted; but was sent at once to the printer; who, believing that several words were omitted, sent it to me for revision; I then waited on two of the committee, Mr. Lacock and Mr. Burrill, and obtained leave to strike out a part, but they would not permit me to make any additions. The parts struck out were not material. What I wished to add, was the substance of an order, the following extract from which I beg leave to make a part of this deposition.

Extract of an order to Colonel Gibson, dated

"CAMP, 26 MILES EAST OF ST. MARK'S,
April 24, 1818.

"General McIntosh and his warriors will be at Fort Scott, and will probably take much of the supplies ordered up; and, as the Tennessee volunteers will pass from Gadsden to that point, he wishes you to despatch a boat with a further supply; and should the corn have arrived from New Orleans last ordered, you will forward a considerable quantity, also, to enable the volunteers' horses to reach Fort Hawkins."

"ROBERT BUTLER,

Adjutant General."

The order from which this extract is made, together with the order from which the following is extracted, were submitted through Mr. Eaton to the committee. I beg leave also to make the second extract a part of this deposition, to wit:

Extract of another letter to Colonel Gibson, dated

"BEFORE ST. MARK'S, April 9, 1818.

"This is carried by one of those deluded wretches who have asked for peace, and it is granted them—17 men, 18 women, and 30 children have surrendered, and they ask permission to pass by water to Fort Gadsden; this is granted them, and they will remain here until the runner returns, by whom you will write to the commanding officer of St. Mark's, Captain Vashon, under what badge you will know them.

Sworn before JOSEPH FORREST.

From the National Intelligencer of March 20, 1819.

MR. LACOCK'S REPLY TO THE FOREGOING
"STRICTURES," &c.

Having recently seen, in the National Intelligencer, Strictures of an erroneous character, upon a report made by a select committee of the Senate, on the subject of the Seminole war, and being the only member of that committee now at the Seat of Government, it seems to be a duty I owe to the Senate of the United States, to the committee of which I was a member, and to my own character, to offer some remarks on those Strictures. In the first place it is necessary to observe, that, on applying to the editors of the National Intelligencer, I was informed by them, in writing, that they were authorized to give up, as the authors of the strictures, the names of two officers of the Army of the United States. Could I have brought myself to believe that those young men* were the real, as they were the ostensible, authors of those strictures, they would have been treated with silent pity and commiseration, and their production would have remained forever unnoticed by me. But charity for those men, and the peculiar circumstances of the case, forbid this conclusion. We must look to a higher source for their author. Those young men were aids to General Jackson, or belonged to his military family. Some of the documents annexed to the strictures were, it seems, furnished from his own private bureau, for they could not be obtained in the War Office. The personal invectives indulged * Those officers were examined by the committee; they discovered (but more especially one of them) talents, and much energy of character, that, if tempered with prudence, cannot fail to make them useful members of society; and a tenderness for them, bordering on parental regard, has induced me to withhold their names from the public, knowing that "public rebuke hardens the heart," and believing that, when they have numbered my years, they will look back on the unguarded follies of youth with sorrow and remorse.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—75

in, in the strictures, correspond entirely with his previous observations in the public taverns and ball-rooms of Washington; for it is a fact notorious, and cannot be denied, that on those occasions he was vociferous in his imprecations, and violent in his threats, of personal vengeance, even to cutting off the ears of some of the members of the select committee, and this while the subject was before the Senate; and some members of the House of Representatives who dared to animadvert upon his conduct, or even to doubt his infallibility, were menaced in nearly a similar manner. Under these circumstances, there seems to be no unfairness in considering that General Jackson is the real author of those strictures, or at least that he approved of and assented to the publication;† and that those gentlemen (with more gallantry than prudence) were induced to step forward and take upon themselves a responsibility that the General himself felt unwilling to encounter. And it is for him to decide how far it was just and proper for age and experience to take advantage of the exuberant ardor of youthful feelings and attachments, and by this means induce the officers in question to hazard their reputation and future prospects in the Army, by acts of inconsiderate rashness. As citizens of the United States, they were entitled to equal privileges with all others. As military officers, they were held strictly subordinate to the civil power. An act of Congress declares, that every officer shall be cashiered, or otherwise punished by court-martial, who shall even speak contemptuous or disrespectful words of the Congress of the United States, or of the Legislatures or Governors of any of the States in the Union. And, by rules and regulations established in the Army of the United States, the officers are forbidden, under like penalties, from publishing in newspapers, or otherwise, observations disrespectful of each other.

And it is believed that this is the first instance in which a military officer, whose conduct was the subject of investigation before the Congress of the United States, has ventured to charge that body with a violation of the Constitution, and with exercising inquisitorial power.‡ Or that a committee of either branch of the National Legislature has been charged with the "most wanton and studied disregard to truth," and the most "foul" and "dishonest motives." But how far it is either for the honor or interest of the nation thus to submit to military dragooning and newspaper chastisement, by military officers who, it is believed, visited the Seat of Government for that purpose; and how far a committee of the Senate of the United States should be subject to this kind of discipline, for the conscientious discharge of official duties, imposed by the unanimous voice of that body, is for the proper authorities to determine.

† If the reader entertains any doubts as to the authorship of the Strictures, they will be removed on reading the deposition of Colonel Orr, in which it will be seen, that General Jackson obtained from him a fact which he asked leave to make use of, and that the fact is made use of in the Strictures.

‡ See the last paragraph of the Strictures.

I shall now state faithfully the proceedings had in the Senate and before the committee, on this subject, pledging myself, and appealing to others, for the correctness of every fact stated.

On the 18th November, 1818, the President's Message to both Houses of Congress was received. In this Message the President refers to the Seminole war, and promises to present to Congress the documents respecting it.

On the 4th December, 1818, this volume of documents was received in manuscript and sent to the printer. On this day (and not on the 18th, as stated erroneously in the strictures) the resolution was offered in the Senate, for raising the committee on this subject; it was considered on the 7th, and postponed from time to time, until the 18th December, when it was modified and enlarged, on motion of Mr. Eaton, and unanimously adopted. This delay was occasioned by the Senate's not having previously received the documents from the printer.

There had, however, been made, in the Senate, a call on the President, for further information on this subject, and this resolution, offered on the 16th December, was agreed to on the 17th, and the call was complied with on the 28th December, by Message, and another volume of documents furnished.

These documents were not received from the printer until the 1st or 2d February, 1819. But a copy of them had been received by each member of the Senate, through the medium of the House of Representatives, to whom they were first sent, on the 27th or 28th January, and, on the day they were received, the committee were called together. At this meeting all the members being present, Mr. King made a motion that the committee should ask the Senate to discharge them from the further consideration of the subject. The question on the motion was put, and, four members voting in the negative, it was of course lost.

And, at this time, the committee ordered, under the authority of the resolution of the Senate, that the Aids of General Jackson, and such other persons as the chairman might think necessary, should be summoned before the committee for examination.

This order was complied with, witnesses were summoned, and the examination proceeded, from day to day, as the witnesses appeared, subject only to the delay and interruption that arose from the indispensable necessity the members of the committee were under, of attending to their other official duties.

Thus the inquiry was prosecuted, until the committee were told by the chairman, that he knew of no other evidence that it was in his power to obtain. And at this time, as on former occasions, particular inquiry was made of the members of the committee generally, and of Mr. Eaton particularly, whether it was known that further testimony could be obtained, or whether they wished that other witnesses should be summoned, and the answers to these inquiries were, in the negative.

The testimony being thus considered as closed the nature of the report to be made to the Senate was then discussed, and all the points involved by the conduct of General Jackson, on which there could be any doubt, were distinctly stated in writing, and separate questions taken on each of them. On the first point, of raising and organizing the volunteers, the unanimous voice of the committee was, that it was illegal. The second point, the right to pursue the enemy into Florida, was decided unanimously in the affirmative. And on several other points, the committee were divided, three disapproving the conduct of the commanding General, and two justifying or excusing it.

The decision of the committee being thus had, the chairman was ordered to prepare a report in conformity to the principles established by the committee. About this time, however, another circumstance took place, which necessarily occasioned some delay in obtaining further evidence.

Mr. Eaton informed the chairman of the committee, that he had heard General Jackson say, at his lodgings, that, after he had left the Florida, he had issued an order to General Gaines, to take possession of St. Augustine, and that this order had been countermanded by the Department of War.

The chairman having ascertained this to be the fact, by a letter dated February 8, called on the Department for this correspondence, which was furnished on the evening of the 12th of the same month.

These documents never before having been called for, were not previously transmitted; nor was this design of taking St. Augustine, (after the close of the war,) known to the committee until this disclosure; and it was thought necessary that the documents should accompany, and be taken notice of in the report. If further evidence be necessary to convince the most incredulous "that no improper or unnecessary delay was observed in making the report," it will be furnished by the following facts: The Senate of the United States is connected, by the Constitution, with the Executive, in the exercise of the treaty-making power.

On the 9th or 10th of February, the chairman of the committee was confidentially informed that the treaty with Spain would probably be brought to a favorable result, in a short time; and a suggestion was made, that a report on the subject of the occupation of Florida might, by possibility, affect the negotiation, if made previous to the signing of the treaty.

These facts and suggestions were immediately communicated to a majority of the members of the committee, and more especially to Mr. King, whose experience in diplomatic concerns gave him a full opportunity of forming a correct judgment on the subject.

This gentleman, with two other members of the committee, besides the chairman, agreed that the report should be kept back a few days, until the treaty was received. On Monday, the 22d of February, this treaty was sent to the Senate; on the 24th, it was ratified; and, on the same day, the report was made. And this accounts for the only delay that was not occasioned by the difficulty of obtaining the evidence proper to an understanding of the case, and which it was impossible for the committee sooner to obtain.

Thus it appears that the charge, in the strictures, that the report was kept back to injure General Jackson, is totally without foundation. And it is equally untrue that "his friends" on the committee had no opportunity of making a defence. The same time was afforded them to make a defence, that was given to the chairman to write the report. They were present when the decision of the committee was made, and the chairman received his instructions. A counter statement might have been prepared and offered, in the manner pursued by Colonel Johnson, in the House of Representatives; or, if this course should have been thought ineligible, or irregular when the report was made to the Senate, it might have been called up at any time, and a resolution offered, approving or excusing the conduct of General Jackson, and this resolution might have been prefaced by reasons at large, in opposition to the reasons offered by the committee, and thus the minority on the committee would have had a full opportunity of laying before the public the result of their deliberate opinions on the subject. Neither is it true, "that the chairman declined annexing the customary resolutions to the report." But, on the contrary, the fact is known to every member of the committee that, when the chairman presented the report, the question was put by him, whether resolutions should be annexed, and the committee decided unanimously in the negative. But it appears, by the strictures, that the chairman of the committee has been almost the sole actor on this occasion, and has had the entire control of the committee, and of the Senate.

The author of the strictures, in thus giving importance to the individual concerned, has unintentionally done him too much honor, the acceptance of which, at the expense of the Senate, he begs leave to decline, desirous, as it relates to himself, of being only considered what the Senate had constituted him—the chairman of the select committee. As their organ, he was subject to their control, and acted in conformity to their instructions; as, in like manner, the committee was controlled by the Senate, and bound to observe the instructions received from that body.

And it was a source of no small gratification to the committee to find that their conduct in the investigation was approved by the Senate, and that it was so approved is manifest from the following facts:

* The word "friends," is used as a quotation from the strictures. It is certain that General Jackson had not an enemy on the committee, although his conduct was disapproved.

On the 17th February, 1819, Mr. Forsyth, a member of the select committee, resigned his seat in the Senate, and of course was no longer a member of the committee; and, on the same day, a resolution was offered in the Senate proposing that another member should be added to the committee in the place of Mr. Forsyth. On this question a discussion took place, and it was expressly and repeatedly stated that the remaining members of the committee were equally divided; that, unless the vacancy was filled, no report could be made to the Senate. The nature of the report to be made, and the additional evidence procured, was also fully disclosed.

The members of the committee opposed to the report, particularly Mr. King, stated to the Senate that his object was, that the committee should be discharged; and, that the Senate's refusing to add another member to the committee would be equivalent to discharging the committee; and, with this understanding, to try the principle, and take the sense of the Senate in discharging the committee, Mr. Eaton moved the postponement of the resolution before the Senate to a day beyond the session, and on this question the yeas and nays were called—16 members voting in favor of the postponement, and 21 against it.*

Thus it appears that the select committee of the Senate was appointed by the unanimous voice of that body; that they were with the same unanimity vested with powers to send for persons and papers, and specially instructed to make the investigation; and that, after the investigation had been made, the facts disclosed, and the substance of the report, then prepared, were made known to the Senate.

That body, by a strong majority, refused to release them, and held them to a discharge of their duty; so that it is not the committee alone, but the Senate of the United States, that should be considered, as they really are, responsible for this transaction, not, unfortunately, to a military chieftain, or subalterns in the army, but to the American people.

It is not the fact, as stated by the author of the strictures, that General Jackson was charged in the report, with acting from mercenary motives and views of speculation in Florida lands. No such charge was made; neither can such a charge be fairly inferred from any part of the report.

The words selected by the writer, and which are tortured into such a charge, are these: "The tendency of these measures of the commanding General seems to have been to involve the nation in a war without her consent, and for reasons of his own unconnected with his military functions."

In these observations, there is no charge of the nature complained of, either expressed or implied, nor was any such designed; and it must have been extreme sensibility on this subject that could have induced the author to have drawn such an inference. The plain and obvious meaning of these words are, that General Jackson, as a military officer, had no right to judge what was cause of war with a neutral, and his attempting to reason and act on this subject was an usurpation of the civil powers of the Government, and, of course, unconnected with his military functions.

But, since so much anxiety has been discovered on this branch of the subject, and so much pains taken to refute a charge never made on General Jackson, but by the author of the strictures, it may not be amiss to state, that, had the committee been disposed to receive and give credit to such hearsay evidence as that on which Arbuthnot was hung, there might have been more necessity for the elaborate defence set up on this point.

And thus it must be seen, notwithstanding what is said in the Strictures, that the committee were disposed to deal, not only with fairness, but with tenderness, towards General Jackson. He was heard by his staff; his bosom friends, and the members of his own family, were selected as the witnesses; and, when a call was made in writing on the Secretary of War, for information, it was sent to General Jackson, and the inquiries made by the committee were answered by him; and he goes at large into the reasons that induced him to occupy Pensacola. This letter of General Jackson's was received and considered by the committee, and will be found among the documents accompanying their report. Thus, it must appear, to every unprejudiced mind, that General Jackson had not only an opportunity of being heard before the committee, and of furnishing all the documents in his possession, but that the committee were anxious, as well on his account as on account of the character of the nation, to obtain evidence in justification of his conduct.

It now becomes necessary to take some notice of the deposition of Colonel Butler annexed to the Strictures. This gentleman was examined before the committee, and his testimony was taken down by Mr. Burrill, a member, and afterwards read to him, and he assented to it as written. After which, on a subsequent day, when some other witnesses were examined, it appeared there was a material variance, on a particular fact, between their evidence and that of Colonel Butler; and it was mentioned to Mr. Eaton, by the chairman, that the probability was, that the Colonel had been mistaken as to that fact, and advised him to mention the circumstance to him, that if, on reflection, he should think he had fallen into an error, he might be able to correct it. This information was given to Colonel Butler, as Mr. Eaton afterwards stated, and the Colonel sent word, by Mr. Eaton, that he had, on reflection, discovered his mistake, and desired the committee to alter his deposition; but Mr. Eaton was requested to inform the Colonel that he must attend to it himself; that it could not be done in his absence, and on the suggestion of another.

It is true that Mr. Burrill did state to the officer examined, that he would write out his deposition in a fairer hand, and he would be called upon to sign it. But it is a fact equally true, and which should have been stated in Colonel Butler's last deposition, that those officers left the city before time was given for the depositions to be made out, and remained absent until near the close of the session, and after the report and documents were printed. It was not to have been expected that, after the fairness, as well as the kindness, of the committee, towards Colonel Butler, as it regarded his testimony, that he would, on his oath, afterwards have indulged himself in any reflections on that committee; more especially when it is considered (if the Strictures be true, and it is believed they were written under his eye) that he was mistaken in another fact that was stated by him—that of the Governor of Tennessee being in Nashville when General Jackson called out and organized the volunteers. There is no disposition felt to injure the feelings of Colonel Butler, but he should not have invited discussion on a subject of such delicacy to himself.

But, to silence forever all clamor on the subject of depositions, and to remove every doubt from the minds of the most suspicious, they are referred to the original depositions themselves, on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, and in the very words used by them, and written by Mr. Burrill, and examined and approved by the witnesses themselves. And, if the trouble be taken to compare the original depositions with the printed copies, it will be found that not a single alteration was made but those of a verbal nature, except in the deposition of General Gibson, in two paragraphs, which were made by himself, and at his own hand, in the presence of Mr. Burrill and the chairman, and after his deposition was in the hands of the printer.

Having already observed that General Gibson had made some alteration in his first deposition, it is necessary, for a correct knowledge and explanation of this subject, to refer to his second deposition, as it appeared in the Intelligencer of the 10th March. In this it is stated, that Mr. Burrill and the chairman had refused to let him add to his statement two letters that he considered necessary to illustrate the subject. It is true that General Gibson was told, that he might strike out what he thought proper from the deposition, but he could not add any new facts; for that could only be done by a majority of the committee when authorized to call for and examine witnesses; that the committee on the subject of the Seminole war, having made their report, was out of existence, and no power remained with those members who had composed that committee more than any others of the Senate. General Gibson then stated, that "he had given the letters in question to Mr. Eaton, of the committee, some considerable time before, and requested him to lay them before the committee and have them attached to his deposition." General Gibson was then informed that "no such letters had been put in possession of the committee by Mr. Eaton." This conversation took place in the Secretary's office, while the Senate was in session. On my return to the Senate Chamber, Mr. Eaton was asked by me, privately, whether or not such letters had been received by him from General Gibson, he said, "they had, and he had not thought proper to lay them before the committee."

All those facts relative to the letter were afterwards stated by me, in my place, when the Senate was in session; and Mr. Eaton was called upon to state whether he had not received such letters and withheld them from the committee; and he stated to the Senate that he had, and that he never had submitted them to the committee. Thus it will appear that, so far from refusing to admit the introduction of those papers into the statement of General Gibson, the committee never knew of their existence until after the report was made. It is but fair to observe that General Gibson has been long known to me, and no one is more willing to subscribe to his correctness as an officer, and private worth as a man; and it is confidently believed, that, when convinced of the fact, that he has charged the committee with an impropriety of conduct, that, if improper, can but attach to a single member, he will rejoice at having an opportunity of correcting the error.

In a postscript to the Strictures, it is stated that General Jackson told a member of the committee that he was willing to go before them and disclose all the documents in his possession.

If General Jackson did say this to a member, it must have been designed as an insult to the committee and to the Senate; he must have considered that body in the light of subalterns in the Army, and he therefore condescends to tell them that he is willing to appear before their committee.

That committee was vested by the Senate with full power to call every officer in the Government before them, and it was not necessary for the General to have given this evidence of his great condescension, to have put them in mind of the extent of their powers, or their obligations of duty to the Senate.

The reasons for not calling General Jackson before the committee were of a different character, arising from the peculiar situation in which he officially stood, and his connexion with the subject of inquiry. But, if the General was willing to disclose other documents to the committee, why were not those documents transmitted to the Executive Department of the Government and filed in the War Office, from which they might have been obtained; or, are we left to presume that General Jackson is in possession of facts of an official nature, that he will not condescend to lay before the President of the United States, to whom he should feel himself responsible for his conduct?

There is one charge in the Strictures that applies exclusively to the chairman of the committee—that of being a partner with the contractor; the fallacy of this charge, as well as its deliberate design to inflict a private injury on a man, whose only offence was an independent discharge of official duties, is fully proven by the annexed deposition of the contractor himself, Colonel Benjamin G. Orr, who is now the Mayor of the City of Washington.

I shall now close these observations, which have been extorted from me by the peculiar and violent character of the Strictures in question, and the source from whence they emanated. It is hoped, for the honor of the nation, as it is the first, that it may be the last occasion that may occur, to impose a similar duty on a member of the National Legislature: that in future no military officer of Government, either humble or exalted, will so far lose sight of the duty and respect due to the civil authorities of the nation, as to fall into similar errors; and, if reason were for a moment allowed to assume its empire in the minds of the most violent among them, it would be discovered, that inevitable disgrace to the individual concerned would be the consequence of such measures, perhaps the prostration of the army, whose very existence does and ought to depend on a conviction in the public mind, that the Military Department of the Government is subject to and subordinate to the civil powers.

While this principle is practically observed by officers of the army, that establishment will be found useful, but, once abandoned, the army becomes dangerous to public liberty, and ought and should be reduced.

These observations arise not, as is alleged, from "spleenetic hostility to the army," but from a sincere desire to preserve and make it useful; and time will discover, unless a change of conduct is observed, that the deadliest enemies of the army are to be found in some of the officers who command it. And under these impressions, and in the spirit of sincere friendship to those officers, the writer ventures to tender to them this honest advice: That they chasten and moderate their tempers, and restrain the violence of their rage against the civil officers of Government, and, instead of cutting off the ears of members of Congress, sharpen their swords to meet their country's enemies in the field, when they shall be so directed by the civil powers. Let them "cease to do evil, and learn to do well;" never forgetting that they too are subject to legal control, and but, at best, "subordinate" servants in the great political household.

If this advice be taken, their former transgressions may be forgiven and forgotten by a magnanimous people, who still remember, with gratitude and pride, their former services. But if this wholesome and friendly advice be disregarded; and if, in despite of the dictates of prudence and reason, they will persevere in this career of madness and folly, they must perish in their military sins, and will perhaps, when it is too late, be fully convinced that it would have contributed to their true interest and honor, to have listened to and followed the frank and candid admonitions of their friend, &c.

A. LACOCK.

Arrest of Captain Obed Wright.Extract from the Journal of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1819.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion:
Resolved, That a member be added to the committee already appointed on the subject of the Seminole war, in place of Mr. Forsyth, who has recently been appointed to a foreign mission.

On motion of Mr. Eaton,
 That the further consideration thereof be postponed until the 5th day of March next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 21.

On motion of Mr. Lacock,
 The yeas and nays being required by one-fifth of the members present, those who voted in the affirmative, are—

Messrs. Crittenden, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Fromentin, Johnson, King, Leake, Morrow, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

Those who voted in the negative, are—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Eppes, Gailard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Lacock, Macon, Mellen, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Vandyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

The motion having been agreed to—
Ordered, That Mr. Eppes be the member.

WASHINGTON COUNTY,

District of Columbia, to wit:

Personally appeared before the subscriber, a Justice of the Peace for the county aforesaid, Benjamin G. Orr, and made oath on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that Abner Lacock, Esq., late a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, was not directly nor indirectly concerned with him in any contract which he has had with the War Department, at any time, and particularly with that for the State of Georgia, which the author of the Strictures, on the report of the select committee, says "it has been intimated that" he "was interested" in, neither was his son at all concerned further than as an agent, at a stated salary per annum.

The deponent further says, that, a few days prior to the appearance of the "strictures," in conversation with General Jackson, on the subject of the report of the committee of the Senate, he was asked by the General, if Mr. Lacock, who had been his agent at Fort Scott, was the son of the Senator of that name, and, on being answered in the affirmative, he further asked, if he might so state it; the deponent replied, that as a fact, he might depose of it as he pleased; but that he could not perceive any connexion between it and the subject of the report of the committee; and, having been told that morning that a suspicion was entertained that General Lacock had been a partner in his Georgia contract, the deponent took that opportunity of assuring General Jackson that it was wholly without foundation, which the General admitted he had been apprized of. And further this deponent saith not.

Sworn before me, this 17th day of March, 1819.
 JOSEPH FORREST.

ARREST OF CAPTAIN OBED WRIGHT, OF THE GEORGIA MILITIA.

[Communicated to the House, December 18, 1818.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of the 10th instant, I transmit a report of the Secretary of War, with copies of the correspondence between the Governor of Georgia and Major General Jackson, on the subject of the arrest of Captain Obed Wright.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 12, 1818.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Dec. 12, 1818.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 10th instant, the Secretary of War has the honor to transmit to the President of the United States copies of the correspondence between the Governor of the State of Georgia and Major General Jackson, relative to the arrest of Captain Obed Wright, transmitted by them to this Department.

J. C. CALHOUN.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA.

Milledgeville, June 1, 1818.

SIR: You will no doubt have been informed by General Jackson, ere this reaches you, of an unfortunate attack recently made by a detachment of Georgia militia, under command of Captain Obed Wright, on a village in the Creek nation of Indians, situated on the west side of Flint river, generally known by the name of Chehaw.

In order to bring the circumstances of this transaction fully before you, I must beg leave to refer you to a copy of a letter written by myself to General Jackson, (herewith enclosed,) by which you will perceive, that soon after the army entered the nation, and passed Fort Early, the Indians in that neighborhood, especially from two towns situated on the east side of Flint river, generally denominated Hopaunees, and Philemees, from chiefs of that name, had recommenced their depredations on our frontier. After having waited a considerable time in expectation of receiving an answer from the General, but in vain; and being repeatedly and earnestly requested by the distressed inhabitants of that frontier to afford them protection against the inroads of the savages; and being fully satisfied by letters from respectable citizens from that quarter, that the murders and depredations committed were by Indians from the above-named towns, I took upon myself the responsibility of ordering a detachment into service for the special purpose of destroying them, having been convinced, by experience, that small detachments, stationed on the frontiers, were not sufficient to insure protection to the inhabitants, as the Indians, acquainted with their situation, watched favorable opportunities for coming in on some unguarded point, committing murders, and returning with impunity. On the 24th of

Arrest of Captain Obed Wright.

November last, I received a requisition from the War Department, requesting me to cause to be detailed, from Major General Floyd's division, five hundred men, for the special purpose of assisting in the reduction of Amelia Island. Orders for this purpose were immediately given to Major General Floyd, who, viewing it, as I did, a case of emergency, drew the whole of the requisition from the first brigade of his division, under the impression that their services would be required on that occasion only. Before the organization of the troops could be completed, Amelia Island fell into the hands of the regular force sent against it. General Floyd, notwithstanding, completed the organization, and, without consulting me at all, they were ordered to the frontier at different points. Some were ordered to Hartford to join the two regiments, which were then organizing to go against the Indians, agreeably to a request of General Gaines. Among these was Captain Wright's company from Savannah. At the time they marched, however, the captain, from ill-health, was unable to accompany them, but shortly after followed on to Hartford, and assumed the command of a small detachment left there, although it since appears he had never been mustered into the service of the United States. Captain Wright having tendered his services to lead the expedition, and, from circumstances above mentioned, believing I had the right to command him, they were accepted. I accordingly ordered two companies of cavalry from two adjacent counties, and two companies of infantry, which I had previously ordered to different posts on the frontier, to rendezvous at Hartford, and report themselves to Capt. Wright, and also directed Captain Wright to call on Captain Bothwell, then in the service of the United States, stationed at Fort Early, for assistance, should it be necessary. The only reason I have to offer for calling on the troops in the service of the United States is, the danger to which the frontier was exposed, and the necessity for putting a stop to the incursions of the savages, which could only be done by the destruction of their towns, in order that the inhabitants might return to their homes, and prepare their farms for cultivation, the season for doing so having then commenced. The party, on their march learning that Hopaunee had left his own village, and had taken up his residence at the Chehaw town, took on themselves the responsibility of pursuing him there; and, having reached the town, commenced an attack on it; the result of which was, that several of the friendly Indians were killed. As the detachment was ordered into service by the State's authority, and as they had violated their orders by destroying a friendly town, I had ordered an investigation of the conduct of the commanding officer before a military tribunal; but I have since determined to stay all further proceedings until the pleasure of the President of the United States should be known on the subject. Captain Wright was arrested by order of General Jackson, but was released by the civil authority. I have since had him arrested, and shall keep him confined to await the President's decision. I have the honor to transmit a copy of General Jackson's letter to me, demanding forthwith the delivery of Captain Wright to the officers sent by him to arrest and confine him. It is a production as inflammatory and indecorous, as it is unbecoming a gentleman and a soldier. Enclosed you will also receive a copy of my letter to the General in reply.

Should it meet the approbation of the President, I would prefer that the case of Captain Wright be referred to the circuit court of the United States, which will be held in Savannah, in December next.

With great respect, I am, &amp;c.

WM. RABUN.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,
 Secretary of War, Washington.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,
Milledgeville, March, 21, 1818.

SIR: Your have no doubt been apprized that, since your departure from Hartford with the Georgia militia, the Indians have been hovering on the frontier of Telfair county; that they have killed a Mr. Bush, and wounded his son, and, being pursued by the citizens of that country, have met in hostile array, when an engagement took place, which lasted near an hour, in which our little detachment, consisting of only thirty-four men, lost seven killed and a number badly wounded. This rencounter has excited considerable alarm on that frontier, and the inhabitants are, in many instances, flying from their homes, for the want of protection.

The object of this communication is to request that you will be so good as to station some troops near the Big Bend of the Ockmulgee, and at or near the most assailable points below that place. If it is not convenient for you to furnish the necessary force, you will please give directions for supplying such detachments as may, in that event, be ordered into the service, under the authority of the State, with rations, &c. I hope you will write me on this subject without delay, as great alarm has been produced by the hostile attitude which the enemy has assumed.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. RABUN.

Maj. Gen. ANDREW JACKSON,
 U. S. Army, Creek nation.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, GEORGIA,
Milledgeville, June 1, 1818.

SIR: I have lately had the honor to receive yours of the 7th ultimo, founded on a communication from General Glasscock, relative to an attack recently made on the Chehaw village. Had you, sir, or General Glasscock, been in possession of the facts which produced the affair, it is to be presumed, at least, that you would not have indulged in a strain so indecorous and unbecoming. I had, on the 21st of March last, stated the situation of our bleeding frontier to you, and requested you, in respectful terms, to detach a part of your overwhelming force for our protection, or that you would furnish supplies, and I would order out more troops; to which you have never yet deigned to reply. You state, in a very haughty tone, that "I, as Governor of a State, within your military division, have no right to give a military order whilst you are in the field." Wretched and contemptible, indeed, must be our situation, if that be the fact. When the liberties of the people of Georgia shall have been prostrated at the feet of military despotism, then, and not till then, will this imperious doctrine be tamely submitted to. You may rest assured, that, if the savages continue their depredations on our unprotected frontier, I shall think and act for myself in that respect.

You demand that Captain Wright be delivered in irons to your agent, Major Davis. If you, sir, are unacquainted with the fact, I beg leave to inform you, that Captain Wright was not under your command, for he had been appointed an officer in the Chatham county militia, which had been draughted for the special purpose of assisting General Gaines in reducing Amelia Island. That object having been accomplished before our militia had taken the field, General Gaines, as soon as their organization was completed, assumed the right to order them to the frontier, without ever consulting the State authority on the subject. Captain Wright, at that time being in a state of debility, failed to march, and of course was not mustered into the service of the United States. He, however, followed on to Hartford, where, finding himself not likely to be received into the service of the United States, tendered his services to command the contemplated expedition, which were accordingly accepted. Having violated his orders by destroying the Chehaw village, instead of Hopaunees and Philemmee towns, against which the expedition was directed, I had, previous to receiving your demand, ordered him to be arrested; but before he was apprehended agreeably to my orders, he was taken by your agent, and afterwards liberated by the civil authority. I have since had him arrested and confined, and shall communicate the whole transaction to the President of the United States, together with a copy of your letters.

I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. RABUN.

Maj. Gen. ANDREW JACKSON.

FORT HAWKINS, GEORGIA,
May 17, 1818.

Sir: I was ordered on the 6th instant from Fort Gadsden to Georgia; on the 8th instant, I was overtaken by an express from Major General A. Jackson, with the enclosed communications; I proceeded without delay to Hartford; Captain Wright was gone before I arrived. I now hasten to Milledgeville to deliver General Jackson's letter to the Governor of Georgia.

Captain Wright, I understand, has gone to Savannah, where I intend to pursue him; if he is taken, I will notify you immediately.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN M. DAVIS,
Assistant Inspector General.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
May 7, 1818.

Sir: You will send, or deliver personally, as you may deem most advisable, the enclosed talk to Kanard, with instructions to explain the substance to the Chehaw warriors.

You will proceed thence to Hartford, in Georgia, and use your endeavors to arrest, and deliver over in irons to the military authority at Fort Hawkins, Captain Wright, of the Georgia militia, who has been guilty of the outrage against the women and superannuated men of the Chehaw village. Should Wright have left Hartford, you will call upon the Governor of Georgia to aid you in his arrest.

To enable you to execute the above, you are authorized to take in company with you the Tennesseans that went from hence lately for Fort Scott, and await, if you think it necessary, the arrival of the Georgians, now on march under Major Porter.

You will direct the officer commanding at Fort Hawkins to keep Captain Wright in close confinement until the will of the President be known. The accompanying letters of the Secretary of War and the Governor of Georgia you will take charge of until you reach a post office.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

Major DAVIS.

Sir: Send, with the accompanying letter, to the Secretary of War, a copy of the talk to the Chehaw nation, the order to you, and the letter to the Governor of Georgia: they are left open for this purpose.

The copies of Glasscock's letters will accompany that to the Secretary of War and the letter to the Governor of Georgia. Yours, &c.,

J. GADSDEN, Aid-de-camp.

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
May 7, 1818.

[7 miles from Fort Gadsden, 12 o'clock.]

Sir: I halt my army to enclose you a communication which has this moment been received by express from General Glasscock. The outrage which has been committed upon the superannuated warriors, women, and children, whose sons were then in the field in the service of the United States, merits the severest chastisement. The interference, too, of the Governor of Georgia with the duties imposed on me, claims the earliest attention of the President.

All the effects of my campaign may, by this one act, be destroyed, and the same scenes of massacre and murder, with which our frontier settlers have been visited, again repeated.

On my march from Hartford to Fort Scott, the necessities of my army were first relieved at the Chehaw village, and every act of friendship characterized the conduct of their old chiefs. The young warriors immediately entered, and were mustered into the service of the United States; and, under the command of Colonel Kanard, were esteemed one of the most efficient corps of friendly Indians. What must be their feelings, on returning to the vicinity of their homes, after the privations, fatigues, and dangers of a long march, in the service of the United States, to find their houses consumed, their families dispersed, and their old warriors and chiefs butcherously and inhumanly murdered, you must well know how to estimate.

I have written to Hartford to have Captain Wright arrested and ironed, until the will of the President of the United States is known; and I have requested of the Governor of Georgia to aid in the execution of this order, should Wright have left that place.

I shall send a talk to the Chehaws, explaining, as satisfactorily as possible, this most iniquitous proceeding.

Copies of the above are enclosed.

Yours, respectfully,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,
Secretary of War.

FORT EARLY, April 30, 1818.

Sir: I have the pleasure to inform you that my command has safely reached this place, having suffered some little for the want of meat. The gods have proved equally propitious to us, on our return as on our advance at Mickasuky. Some of my men were nearly out of corn, and, searching about some old houses that had not been consumed, to see if they could make any discovery, in entering one of them, to their great astonishment and surprise, they came across the man who was lost from Captain Watkin's company, on the 2d of April. It appears, from his statement, that he was taken with a kind of cramp, and was unable to move and became senseless. When he recovered, he became completely bewildered, and never could reach the camp; he therefore concluded it was prudent to secrete himself in some swamp, and, after wandering about some time, came across a parcel of corn, on which he subsisted until we found him; he was very much reduced, and apparently perfectly wild. On that night Gray struck a trail, pursued it about a mile and a half, came to a small hut, which fortunately contained fifty or sixty bushels of corn, some potatoes and peas, which enabled us to reach the Flint, opposite Chehaw village; when, arriving within thirty miles of the place, I sent on Major Robinson, with a detachment of twenty men, to procure beef. On his arriving there, the Indians had fled in every direction;

the Chehaw town having been consumed about four days before, by a party of men consisting of two hundred and thirty, under a Captain Wright, now in command of Hartford.

It appears that, after he assumed the command of that place, he obtained the certificates of several men on the frontier, that the Chehaw Indians were engaged in a skirmish on the Big Bend. He immediately sent or went to the Governor, and received orders to destroy the towns of Philemmee and Opaunee. Two companies of cavalry were immediately ordered out and placed under his command, and on the 22d he reached this place. He ordered Captain Bothwell to furnish him with twenty-five or thirty men to accompany him, having been authorized to do so by the Governor. The order was complied with. Captain Bothwell told him that he could not accompany him, disapproved the plan, and informed Captain Wright that there could be no doubt of the friendship of the Indians in that quarter; and stated that Opaunee had brought in a public horse that had been lost that day. This availed nothing; mock patriotism burned in their breasts; they crossed the river that night, and pushed for the town. When arrived there, an Indian was discovered grazing some cattle; he was made a prisoner. I am informed by Sergeant Jones, that the Indian immediately proposed to go with the interpreter, and bring any of the chiefs for the captain to talk with. It was not attended to. An advance was ordered, the cavalry rushed forward and commenced the massacre. Even after the firing and murder commenced, Major Howard, an old chief, who furnished you with corn, came out of his house with a white flag in front of the line. It was not respected. An order was given for a general fire, and nearly four hundred guns were discharged at him before one took effect. He fell, and was bayoneted; his son was also killed. These are the circumstances relative to the transaction. Seven men were killed, one woman, and two children. Since then three of my command, who were left at Fort Scott, obtained a furlough, and on their way one of them was shot, in endeavoring to obtain a canoe to cross the Flint. I have sent on an express to the officer commanding Fort Scott, apprizing him of the affair, and one to Adjutant Porter, to put him on his guard. On arriving opposite Chehaw, I sent a runner to get some of them in, and succeeded in doing so. They are at a loss to know the cause of the displeasure of the white people. Wolf has gone to the agent to have it inquired into. We obtained from them a sufficient quantity of beef to last us to Hartford, at which place I am informed there is a plentiful supply of provisions.

I have the honor to be, &c.

Major General ANDREW JACKSON.

ON MY MARCH WEST OF APPALACHICOLA,

May 7, 1818.

FRIENDS AND BROTHERS: I have this moment received, by express, the intelligence of the un-

Arrest of Captain Obed Wright.

warantable attack of a party of Georgians on the Chehaw village, burning it, and killing six men and one woman.

Friends and Brothers: The above news fills my heart with regret, and my eyes with tears: when I passed through your village, you treated me with friendship, and furnished my army with all the supplies you could spare; and your old chiefs sent their young warriors with me to fight, and put down our common enemy. I promised you protection; I promised you the protection and fostering friendship of the United States, so long as you continued to hold your father, the President of the United States, by the hand of friendship.

Friends and Brothers: I did not suppose there was any American so base as not to respect a flag, but I find I am mistaken. I find that Captain Wright of Georgia has not done it. I cannot bring your old men and women to life, but I have written to your father, the President of the United States, the whole circumstance of your case, and I have ordered Captain Wright to be arrested and put in irons, until your father, the President of the United States, makes known his will on this distressing subject.

Friends and Brothers: Return to your village; there you shall be protected, and Capt. Wright will be tried and punished for this daring outrage of the treaty and murder of your people; and you shall also be paid for your houses and other property that have been destroyed; but you must not attempt to take satisfaction yourselves; this is contrary to the treaty, and you may rely on my friendship, and that of your father, the President of the United States.

I send you my friend, Major Davis, who is accompanied by a few of my people, and who is charged with the arrest and confinement of Captain Wright: treat them friendly; they are your friends; you must not permit your people to kill any of the whites; they will bring down on you destruction. Justice shall be done you; you must remain in peace and friendship with the United States. The excuse that Captain Wright has made for this attack on your village is, that some of your people were concerned in some murders on the frontiers of Georgia; this will not excuse him. I have ordered Captain Wright, and all the officers concerned in this transaction, in confinement, if found at Hartford. If you send some of your people with Major Davis, you will see them put in irons. Let me hear from you at Fort Montgomery. I am your friend and brother.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major Gen. commanding.

ON MARCH TOWARDS PENSACOLA,
7 miles advanced of Fort Gadsden,
May 7, 1818.

SIR: I have this moment received, by express, the letter of General Glasscock, a copy of which is enclosed, detailing the base, cowardly, and inhuman attack on the old women and men of the Chehaw village, whilst the warriors of that village were with me fighting the battles of our country against the common enemy, and at a time, too, when undoubted testimony had been obtained, and was in my possession, and also in possession of General Glasscock, of their innocence of the charge of killing Leigh and the other Georgian at Cedar creek.

That a Governor of a State should assume the right to make war against an Indian tribe, in perfect peace with, and under the protection of, the United States, is assuming a responsibility that I trust you will be able to excuse to the Government of the United States, to which you will have to answer; and through which I had so recently passed, promising the aged that remained at home my protection, and taking the warriors with me on the campaign, is as unwarrantable as strange. But it is still more strange that there could exist within the United States a cowardly monster, in human shape, that could violate the sanctity of a flag when borne by any person, but more particularly when in the hands of a superannuated Indian chief, worn down with age. Such base cowardice and murderous conduct as this transaction affords, has not its parallel in history, and should meet with its merited punishment.

You, sir, as Governor of a State within my military division, have no right to give a military order whilst I am in the field; and this being an open and violent infringement of the treaty with the Creek Indians, Captain Wright must be prosecuted and punished for this outrageous murder; and I have ordered him to be arrested and confined in irons until the pleasure of the President is known upon the subject. If he has left Hartford before my order reaches, I call upon you, as Governor of Georgia, to aid in carrying into effect my order for his arrest and confinement, which I trust will be afforded, and Captain Wright brought to condign punishment for this unprecedented murder. It is strange that this hero had not followed the trail of the murderers of your citizens; it would have led him to the Mickasuky, where we found the bleeding scalps of your citizens; but there might have been more danger in this than attacking a village containing a few superannuated women and men, and a few young women without arms or protectors.

This act will, to the last ages, fix a stain upon the character of Georgia. I have the honor, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,
Major General commanding.

His Ex<sup>y</sup> Wm. Rabun,
Governor of Georgia.

FORT HAWKINS, May 30, 1818.

SIR: In pursuance of my order from General Jackson, dated May 7, 1818, (which has heretofore been enclosed to you,) I came up with Captain Obed Wright, of the Georgia militia, in Dublin, on the 24th instant. I arrested him, and brought him on as far towards Fort Hawkins as Milledgeville, where the civil authority interfered and discharged him.

Arrest of Captain Obed Wright.

A copy of the proceedings is herewith enclosed, together with a copy of my letter to the Governor of Georgia, and Wright's arrest.

I have notified Major General Jackson of the circumstances. I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN M. DAVIS,
Assistant Inspector General.
Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

CHAMBERS, May 28, 1818.

Present: Their honors Robert Wynn, William Bevin, and James Fleming, Justices.

The court met for the purpose of hearing Obed Wright, who was brought up before them upon a writ of habeas corpus, which is as follows:

GEORGIA, Baldwin county.

To any Justice of the Inferior Court.

The petition of Obed Wright sheweth: That he is detained in confinement by Major Davis, an officer in the United States service, and he therefore prays the benefit of a habeas corpus, to inquire into the cause of his confinement and detention.

SEABORN JONES,
Attorney for petitioner.

GEORGIA, Baldwin county:

It appears, from the petition of Obed Wright, that he is now kept in custody by you, and he having prayed a writ of habeas corpus, you are, therefore hereby commanded, that you bring before me, at the court-house of the county, by the hour of 11 o'clock of the forenoon of the day, the body of the said Obed Wright, by whatever title he may be known to you, together with the cause of his commitment and detention, that he may be dealt with according to law. Fail not, and have you then and there this writ.

Given under my hand and seal, the 28th of May, 1818.

WILLIAM BEVIN, J. J. C.

Habeas corpus, by the Constitution of the United States, and of the State of Georgia.

To Major DAVIS,
an officer in the United States service.

MILLEDGEVILLE, May 28, 1818.

I have the said Obed Wright in court, together with the cause of his commitment and detention.

JOHN M. DAVIS,
Ass't Inspector General U. S. A.

Major John M. Davis, assistant inspector general of the United States' Army, in obedience to a writ of habeas corpus, this day served on him, having produced the body of said Obed Wright, mentioned in the habeas corpus, before the court, together with the cause of his commitment and detention:

And the court, on consideration, deeming that no sufficient cause is shown for his detention: on motion, ordered, that he be discharged forthwith.

ROBERT WYNN.
WILLIAM BEVIN.
JAMES FLEMING.

GEORGIA, Baldwin county:

I, Thomas H. Kenan, clerk of the Inferior Court for said county, do hereby certify, the preceding pages contain a true copy of the proceedings of the trial of Obed Wright, in consequence of his confinement and detention.

Given under my hand and seal, this 28th day of May, 1818. THOMAS H. KENAN, Clerk Inferior Court.

MILLEDGEVILLE, May 29, 1818.

SIR: In pursuance of Major General Jackson's order to me of the 7th instant, a copy of which is herewith enclosed, I arrested Captain Obed Wright, of the Georgia militia, in Dublin, on the 24th instant, and brought him thus far, on my way to Fort Hawkins, when a writ of habeas corpus was served on me, by which Captain Wright has been released from confinement.

I do now hereby call on you to have Captain Wright delivered to me, that I may be able to keep him in confinement until the will of the President of the United States be known.

I have the honor to be, &c.

JOHN M. DAVIS,
Ass't Inspector General U. S. A.

His Excellency Wm. Rabun,
Governor of Georgia.

DUBLIN, GEORGIA, May 24, 1818.

SIR: I am directed by Major General Jackson, commanding the division of the South, to arrest you and conduct you to Fort Hawkins, where you are to remain until the pleasure of the President of the United States be known on your case.

You will, therefore, consider yourself in arrest, and proceed accordingly. I am, &c.

JOHN M. DAVIS,
Ass't Inspector General U. S. A.
Capt. Obed Wright, Georgia Militia.

[The following Message was sent to the House of Representatives, January 4, 1819.]

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 24th instant, requesting me to lay before it "copies of the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and the Governor of Georgia, in answer to the letter of the latter to the former, dated on the 1st of June of the present year, communicated to the House on the 12th instant; and also the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and General Andrew Jackson, in answer to the letter of the latter, of the date of 7th May, 1818; also communicated to the House on the 12th instant," I transmit a report from the Secretary of War, with a copy of an extract of a letter from Major Vandeventer, chief clerk in the Department of War, in reply to General Jackson's letter of the 7th of May, 1818.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 31, 1818.

Report of the Surgeon General.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Dec. 30, 1818.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 24th instant, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House (if, in his opinion, the same should not be inconsistent with the public interest) copies of the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and the Governor of Georgia, in answer to the letter of the latter to the former dated on the first of June of the present year, communicated to this House on the 12th instant; and also the correspondence, if any, between the Department of War and General Andrew Jackson, in answer to the letter of the latter, of the date of the 7th of May, 1818; also communicated to this House on the 12th instant," has the honor to transmit an extract of a letter written by Major Vandevanter, chief clerk in the Department of War, in reply to General Jackson's letter of the 7th of May, 1818, and to state that no letter was addressed by this Department to the Governor of Georgia, in answer to his letter of the 1st of June, 1818.

J. C. CALHOUN.

The President of the United States.

Extract of a letter from Major C. Vandevanter, chief clerk, to Major General Andrew Jackson, dated

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, June 2, 1818.

Your letters of the 7th of April, (one without date,) from Fort Gadsden, and of the 26th of April, are received.

The President of the United States and the Secretary of War are out of town. The former will return about the 15th instant; the latter not before the middle of next month. So soon as the President returns, your despatches, together with your order to Major Davis, commanding the arrest of Captain Wright, and a copy of your letter to the Governor of Georgia, in relation to the horrid and atrocious destruction of the Chehaw village, will be laid before him. In the meantime, I am advised to communicate the "opinion" that the trial of Captain Wright by court-martial is decidedly preferable to a civil prosecution in the Federal court.

REPORT OF THE SURGEON GENERAL ON THE ARMY RATIONS.

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,
November 16, 1818.

To the Secretary of War:

Sir: In compliance with your instructions, I have the honor to submit the following report:

In deciding upon the component parts of the ration to be furnished the army, it must be obvious that, so far as the health of the troops is concerned, those will of course be the best which afford the greatest quantity of good nutritious matter from a given quantity of food; but, as the soldier is in general his own cook, it is also necessary that they be of such a nature as to enable him effectually to extract this nutriment in the easiest and most simple manner. The first will depend upon the habits of the soldier previous to enlistment, and the last upon the mode of cooking which the experience of the army has found most convenient and advantageous.

It is a well known fact that every animal, in order to enjoy health, strength, and vigor, must be supplied with food adapted to its habits, whether natural or acquired. The former cannot in most cases be essentially changed without serious consequences; the lion, for example, cannot subsist on hay, or the ox on game: while in others the digestive organs may, by degrees, become so accustomed to unnatural food, as to render it not only consistent with but necessary to health: thus the horse may be taught to live on meat. Hence it follows that a ration perfectly adapted to the wants of a Cossack, might be totally useless, and perhaps injurious, to an American; for man may in this respect be considered a genus, the several species of which are determined by the age, country, or tribe, to which he belongs: the Greenlander and the Hindoo, the ancient Spartan and the modern epicure, would find nearly as much difficulty in subsisting upon the same food as the wolf and the sheep.

Such being the effect of custom, it must be evident that whenever a man has confirmed his natural propensities by long habit, any change, especially a sudden one, will be attended with most injurious, if not fatal effects; and this is precisely the condition of the American soldier; for, if the natural diet of man is altogether vegetable, and if the people of the country differ but little in their mode of living from that pointed out by nature, and are also accustomed to a great variety, and consequently too frequent changes in the several articles of their diet, it must be obvious that a ration, composed of bread and meat only, and chiefly of the latter, cannot be consistent either with "comfort, convenience, or health."

That man was not originally carnivorous, is proved by history, both sacred and profane; and this is confirmed by the fact that nearly all those animals whose usefulness depends upon their health, strength, and vigor, or upon the nutritious quality of their solids, such as the horse, elephant, camel, mule, sheep, and most of those used for food, subsist upon vegetables; while the carnivorous species, as the tiger, wolf, dog, and even the lion, though they possess a greater degree of agility, from their natural conformation, have nothing of that real strength and vigor which renders the former animals important assistants to us during life, nor of that healthy embonpoint which makes some of them equally useful after death.

The same is true with respect to man in his present unnatural state. The natives of this country, who subsist principally on game; those tribes of Bedouins, whose deserts scarcely afford food for their cattle; and the Greenlander, whom necessity has taught to live upon dried fish and blubber, are all, from their general habits, hardy; but they are, ceteris paribus, inferior to the Hindoos, whose fear of feeding upon his grandsire confines him to pulse and light vegetables; much less have they the stamina of those whom our second nature, habit, has accustomed to a judicious mixture of both these kinds of food.

Custom, it is true, renders a certain portion of animal food necessary to produce the highest state of health and vigor; but it is believed the quantity required for this purpose has been exceedingly overrated. This has arisen from observing that certain classes of men, noted for their health and strength, indulge largely in such kind of diet. But the conclusion by no means follows from the premises; for these same men will also indulge in large potations of ardent spirits, and various other excesses, without apparent injury; this therefore only proves what they can bear, and not what is best for them.

The correctness of the position will further appear from the diet found necessary for the delicate and the valetudinarian. There the great difficulty is to procure food sufficiently light, that is, of sufficient bulk to satisfy hunger, without too much nutriment to suppress digestion; for physiologists, when discoursing upon the digestive organs, and the quality of food best suited to them, have shown that the former requires from the latter what they have termed the stimulus of distension, as well as a due degree of excitement from nutritious matter, to excite healthy action. That a certain bulk is as necessary as a certain quantity of nutriment; and that so far as one of these is increased at the expense of the other, so far the diet varies from the healthy standard. Thus, it not only appears that a vegetable diet is natural to man, but we are taught its modus operandi; and that, although it actually contains much less nourishment than animal matter, yet, from its being in a state of subdivision, it is so diluted, as it were, as to be fully acted upon by the stomach; whereas, in a more concentrated form, it becomes an unnatural stimulus, and destroys the powers of the digestive organs.

Now we may conclude, a priori, that the diet of the people of this country will be that which is best suited to them; for such is the facility of obtaining the means of subsistence, that even the laborers in our cities, probably the poorest class of men among us, are enabled to procure most of the articles supplied in the markets; and such is the profusion with which we are blessed, that these consist of almost everything the palate can desire or the stomach digest. Being, therefore, under no restraint from poverty or scarcity, it is to be presumed they would follow, in a great measure, the indications of nature; and that this is a fact will appear from a cursory reflection upon the modes of living in the different parts of the country; for when we take into account the quantity of farinacea employed in bread, pudding, &c., the great variety and abundance of fruits, and of the lighter vegetables, in addition to the more nutritious ones, as peas, beans, rice, potatoes, and many roots, it is probable four-fifths of our diet is vegetable, and perhaps two-thirds in every case. Even at dinner, when meat is most used, it is generally in this proportion, and it constitutes but a small part of our morning and evening meals. There are no doubt exceptions, but these proportions will be found in general correct.

The cheapness of living, however, not only enables the mass of our population to procure food of the best kind, but also to obtain a great variety of the essential articles, and many even of the luxuries of life; there are few who, to fish and poultry, and almost all the vegetables in use, do not add tea, coffee, sugar, spices, and other condiments; and with this variety of food they are accustomed to no small variety in the mode of preparing it. The very general use of tea, or some other warm infusion, at the morning and evening meals, is a point of no small importance, and nothing but experience can fully convince one how severely the want of it is felt, and of course how necessary that, or a substitute, is for the health of the soldier.

But, secondly, the experience of the army proves, that not only the habits of the soldier previous to enlistment, but also the mode of cooking found most effectual and convenient, requires a material change in the component parts of the ration; for, since the business of cooking belongs, in civil life, almost entirely to females, when a man is confined to bread and meat, he is not only suddenly deprived of his accustomed means, but is entirely ignorant of the best mode of employing those afforded him; and one of the last things a young officer or soldier learns, is how to manage his domestic concerns, though he soon becomes acquainted with the necessity of this knowledge, both for his health and his comfort.

When a recruit receives his ration, if the meat be fresh, he broils it to a cinder on the coals, on the end of his ramrod; if salt pork, he eats it raw; and if salt beef, he boils it, and, with his bread, will make a pretty good meal for some time; but in the morning and evening he feels the want of his usual infusion of tea, and at noon of his customary supply of vegetables. As a substitute for the former, he warms the stomach with a gill of undiluted, corroding whiskey; and, after living a few weeks in this way, is sent to the surgeon, worn down with dysentery, diarrhoea, and other complaints of the stomach and bowels. If the surgeon be sufficiently acquainted with his duty to give him a light diet of soup, fresh vegetables, and hospital stores, instead of loading him with medicine, he is shortly restored to health; and, from the same causes as before, is shortly returned to the hospital, and, after being for some months a burden to himself and the community, he is either buried or discharged service, and perhaps pensioned. This is a process which every one on duty, during the late war, has repeatedly witnessed; which occurred with the majority of those enlisted, and which rendered the muster rolls of the Army a mere list of invalids.

Whenever the mortality was great, during the late war, it was attributed to the quality of the ration; but the fact is, it was, on an average, as good at these places as usual; and, that this was the case, is proved from the circumstance that the regiments at these stations, commanded by experienced officers, as well as those in the vicinity, were often, in a great measure, exempted from disease.

There were two corps, one noted for their good police, and the other for their depredations on the fields and gardens of the citizens, who were a continual proof of the true cause of this difference in the health of the men; for experience soon taught both officers and men the importance of preparing their food in the form of soupe; and whenever this was done, either in consequence of police regulations, or from the soldiers obtaining a supply of the necessary ingredients, the good effects were constantly observed; and from what has been adverted to, relative to the diet natural to man, and the rationale of its operation, the reasons must be obvious.

It is true, the same judicious arrangements which not only obliged the men to cook their provisions in the best manner, but also provided them with the necessary ingredients, would conduce to their health in various ways; but when, as was the case in the corps above alluded to, change of position or circumstances produced the same result upon those who had no police at all, and the only apparent difference in their situation arose from their being able to obtain a variety of articles, in addition to their ration, and to prepare them in a suitable manner, there can be no doubt that the nature, and not the quality, of the ration, was the true cause of its effects. This is also confirmed by the practice found most beneficial in the hospitals, as most patients required only a proper diet to restore them to health, while animal food, in a solid form, was generally nauseated.

One of the divisions of the French Army, in 1810, was so far reduced by diarrhoea and dysentery, as to produce a full and satisfactory investigation of its causes; and it was clearly shown, in a memoir of the Surgeon General of the division, to arise entirely from the ration to which they had for some time been confined. Being unable to obtain the usual supply of vegetables, they were furnished, like our Army, with bread and meat only, and principally the latter, which was in general salted pork; so that the effects of such a diet are not peculiar to our own country.

In fact, if we compare our ration with that of the French and English, (the two nations probably best instructed in most military matters,) the defects of the former will be apparent.

They are as follows:

French.—Bread 24 1-10 oz., or biscuit 17½ oz.; fresh meat or salt beef 8 oz., or salt pork 6½ oz.; rice 1 oz.; dried pulse 2 oz.; wine 2 gills, (nearly); brandy ½ gill, (nearly.)

English.—Flour or bread 24 oz.; beef 16 oz., or pork 8 oz.; peas 1 gill; butter or cheese 1 oz.; rice 1 oz.

American.—Flour 18 oz.; beef 20 oz.; pork 12 oz.; whiskey 1 gill.

From this it appears the American has more than twice as much meat as the French, and more even than the British soldier, while our ration of bread is about two-thirds of theirs, although we have no other vegetable. It should also be observed that the British issue no ardent spirits, and the French but a small portion, though their habits, in this respect, render such an allowance at least harmless.

Since then, the health, and of course the efficiency of an army depends so much upon the ration, this subject becomes one of no small political importance; and an "old soldier" of our country, in his "advice to young generals," has very pertinently commenced with "the belly;" as he considers a man's stomach, to have an essential effect both upon his ability and his inclination to fight, and, among other causes, of the almost universal success of the armies of barbarians, and especially of semi-civilized nations, their being subject to little or no change in their mode of living when in actual service, is a very prominent one; for they are not only less liable to be diminished by disease, but they add to the full enjoyment of all their physical powers, the no less important moral effect of high health and consequent good spirits; and the want of which, generally completes the destruction of a beaten and retreating army.

Among the ancients, the ration of a soldier was principally, if not entirely, vegetable; and it is well known what immense burdens they carried, what fatigues they underwent, and what surprising marches they often performed. This, however, probably depended, in a great measure, like the success of the armies above alluded to, upon the little change required in their mode of living when called from their homes to the field.

Whenever, therefore, the progress of civilization, or the natural fertility of a country, enables the mass of the population to habituate themselves to a degree of luxury in living, it becomes necessary in time of war to put in requisition the wealth and means these very circumstances produce in time of peace, to counteract the evil. If an army of barbarians required less in the field, they had also fewer resources; and since experience has shown the impossibility of accommodating our habits to our supplies, it becomes necessary to adapt our supplies to our habits. The truth of these remarks will appear from considering that, in the progress of almost every nation from barbarism to civilization, the point at which their armies have been most formidable and efficient, is that where they unite the hardihood of the former to the resources of the latter; where they have the use of wealth and science, without having learned to abuse them. This may be exemplified in the history of the Russian empire, since the time of Peter the Great.

Although not immediately connected with this subject, it may be well to observe, that what has been advanced in relation to the ration, is applicable, in the fullest extent, to the medical attendance and supplies of our Army. The soldier who, previous to enlistment, had no physician but nature, no nurse, but what chance or charity furnished, and who never knew what comfort and convenience were, will easily struggle through a disease that would be inevitably fatal to one who had been from his infancy accustomed to every assistance that professional skill and the solicitude of friends, aided by a competency at least, can afford.

But, from the multiplicity of charitable institutions among us, even our paupers are better attended and furnished when sick, than the soldier can possibly be, without liberal supplies from the public, assisted by an effectual organization of the medical staff, a rigid observance of regulations, and a strict attention to duty. Policy and economy, therefore, no less than humanity, require attention to this subject, since, in addition to the loss of much time, it costs the public several hundred dollars to supply the place of a good soldier, who might often have been saved for the twentieth part of the sum.

Sutling, also, is a subject that deserves to be particularly noticed, since it is of nearly as much importance to the health, comfort, and convenience of the Army, as the nature of the component parts of the ration; to the officers it is more so; for both in time of peace and in active service they are generally stationed so far from cities and villages as to render them altogether dependent upon the occasional supplies of the irregular followers of a camp; and too often money cannot procure a decent meal. From the experience of the late war, there can be no doubt but this circumstance alone rendered the service on the frontier more unpleasant and unpopular, and caused more desertion, if it may be so termed, than all others together. In fact, it often amounted to absolute want, for, after living a few weeks upon a soldier's ration, diarrhoea and dysentery would render bread and meat as useless as stocks and stones. And even when the camp was surrounded with hucksters, they extorted, in a short time, all the money an officer possessed for supplying him with a bare subsistence, so that it too often happened that those, particularly in the subordinate grades, were, from absolute poverty, obliged to descend to habits and practices totally inconsistent with the character of officers or gentlemen. It would frequently require nearly all the pay and emoluments of a captain to discharge his mess bill; the situation of subalterns, therefore, may well be imagined, since the scarcity of supplies rendered it impossible to adapt one's living to his means.

Feeling the importance of this subject, commanding officers repeatedly attempted to obtain and secure regular sutlers, who, from having the exclusive right to sell to their corps, might be able and willing to furnish them regularly at a low rate. But this was found impracticable; in the first place, from the irregularity with which the Army was paid; and secondly from the small security the sutler had for his money. The former was, of course, the chief cause of the latter.

I have known an honest and faithful man lose from eight hundred to one thousand dollars, by the death, desertion, and discharge of soldiers, who had not been paid for many months, and some of them for two years. The consequence was obvious; the sutler was soon obliged to quit his business, and, in the mean time, to charge an enormous profit, to make up for these losses, in addition to those arising from the necessity of borrowing money or purchasing at a long credit, and of course at a great advance.

In actual service, perhaps, the troops cannot always be regularly paid: some mode should therefore be adopted to secure the sutler his just and authorized demands, in all cases, which I apprehend might be easily effected. If this were done, he could furnish a mess of ten men with all the groceries, &c., they require for ten dollars per month; whereas they now spend one-half their pay for occasional supplies of the worst kind; and, at the same time, a mess of officers might live better for three dollars per week than they often do for four or five times that sum.

In the British army this subject has received the attention it deserves; so that one of their regiments is generally better supplied, and at a cheaper rate than any of the neighboring citizens, and it surely is of equal importance to us, if without costing the public a cent, we can, by suitable laws and regulations, enable both officers and men to purchase health and comfort for half the money they now pay for imposition and disease. Before quitting this point, it should be observed, that no important arrangement for the Army can be considered in the abstract, there is such a mutual dependence of all military regulations that it is often impossible to foresee the consequences of bad ones.

From the want of proper and regular supplies, for example, the important subject of messing has been almost entirely neglected. An officer, instead of finding his regimental mess a comfortable home, in which he feels an interest, and to which he is pleased to return, submits with reluctance to a few months of privation and hardship, and then commences his operations to effect a retreat to the interior, and leaves his place to be temporarily supplied by another equally discontented sojourner; and it is a fact, no less important than true, that those commanding officers who have made the greatest progress in regimental police have the least trouble in calling home their wandering officers, and keeping them there. It is in vain to say, as is often the case, that a soldier must expect these things, for, like all others, he will, to a certain extent, consult his own convenience. The camp at French Mills, in the Fall of 1813, was sufficient proof that the comforts of officers are of no small importance to the public; for, as soon as they found themselves in the wilderness, without food or houses, they not only quitted their posts upon the most trifling pretences; but many who would have faced the enemy with pleasure fled from privation in a manner that came little short of desertion. After what has been observed upon the nature of the ration, the necessity for a regimental grocery, for the health as well as comfort both of officers and men, will not probably require further proof.

With regard to the articles best suited to compose the ration, it is necessary that they be not only adapted to the habits of the soldier, but also of such a nature as to be easily procured, of a good quality, and capable of being preserved from injury in the several parts of the country where they are to be used. Wheat flour is easily damaged in all places, and in that state is extremely prejudicial to health. Most of the diseases of the troops during the late war were, by general consent, attributed to the ration; but, though by no means true to the extent believed, it was too often so, and, nine times in ten, damaged flour was the noxious article. At French Mills particularly, where the mortality was almost incredible, the flour was unfit for any human stomach. Where it can be obtained, therefore, kiln-dried corn-meal is far preferable to flour in every respect; but where it cannot, the evil may in a great measure be remedied by causing the latter to be baked in the form of hard biscuits, which can not only be preserved a much longer time, but are more palatable and less injurious when damaged, and far more nutritious when good than the soft bread furnished to or made by the soldiers.

This, it is believed, is a matter of no small importance, not only on account of the bad effects of damaged flour, but from the fact, well known to many valetudinarians and most physicians, that hard bread or soft bread toasted is much more easily digested, and affords more nutriment than in any other form, however good the quality may be; and, since a pound of this bread will be equal to a pound of flour, the baking will be but little, if any, additional expense.

For the same reason that kiln-dried corn-meal should, in many cases, be substituted for flour, bacon ought to be furnished instead of salt beef and pork; at the South, particularly, this change appears absolutely necessary for the health of the troops. With this alteration, and a proper reduction of the quantity of the meat, this part of the ration, provided a due proportion of it be fresh, would be as good as can possibly be required.

As to the additional vegetables that may be substituted for part of the meat, the kinds best adapted to this purpose, on every account, are those used by the British and French, viz: peas, beans, and rice; they may be obtained in abundance, and generally at a low rate; and, if issued either regularly or occasionally, would not only promote the health and comfort of the soldier, by approaching near to his accustomed food, but by enabling him to introduce frequent changes in his mode of preparing it.

The deleterious effects of ardent spirits, particularly in the army, are well known; for, in the reports of sick, "sudden death from intoxication," is no small item. It is suggested, therefore, whether this troublesome poison should not be altogether excluded, and the healthy drinks of molasses and water, or beer, substituted for it; if I am rightly informed, by supplying molasses and the essence of spruce, one quart of beer may be furnished for about the same sum as one gill of whiskey. The necessity of this will be more evident when it is remembered, that in fact the soldier has, at present, only water with his meals, for, notwithstanding all regulations, he will make a morning dram of his whiskey, which is one chief cause of its injurious effects.

At the request of a surgeon attending a post, where the men were severely attacked with dysentery this last Summer, the commanding officer stopped the whiskey altogether, and an immediate check was given to the disease. This, however, is but one of many instances of the good consequences resulting from such orders, and particularly at the South, during the Summer months.

Almost all classes of men among us are accustomed to the free use of spices and other condiments, particularly of pickles; which, on account of the vegetable acid they contain, are both a pleasant and healthy stimulus to the stomach. Indeed, vinegar is of great use on many accounts; it is one of the best correctors of the superabundance of bile, induced by an unnatural or long continued stimulus; whether it be the excessive heat of a warm climate, an abundance of animal food, or that of a crude consistence, or a too free use of ardent spirits; in the latter case, as well as where laudanum, or other narcotics, have been taken, it seems to act as a specific. Whenever, therefore, the soldiers are supplied with the lighter vegetables, as cabbages, beets, cucumbers, &c., which may, by suitable arrangements, easily be done, especially on the peace establishment, there can be no doubt of the benefit of allowing a sufficient quantity of vinegar, to furnish them with a regular supply of pickles; and even without these it might be used with great advantage, and would generally be very acceptable in its simple form.

If, from these considerations, it should appear that the health of the army requires alterations in the ration, they will be of still greater weight when we remember that, from the nature of our public institutions, the greater part of our force in actual service does, and will for many years, consist of militia—of men who must, necessarily, in all cases, be suddenly taken from their customary habits and comforts, and exposed to all the hardships and privations of the soldier, without any of his advantages. The effects of this have been too lately and too severely felt, to be soon forgotten; and it is suggested, whether this circumstance be not of sufficient importance to have a very considerable influence in deciding not only the nature of the ration, but of all those supplies upon which militia, when on duty, are equally as dependent as the regular soldiers; and as every able-bodied citizen is liable, at a moment's warning, to feel the necessity of having these supplies as good as practicable, he will have less objection to furnish his portion of any additional expense that may be necessary to insure their provision. All which is submitted.

The Militia of the United States.

THE MILITIA.

[Communicated to the House, January 22, 1819.
Mr. HARRISON, from the committee upon the improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia, made the following report:

That, having had the subject under their consideration, and finding that a bill containing a system of organization and discipline, reported at the last session, was before the House, they have nothing further to offer on the particular points contained in the bill. But as it is their opinion that, if the bill should be adopted, it will be advancing but a single step towards the attainment of the important object of rendering the militia, in all cases, a substitute for a standing army, they have directed their attention towards some ulterior measure by which it might be effected. They have been enabled to devise none better than that which is contained in the report made to this House on the 17th January, 1817; and they beg that the following extract therefrom may form a part of their report:

"The great difficulty to be encountered is the application of a system of discipline or military instruction to a great population scattered over an immense territory.

"The accomplishment of this object, at once, is evidently not within the power of the Government. To instruct the present militia of the country, to any useful extent, would require a larger portion of their time than they can possibly spare from the duty of providing for their families, unless they are liberally paid: to pay them would absorb all the resources of the nation. The alternative appears to be to direct the efforts of the Government to instruct such a portion of the militia as their means will allow, and which would produce the most beneficial result upon the whole mass; leaving to the effects of another system the gradual instruction of those military acquirements which, in a republican Government, it is so essential for every citizen to possess. Acting upon this principle, and believing that the instruction which it is in the power of the Government to give would be more usefully bestowed upon the whole of the officers and sergeants of the militia, than upon any particular class, the sections of the bill which relate to this part of the subject have been adopted by the committee. They have also considered it to be proper to annex some estimates of the annual expense of the system they recommend.

"Although it may be considered that, by presenting a bill for the organization and classification of the militia, and the exposition of their motives which accompany it, the committee have performed the task assigned them by the resolution under which they acted, they have, nevertheless, believed it to be their duty to submit some further views, the result of their deliberations upon this important subject.

"This course may be more excusable, as the committee have no hesitation in acknowledging that the plan embraced by the bill is a mere expedient—a choice of difficulties—a system which, although it will place the militia upon a much better footing they have before stood on, yet is not likely to produce that great desideratum—that indispensable requisite in a Government constituted like ours—the diffusion of a military spirit and military information throughout the great mass of the people.

"The part of the subject which still remains to be discussed will be best understood by dividing it into two distinct propositions:

"1st. Is it desirable that the whole male population of the United States, of the proper age should be trained to the use of arms, so as to supersede, under any circumstances, the necessity of a standing army?

"2d. Is it practicable?

"The solicitude which has been manifested by the great men who have successively filled the office of Chief Magistrate of the United States, for the adoption of a system of military discipline for the militia, which would produce the effect contemplated by the first proposition, sufficiently manifests their sense of its importance. The subject was often and warmly recommended by the Father of his Country, and, at an early period of his Administration, a plan for the purpose was proposed by the Secretary of War, and being corrected agreeably to his suggestions, was submitted to the National Legislature. It is believed that objections to the expense and supposed difficulty of executing this plan, and to its object, was the cause of its being rejected. Is the opinion which prevailed at that period, that an energetic national militia was to be regarded as the capital security of a free republic, less apparent at the present? Has anything since occurred, either in the history of our own or of any other country, to show that a standing "army, forming a distinct class in the community," is the proper defence of a Government constructed like ours? Do the events of the late war show that discipline is not necessary for the militia? or does the present aspect of the political world afford so much security as to justify the indifference which prevails in providing an effectual national defence?

"It is impossible that any American can recur to many of the events, and particularly to the concluding scenes of the late war, without feeling that elevation of mind which a recollection of his country's glory is calculated to produce. There are, however, others, and not a few, that are eminently calculated to show that an immense sacrifice of blood and treasure can be distinctly traced to the want of discipline in the militia. The glorious success which, in several instances, crowned their efforts, was the result of uncommon valor, or of valor united with the advantage of a position suited to their peculiar character. The greater part of the American militia, accustomed from their early youth to the use of fire-arms, are doubtless more formidable than any other troops in the world in the defence of a line or rampart. Victories in the field are gained by other qualities; by those disciplined evolutions which give harmony and concert to numerous bodies of men, and enable whole armies to move with the activity and address of single combatants. Let our militia be instructed, and America would be equal to a contest with the rest of the world united. The improvements which have been made in the art of war since the commencement of the French revolution give greater advantage to invading and disciplined armies, acting against those of a contrary character, than they before possessed. This arises from their increased activity, produced by the great multiplication of their light troops; the celerity of movement given to the artillery; and, above all, to the improvements in the staff, placing the subsistence of large armies upon a footing of security beyond what was formerly supposed to be possible. An improvement in tactics, which gives advantages to the professed soldier who fights for conquest over the citizen who bears arms only in the defence of his country, is perhaps to be regretted, and no alternative is left to the latter but to perfect himself in the same arts and discipline. It is believed that there is no instance on record of a republic whose citizens had been trained to the use of arms, having been conquered by a nation possessing a different form of government. Small republics have been overthrown by those who were more powerful, as Saguntum destroyed by Carthage, and Numantia by Rome: but it has been observed of those Governments, that 'their walls and towers became their funeral piles, leaving nothing to their conquerors but their ashes.'

The Militia of the United States.

"The committee cannot conceive that any aspect, however pacific it may be, which the Governments of Europe may for the present have assumed towards this country, should be used as an argument to procrastinate, even for a day, any measure calculated to render their future hostility abortive. It cannot be believed that any real friendship can exist in the breasts of the sovereigns of that continent for a Government which has been founded upon principles so opposite to theirs, and which, by the happiness it diffuses, affords an eternal satire and reproach upon their conduct. Whatever security, then, may be derived from their forbearance, whenever, from a change of circumstances, they may think it proper to change their policy. The liberties of America must, then, be preserved as they were won—by the arms, the discipline, and the valor of her free-born sons.

"But the defence of our country against a foreign enemy does not constitute the only (perhaps not the chief) motive of military improvements to the extent contemplated by the proposition we are considering. The safety of a republic depends as much upon the equality in the use of arms amongst its citizens, as upon the equality of rights; nothing can be more dangerous in such a Government than to have a knowledge of the military art confined to a part of the people, for sooner or later that part will govern.

"The effects of discipline possessed by a few, to control numbers without, is to be seen in all the despotic governments of modern as well as ancient times.

"In general, however, the subjects of those despotic governments, which preserve their authority by standing armies, are not allowed the use of arms; but the use of arms is not alone sufficient. A striking example of this is to be found in one of the Grecian republics. The Spartans were enabled, by the force of discipline alone, to keep in subjection for ages the Helots, and other ancient inhabitants of Laconia. These men were not only allowed the use of arms, but upon almost every occasion formed the greater part of the Lacedemonian army; nor were they deficient in bravery, but they were not permitted to learn that admirable discipline which distinguished the Oplites, or heavy armed infantry of Sparta.

"Another important consideration, urging the diffusion of a military spirit amongst our citizens is, the counterpoise it will afford to that inordinate desire of wealth which seems to have pervaded the whole nation, bringing with it habits of luxury, manners, and principles, highly unfavorable to our republican institutions.

"The first effect of this state of society is the substitution of a standing army for a national militia. Upon this subject the committee beg leave to make a quotation from the report of General Knox, corrected by President Washington. 'It is,' says the patriotic Secretary, 'the introduction of vice and corruption of manners into the mass of the people, that renders a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence, and effeminacy of manners predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of youth in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and riveted forever.' So true is the principle here contended for, that it is believed there is no instance in history of a nation losing its liberties where the military spirit of the people did not decline in the same proportion that the corruption of manners advanced. Nor was any free government ever overturned by an internal convulsion, until the destruction of that spirit had been first produced in the body of the people. It was not until the amusements of the theatre, the baths, and the public gardens, had superseded the exercises of the Campus Martius, that a Roman army dared to revolt against its country, and with the power of the sword to substitute for its free institutions the arbitrary will of a dictator; eighty years before the successful usurpation of Cæsar, the revolt of an army could have produced no such consequence.

"But the habits of the people had been changed; no longer in every Roman citizen was to be found a trained and practised soldier; the higher tactics were cultivated, indeed, with zeal and success by a martial nobility. No period has been more prolific of great generals. At none had the discipline of the legions been so perfect; but they were no longer filled by citizens taking their routine of service. The military had become a distinct profession; composed of men, who, in the habits of war and pillage, had forgotten the sacred obligations attached to their character as citizens, and who were ever as ready, upon the suggestion of their leader, to turn their arms against their country, as the enemy whom they were raised to oppose.

"As in every age, then, and in every country, the same cause will produce the same effects, the palladium of American liberty must be the diffusion of military discipline, and a military spirit through the whole body of the people.

"But, secondly; is the object attainable?

"That it is not attainable by any of the systems which have heretofore been in use in the United States, is very evident from the little success which have attended them. The late war repeatedly exhibited the melancholy fact of large corps of militia going to the battle field without understanding a single elementary principle, and without being able to perform a single evolution. Yet militia laws exist, and have existed, in all the States since the war of the Revolution, which set apart, with great precision, a number of days in each year for the purposes of training and discipline. But from this plan no good fruit has ever been produced. It was an error, indeed, common to all the militia systems in use in the United States, that the periods for training were too short and too distant from each other to produce much benefit.

"To remedy this defect camps of discipline have been recommended. One of the reasons which governed the committee in rejecting that part of the Secretary of War's recommendation has been explained above; but, if that objection should be overcome, the committee are far from thinking that the object could be at all accomplished in that way. There is another more formidable obstacle to success; more formidable, because it arises from the nature of our Government, and the constitution of the human character. The sentiments and habits of a free country necessarily produces amongst the citizens a superior restlessness under restraint, than is to be met with in the subjects of a monarchy. This spirit frequently manifests itself even in a career of military services, where the high interests involved, (and in which they largely partake,) and the evident necessity of discipline might be supposed able to correct it. There can scarcely be a restraint more vexatious and disgusting to a grown man than the initiatory lessons of the military art. Military discipline consists in the observance of a number of minute particulars which, to the novice in arms, have no apparent object, but which form the links of a beautiful and connected system. It is believed that to this cause is to be attributed the little progress which has been made in training the militia of the United States; nor is there much prospect that any change of system could, with regard to the present militia, produce the result at which we aim.

"In searching for landmarks to guide us to our object, it will be in vain that we direct our attention to the modern nations of Europe; from them we can borrow nothing to aid our purpose; governments formed upon artificial distinctions in society, which estimate their security by the inability of their subjects to resist oppression, can furnish a free people with no guides in organizing a system of defence which shall be purely national. We are not, however, without resource.

"The ancient republics, from which we have drawn many of the choicest maxims upon which to found our civil institutions, will furnish also a most perfect model for our system of national defence. The whole secret of ancient military glory—the foundation of that wonderful combination of military skill and exalted valor which enabled the petty republic of Athens to resist the mighty torrent of Persian invasion, which formed the walls of Sparta, and conducted the Roman legions (influenced, indeed, by unhallowed motives) to the conquest of the world—will be found in the military education of their youth. The victories of Marathon and Platea, of Cynocéphale and Pydna, were the practical results of the exercises of the Campus Martius and Gymnasia. It is on a foundation of this kind, and of this kind only, that an energetic national militia can be established.

"An examination into the employments and obligations of individuals comprising the society,' says General Knox, 'will evince the impossibility of diffusing an adequate knowledge of the art of war by any other means than a course of discipline during the period of non-age; the time necessary to acquire this important knowledge cannot be afforded at any other period of life with so little injury to the public or private interests.' Nothing is more true than what is here advanced; and yet it is most singular that the amiable and patriotic Secretary should have founded his plan upon a course of instruction, to commence within the limits of non-age, indeed, but at so advanced a period of it, that all the objections which could be made to disciplining the militia at a more advanced age will apply to it, with the addition of others which are more cogent, and which are supposed to be inherent in the system itself. Of his advanced corps, composed of the youth of 18, 19, and 20 years of age, those of 18 and 19 are to be drawn out for thirty days in each year, and those of 20 for ten days, to be instructed in camps of discipline.

"It has been strongly urged against this plan, that the separation of the youth, at that critical age, from the superintending vigilance of their parents and guardians, would be a very dangerous step, and that the loss of time from the pursuit of their professions and occupations would prove to them a most serious evil.

"Whatever force there may be in these objections, the committee are fully persuaded that the improvement to be derived from the execution of this plan would not compensate for the expense and loss of time it would occasion. The perfection of discipline, as it regards the soldier, is the grace, the precision, and address, with which he performs certain evolutions. To arrive at this perfection, long continued practice is essential.

"And since it must be evident that the time necessary for this purpose cannot be taken from the avocations of our citizens, after they have arrived at the age of manhood, the only alternative is to devise a system of military instruction, which shall be grafted on and form a part of the ordinary education of our youth.

"The organization of a system, thus extensive in its operations, must necessarily be a work of some time and difficulty. The want of statistical information will prevent the committee from submitting to the House, at this time, more than the outline of their plan. It is embraced in the following propositions:

"As the important advantages of the military part of the education of the youth will accrue to the community, and not to the individuals who require it, it is proper that the whole expense of the establishment should be borne by the public treasury.

"That to comport with the equality, which is the basis of our Constitution, the organization of the establishment should be such as to extend, without exception, to every individual of the proper age.

"That, to secure this, the contemplated military instruction should not be given in distinct schools, established for that purpose, but that it should form a branch of education in every school within the United States.

"That a corps of the military institutions should be formed to attend to the gymnastic and elementary part of education in every school in the United States, whilst the more scientific part of the art of war shall be communicated by professors of tactics, to be established in all the higher seminaries.

"The committee are fully aware that the establishment of an institution, which, from its nature, is calculated to produce an important change in the manners and habits of the nation, will be received with caution and distrust by a people jealous of their liberties, and who boast of a Government which executes its powers with the least possible sacrifice of individual right. An encroachment upon individual rights forms no part of their system. It is not a conscription which withdraws from an anxious parent a son, for whose morals he fears more than for his life. It is not a Persian or Turkish mandate to educate the youth within the purlieus of a corrupt court, but a system as purely republican in practice as in principle.

"The means are furnished by the Government, and the American youth are called upon to qualify themselves, under the immediate inspection of their parents, or of tutors chosen by their parents, for the sacred task of defending the liberties of their country.

"Although the system of General Knox widely differs from that which has been recommended by the committee, his opinion of the effects to be produced by it is conceived to be more particularly applicable to the latter. 'If the United States,' says he, 'possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution, for the military instruction of the youth, it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced, with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe a love of their country, reverence and obedience to its laws, courage and elevation of mind, openness and liberality of character, accompanied by a just spirit of honor. In addition to which, their bodies will acquire a robustness, greatly conducive to their personal happiness; while habit, with its silent but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system.'

"That the House may possess all the information necessary to act upon this important subject, the committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be required to prepare and lay before this House, at the next session of Congress, a plan for the military instruction of all the youth of the United States, in the way which is best calculated for the purpose, with as little injury as possible to the ordinary course of education."

Estimates of training the Officers and Sergeants of the Militia of the United States.

These estimates are made on a supposed number of one hundred thousand men, divided equally, as nearly as may be, into twenty-five brigades.

1st. Estimate upon the supposition that the officers and sergeants receive full pay, without rations, or an allowance for rations and forage, except to the sergeants, for whom rations might be necessary.

Each brigade containing, according to estimate, four thousand men, will be composed of four regiments, or forty companies.

There would, then, be the following field and staff officers, who should attend the training:

1 Brigadier full pay, $104 . . .	$104 00
1 Brigade inspector, with the pay of major . . .	50 00
4 Colonels, at $75 . . .	300 00
4 Lieutenant colonels, at $60 . . .	240 00
4 Majors, at $50 . . .	200 00
40 Captains, at $40 . . .	1,600 00
40 Lieutenants, at $30 . . .	1,200 00
40 Second lieutenants, at $25 . . .	1,000 00
160 Sergeants, $8 pay, and $6 for rations . . .	2,240 00

Amount of expenses of one brigade $6,934 00

The adjutant to be taken from the line.

Brigades, twenty-five.

Expense of training officers for one month, at full pay, of twenty-five brigades, or one hundred thousand men . . . $173,850 00

And estimating the United States militia at a million, then the total expense of training the officers of the whole militia would be some hundred thousand dollars less than two millions.

The following estimate is made on the supposition of the officers receiving only half-pay; the estimate proceeds, however, upon a supposition that no officer is to receive less than thirty dollars per month; and the sergeants full pay and rations.

Second estimate for 100,000 men:

1 Brigadier, half pay . . .	$52 00
1 Brigade inspector . . .	30 00
4 Colonels, half-pay . . .	150 00
4 Lieut. colonels, half-pay . . .	120 00
4 Majors, $30 each . . .	120 00
120 Captain and lieuten'ts, at $30 . . .	3,600 00
160 Sergeants, pay and rations . . .	2,240 00

For officers of one brigade . . . $6,312 00

For twenty-five brigades . . . $157,800 00

And for 1,000,000 . . . $1,578,000 00

And thirty dollars per month, except sergeants, and leaving them on full pay and rations, then the amount would be varied, as will appear by the third estimate, viz:

And for 1,000,000 . . . 1,565,000 00

Copy of General Knox's report on the arrangement and classification of the militia, made to the House of Representatives, on the 18th January, 1790.

WAR OFFICE, January 18, 1790.

SIR: Having submitted to your consideration a plan for the arrangement of the militia of the United States, which I had presented to the late Congress, and you having approved the general principles thereof, with certain exceptions, I now respectfully lay the same before you, modified according to the alterations you were pleased to suggest.

It has been my anxious desire to devise a national system of defence, adequate to the probable exigencies of the United States, whether arising from internal or external causes; and, at the same time, to erect a standard of republican magnanimity, independent of and superior to the powerful influence of wealth.

The convulsive events generated by the inordinate pursuit of riches or ambition require that the Government should possess a strong corrective arm.

The idea is therefore submitted, whether an efficient military branch of government can be invented with safety to the great principles of liberty, unless the same shall be formed of the people themselves, and supported by their habits and manners. I have the honor to be, &c.,

H. KNOX, Secretary of War.
The President of the United States.

THE INTRODUCTION.

That a well constituted republic is more favorable to the liberties of society, and that its principles give a higher elevation to the human mind than any other form of government, has generally been acknowledged by the unprejudiced and enlightened part of mankind.

But it is at the same time acknowledged that, unless a republic prepares itself, by proper arrangements, to meet those exigencies to which all States are in a degree liable, its peace and existence are more precarious than the forms of government in which the will of one directs the conduct of the whole for the defence of the nation.

A Government whose measures must be the result of multiplied deliberations is seldom in a situation to produce instantly those exertions which the occasion may demand; therefore, it ought to possess such energetic establishments as should enable it, by the vigor of its own citizens, to control events as they arise, instead of being convulsed or subverted by them.

It is the misfortune of modern ages that Governments have been formed by chance and events instead of system; that, without fixed principles, they are braced or relaxed, from time to time, according to the predominating power of the rulers or the ruled; the rulers possessing separate interests from the people, excepting in some of the high-toned monarchies, in which all opposition to the will of the prince seems annihilated.

Hence, we look round Europe in vain for an extensive Government, rising on the power inherent in the people, and performing its operations entirely for their benefit. But we find artificial force governing everywhere, and the people generally made subservient to the elevation and caprice of the few; almost every nation appearing to be busily employed in conducting some external war, grappling with internal commotion, and endeavoring to extricate itself from impending debts which threaten to overwhelm it with ruin. Princes and Ministers seem neither to have leisure nor inclination to bring forward institutions for diffusing general strength, knowledge, and happiness; but they seem to understand well the Machiavelian maxim of politics—divide and govern.

May the United States avoid the errors and crimes of other Governments, and possess the wisdom to embrace the present invaluable opportunity of establishing such institutions as shall invigorate, exalt, and perpetuate the great principles of freedom; an opportunity pregnant with the fate of millions, but rapidly borne on the wings of time, and may never again return.

The public mind, unbiassed by superstition or prejudice, seems happily prepared to receive the impressions of wisdom. The latent springs of human action, ascertained by the standard of experience, may be regulated and made subservient to the noble purpose of forming a dignified national character.

The causes by which nations have ascended and declined, through the various ages of the world, may be calmly and accurately determined; and the United States may be placed in the singularly fortunate condition of commencing their career of empire, with the accumulated knowledge of all the known societies and Governments of the globe.

The strength of the Government, like the strength of any other vast and complicated machine, will depend on a due adjustment of its several parts. Its agriculture, its commerce, its laws, its finance, its system of defence, and its manners and habits, all require consideration, and the highest exercise of political wisdom.

It is the intention of the present attempt to suggest the most efficient system of defence which may be compatible with the interests of a free people; a system which shall not only produce the expected effect, but which, in its operations, shall also produce those habits and manners which will impart strength and durability to the whole Government.

The modern practice of Europe, with respect to the employment of standing armies, has created such a mass of opinion in their favor, that even philosophers and the advocates for liberty have frequently confessed their use and necessity in certain cases.

But whoever seriously and candidly estimates the power of discipline and the tendency of military habits will be constrained to confess that, whatever may be the efficiency of a standing army in war, it cannot in peace be considered as friendly to the rights of human nature. The recent instance in France cannot, with propriety, be brought to overturn the general principle built upon the uniform experience of mankind. It may be found, on examining the causes that appear to have influenced the military of France, that, while the springs of power were wound up in the nation to the highest pitch, the discipline of the army was proportionably relaxed. But any argument on this head may be considered as unnecessary to the enlightened citizens of the United States.

A small corps of well disciplined and well informed artillerists and engineers, and a legion for the protection of the frontiers and the magazines and arsenals, are all the military establishment which may be required for the present use of the United States.

The privates of the corps to be enlisted for a certain period, and after the expiration of which to return to the mass of the citizens.

An energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free republic; and not a standing army, forming a distinct class in the community.

It is the introduction and diffusion of vice and corruption of manners into the mass of the people that render a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence, and effeminacy of manners, predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of the youths in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and riveted forever.

While the human character remains unchanged, and society and Governments of considerable extent are formed, a principle ever ready to execute the laws and defend the State must constantly exist. Without this vital principle the Government would be invaded or overturned, and trampled upon by the bold and ambitious. No community can be long held together, unless its arrangements are adequate to its probable exigencies.

If it should be decided to reject a standing army for the military branch of the Government of the United States, as possessing too fierce an aspect, and being hostile to the principles of liberty, it will follow that a well constituted militia ought to be established.

A consideration of the subject will show the impracticability of disciplining at once the mass of the people. All discussions on the subject of a powerful militia will result in one or other of the following principles:

1st. Either efficient institutions must be established for the military education of the youth, and that the knowledge acquired therein shall be diffused throughout the community by the means of rotation; or,

2dly. That the militia must be formed of substitutes, after the manner of the militia of Great Britain.

If the United States possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution, it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced, with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe a love of their country; reverence and obedience to its laws; courage and elevation of mind; openness and liberality of character, accompanied by a just spirit of honor; in addition to which their bodies will acquire a robustness greatly conducive to their personal happiness, as well as the defence of their country; while habit, with its silent but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system.

Habit, that powerful and universal law, incessantly acting on the human race, well deserves the attention of legislators. Formed at first in individuals, by separate and almost imperceptible impulses, until at length it acquires a force which controls with irresistible sway. The effects of salutary or pernicious habits operating on a whole nation are immense, and decide its rank and character in the world.

Hence, the science of legislation teaches to scrutinize every national institution, as it may introduce proper or improper habits, to adopt with religious zeal the former, and reject with horror the latter.

A republic, constructed on the principles herein stated, would be uninjured by events sufficient to overturn a Government supported solely by the uncertain power of a standing army.

The well-informed members of the community, actuated by the highest motives of self-love, would form the real defence of the country. Rebellions would be prevented, or suppressed with ease. Invasions of such a Government would be undertaken only by madmen, and the virtues and knowledge of the people would effectually oppose the introduction of tyranny.

But the second principle (a militia of substitutes) is pregnant, in a degree, with the mischiefs of a standing army, as it is highly probable the substitutes, from time to time, will be nearly the same men, and the most idle and worthless part of the community. Wealthy families, proud of distinctions, which riches may confer, will prevent their sons from serving in the militia of substitutes; the plan will degenerate into habitual contempt; a standing army will be introduced, and the liberties of the people subjected to all the contingencies of events.

The expense attending an energetic establishment of militia may be strongly urged as an objection to the institution. But it is to be remembered that this objection is levelled at both systems, whether by rotation or by substitutes; for, if the numbers are equal, the expense will also be equal. The estimate of the expense will show its unimportance when compared with the magnitude and beneficial effects of the institution.

But the people of the United States will cheerfully consent to the expenses of a measure calculated to serve as a perpetual barrier to their liberties; especially as they well know that the disbursements will be made among the members of the same community, and therefore cannot be injurious.

Every intelligent mind would rejoice in the establishment of an institution, under whose auspices the youth and vigor of the constitution would be renewed with each successive generation, and which would appear to secure the great principles of freedom and happiness against the injuries of time and events.

The following plan is formed on these general principles:

1st. That it is the indispensable duty of every nation to establish all necessary institutions for its own perfection and defence.

2dly. That it is a capital security to a free State for the great body of the people to possess a competent knowledge of the military art.

3dly. That this knowledge cannot be attained in the present state of society, but by establishing adequate institutions for the military education of youth; and that the knowledge acquired therein should be diffused throughout the community by the principles of rotation.

4thly. That every man of the proper age and ability of body is firmly bound by the social compact, to perform, personally, his proportion of military duty for the defence of the State.

5thly. That all men of the legal military age, should be armed, enrolled, and held responsible for different degrees of military service.

And 6thly. That, agreeably to the Constitution, the United States are to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

THE PLAN.

The period of life on which military service shall be required of the citizens of the United States, to commence at eighteen, and terminate at the age of sixty years.

The men comprehended by this description, exclusive of such exceptions as the Legislatures of the respective States may think proper to make, and all actual mariners, shall be enrolled for different degrees of military duty, and divided into three distinct classes.

The first class shall comprehend the youth of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty years of age, to be denominated the advanced corps.

The second class shall include the men from twenty-one to forty-five years of age, to be denominated the main corps.

The third class shall comprehend, inclusively, the men from forty-six to sixty years of age, to be denominated the reserved corps.

All the militia of the United States shall assume the form of the legion, which shall be the permanent establishment thereof.

A legion shall consist of one hundred and fifty-three commissioned officers, and two thousand eight hundred and eighty non-commissioned officers and privates, formed in the following manner:

1. The legionary staff.—One legionary, or major general; two aids-de-camp of the rank of major, one of whom to be the legionary quartermaster; one inspector and deputy adjutant general, of the rank of lieutenant colonel; one chaplain.

2. The brigade staff.—One brigadier general; one brigade inspector, to serve as an aid-de-camp.

3. The regimental staff.—One lieutenant colonel commandant; two majors; one adjutant; one paymaster, or agent; one quartermaster.

4. Two brigades of infantry.—Each brigade of two regiments; each regiment of eight companies, forming two battalions; each company of a captain, lieutenant, ensign, six sergeants, one drum, one fife, and sixty-four rank and file.

5. Two companies of riflemen.—Each company to have a captain, lieutenant, ensign, six sergeants, a bugle-horn, one drum, and sixty-four rank and file.

6. A battalion of artillery.—Consisting of four companies, each to have a captain, captain-lieutenant, one lieutenant, six sergeants, twelve artificers, and fifty-two rank and file.

7. A squadron of cavalry.—Consisting of two troops, each troop to have a captain, two lieutenants, a cornet, six sergeants, one farrier, one saddler, one trumpeter, and sixty-four dragoons.

In case the whole number of the advanced corps in any State should be insufficient to form a legion of this extent, yet the component parts must be preserved, and the reduction proportioned, as nearly as may be, to each part.

The companies of all the corps shall be divided into sections of twelve each. It is proposed by this division to establish one uniform vital principle, which, in peace and war, shall pervade the militia of the United States.

All requisitions for men to form an army, either for State or federal purposes, shall be furnished by the advanced and main corps, by means of the sections.

The Executive Government, or Commander-in-chief of the militia of each State, will assess the numbers required on the respective legions of these corps.

The legionary General will direct the proportions to be furnished by each part of his command. Should the demand be so great as to require one man from each section, then the operation hereby directed shall be performed by single sections. But if a less number should be required, they will be furnished by an association of sections or companies, according to the demand. In any case, it is probable that mutual convenience may dictate an agreement with an individual to perform the service required. If, however, no agreement can be made, one must be detached by an indiscriminate draught, and the others shall pay him a sum of money, equal to the average sum which shall be paid in the same legion for the voluntary performance of the service required.

In case any sections, or companies of a legion, after having furnished its own quota, should have more men willing to engage for the service required, other companies of the same legion shall have permission to engage them. The same rule to extend to the different legions in the State.

The legionary General must be responsible to the Commander-in-chief of the militia of the State, that the men furnished are according to the description, and that they are equipped in the manner, and marched to the rendezvous, conformably to the orders for that purpose.

The men who may be draughted shall not serve more than three years at one time.

The reserved corps, being destined for the domestic defence of the State, shall not be obliged to furnish men, excepting in cases of actual invasion or rebellion, and then the men required shall be furnished by means of the sections.

The actual commissioned officers of the respective corps shall not be included in the sections, nor in any of the operations thereof.

The respective States shall be divided into portions or districts, each of which to contain, as nearly as may be, some complete part of a legion.

Every citizen of the United States, who shall serve his country in the field, for the space of one year, either as an officer or soldier, shall, if under the age of twenty-one years, be exempted from the service required in the advanced corps. If he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, then every year he shall so serve in the field shall be estimated as equal to six years' service in the main or reserved corps, and shall accordingly exempt him from every service therein for the said term of six years, except in cases of actual invasion of or rebellion within the State in which he resides. And it shall also be a permanent establishment, that six years' actual service in the field shall entirely free every citizen from any further demands of service, either in the militia or in the field, unless in cases of invasion or rebellion.

All actual mariners or seamen, in the respective States, shall be registered in districts, and divided into two classes; the first class to consist of all seamen, from the age of sixteen to thirty years, inclusively; the second class to consist of all those of the age of thirty-one to forty-five, inclusively.

The first class shall be responsible to serve three years on board of some public armed vessel or ship of war, as a commissioned officer, warrant officer, or private mariner; for which service, they shall receive the customary wages and emoluments.

But should the State not demand the said three years' service during the above period, from the age of sixteen to thirty years, then the party to be exempted entirely therefrom.

The person so serving shall receive a certificate of his service, on parchment, according to the form which shall be directed, which shall exempt him from any other than voluntary service, unless on such exigencies as may require the services of all the members of the community.

The second class shall be responsible for a proportion of service in those cases to which the first class shall be unequal.

The numbers required shall be furnished by sections, in the same manner as is prescribed for the sections of the militia.

Of the Advanced Corps.

The advanced corps are designed, not only as a school, in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war, but they are, in all cases of exigence, to serve as an actual defence to the community.

The whole of the armed corps shall be clothed according to the manner hereafter directed, armed and subsisted, at the expense of the United States; and all the youth of the said corps, in each State, shall be encamped together, if practicable, or by legions; which encampments shall be denominated the annual camps of discipline.

The youth of eighteen and nineteen years shall be disciplined for thirty days successively in each year; and those of twenty years shall be disciplined only for ten days of the annual encampments.

The non-commissioned officers and privates are not to receive any pay during the said time; but the commissioned officers will receive the pay of their relative ranks, agreeably to the Federal establishment for the time being.

In order that the plan shall effectually answer the end proposed, the first day of January shall be the fixed period, for all who attain the age of eighteen years in any part or during the course of each year, to be enrolled in the advanced corps, and to take the necessary oaths to perform, personally, such legal military service as may be directed, for the full and complete term of three years, to be estimated from the time of entrance into the said corps; and also to take an oath of allegiance to the State, and to the United States.

The commanding officer, or general of the advanced legions of the district, shall regulate the manner of the service of the youth, respectively, whether it shall be in the infantry, artillery, or cavalry; but after having entered into either of them, no change should be allowed.

Each individual, at his first joining the annual camps of discipline, will receive complete arms and accoutrements, all of which, previously to his being discharged from the said camps, he must return to the regimental quartermaster, on the penalty of — dollars, or — months' imprisonment.

The said arms and accoutrements shall be marked in some conspicuous place with the letters M. U. S. And all sales or purchases of any of said arms or accoutrements shall be severely punished according to law.

And each individual shall, also, on his first entrance into the advanced corps, receive the following clothing: one hat, one uniform short coat, one waistcoat, and one pair of overalls, which he shall retain in his own possession, and for which he shall be held accountable, and be compelled to replace all deficiencies during his service in the annual camps of discipline.

Those who shall serve in the cavalry shall be at the expense of their own horses, and uniform helmets, and horse furniture; but they shall receive forage for their horses, swords, pistols, and clothing, equal in value to the infantry.

At the age of twenty-one years, every individual having served in the manner and for the time prescribed shall receive an honorary certificate thereof, on parchment, and signed by the legionary general and inspector.

The names of all persons to whom such certificates shall be given shall be fairly registered in books to be provided for that purpose.

And the said certificate, or an attested copy of the register aforesaid, shall be required as an indispensable qualification for exercising any of the rights of a free citizen, until after the age of — years.

The advanced legions, in all cases of invasion or rebellion, shall, on requisition of lawful authority, be obliged to march to any place within the United States; to remain imbodyed for such time as shall be directed, not to exceed one year, to be computed from the time of marching from the regimental parades, during the period of their being on such service; to be placed on the continental establishment of pay, subsistence, clothing, forage, tents, camp equipage, and all such other allowances as are made to the federal troops, at the same time, and under the same circumstances.

If the military service so required should be for such a short period as to render an actual issue of clothing unnecessary, then an allowance should be made in proportion to the annual cost of clothing for the federal soldier, according to estimates to be furnished for that purpose from the War Office of the United States.

In case the legions of the advanced corps should march to any place, in consequence of a requisition of the General Government, all legal and proper expenses of such march shall be paid by the United States. But should they be imbodyed and march in consequence of an order derived from the authority of the States to which they belong, and for State purposes, then the expenses will be borne by the State.

The advanced corps shall be constituted on such principles that, when completed, it will receive one-third part, and discharge one-third part of its numbers annually. By this arrangement, two-thirds of the corps will at all times be considerably disciplined; but as it will only receive those of eighteen years, it will not be completed until the third year after its institution. Those who have already attained the ages of nineteen and twenty years will, in the first instance, be enrolled in the main corps.

But one-half of the legionary officers to be appointed the first, and the other the second year of the establishment.

The officers of each grade in the States, respectively, shall be divided into three classes, which shall by lot be numbered one, two, and three; one of the said classes, according to their numbers, shall be deranged every third year. In the first period of nine years one-third part will have to serve three, one-third part six, and one-third part nine years; but after the said first period, the several classes will serve nine years, which shall be the limitation of service by virtue of the same appointment; and in such cases where there may not be three officers of the same grade, the limitation of nine years' service shall be observed. All vacancies occasioned by the aforesaid derangements, or any casualties, shall be immediately filled by new appointments.

The captains and subalterns of the advanced corps shall not be less than twenty-one, nor more than thirty-five; and the field officers shall not exceed forty-five years of age.

Each company, battalion, and regiment shall have a fixed parade or place at which to assemble. The companies shall assemble at their own parade, and march to the parade of the battalion, and the battalions to the regimental parade; and, when thus imbodyed, the regiment will march to the rendezvous of the legion. Every officer of a company, battalion, and regiment will be accountable to his superior officer that his command is in the most perfect order.

The officers to receive subsistence money in lieu of provision, in proportion to their respective grades; and those whose duties require them to be on horseback will receive forage in the same proportion.

Every legion must have a chaplain, of respectable talents and character, who, besides his religious functions, should impress on the minds of youths, at stated periods, in concise discourses, the eminent advantages of free Governments to the happiness of society, and that such Governments can only be supported by the knowledge, spirit, and virtuous conduct of the youths; to be illustrated by the most conspicuous examples of history.

The Militia of the United States.

No amusements should be admitted in camp but those which correspond with war—the swimming of men and horses, running, wrestling, and such other exercises as should render the body flexible and vigorous.

The camps should, if possible, be formed near a river, and remote from large cities. The first is necessary for the practice of the manoeuvres; the second to avoid the vices of populous places.

The time of the annual encampments shall be divided into six parts or periods, of five days each; the first of which shall be occupied in acquiring the air, attitudes, and first principles of a soldier; the second, in learning the manual exercise, and to march individually, and in small squads; the third and fourth, in exercising and manoeuvring in detail, and by battalions and regiments; in the fifth, the youth of twenty having been disciplined during the two preceding annual encampments are to be included. This period is to be employed in the exercise and tactics of the legion, or, if more than one, in executing the grand manoeuvres of the whole body—marching, attacking, and defending, in various forms, different grounds and positions; in fine, in representing all the real images of war, excepting the effusion of blood.

The guards, and every other circumstance of the camp, to be perfectly regulated.

Each State will determine on the season in which its respective annual encampments shall be formed, so as best to suit the health of the men and the general interests of the society.

The United States to make an adequate provision to supply the arms, clothing, rations, artillery, ammunition, forage, straw, tents, camp equipages, including every requisite for the annual camps of discipline; and also for the pay and subsistence of the legionary officers, and for the following general staff: one inspector general, one adjutant general, one quartermaster general, with a deputy for each State.

These officers will be essential to the uniformity, economy, and efficacy of the system; to be appointed in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States.

The quartermaster general shall be responsible to the United States for the public property of every species delivered to him for the annual camps of discipline; and his deputy in each State shall be responsible to him.

At the commencement of the annual camps of discipline, the deputy quartermaster will make regular issues to the legionary or regimental quartermasters, as the case may be, of all the articles of every species provided by the United States.

The return for the said articles to be examined and certified by the highest legionary or regimental officer, as the case may be, who shall be responsible for the accuracy thereof.

At the expiration of the annual camps of discipline, all public property (clothing excepted) shall be returned to the deputy quartermaster of the State, who shall hold the legionary quartermaster accountable for all deficiencies. All the apparatus and property so returned shall be carefully examined, repaired, and deposited in a magazine, to be provided in each State for that purpose, under the charge of the said deputy quartermaster, until the ensuing annual encampment, on any occasion which may render a new issue necessary.

Corporal punishments shall never be inflicted in the annual camps of discipline; but a system of fines and imprisonment shall be formed for the regular government of said camps.

Of the Main Corps.

As the main and reserved corps are to be replenished, by the principle of rotation, from the advanced corps, and ultimately to consist of men who have received their military education therein, it is proper that one uniform arrangement should pervade the several classes.

It is for this reason the legion is established, as the common form of all the corps of the militia.

The main legions, consisting of a great majority of the men of the military age, will form the principal defence of the country.

They are to be responsible for their proportion of men, to form an army whenever necessity shall dictate the measure; and, on every sudden occasion, to which the advanced corps shall be incompetent, an adequate number of non-commissioned officers and privates shall be added thereto from the main corps, by means of the sections.

The main corps will be perfectly armed in the first instance, and will practice the exercise and manoeuvres four days in each year; and will assemble in their respective districts, by companies, battalions, regiments, or legions, as shall be directed by the legionary general; but it must be a fixed rule that, in the populous parts of the States, the regiments must assemble once annually, and the legions once in three years.

Although the main corps cannot acquire a great degree of military knowledge in the few days prescribed for its annual exercise, yet, by the constant accession of the youth from the advanced corps, it will soon command respect for its discipline as well as its numbers.

When the youth are transferred from the advanced corps, they shall invariably join the flank companies, the cavalry, or artillery of the main corps, according to the nature of their former services.

Of the Reserved Corps.

The reserved corps will assemble only twice annually, for the inspection of arms, by companies, battalions, or regiments, as shall be directed by each State. It will assemble by legions, whenever the defence of the State may render the measure necessary.

Such are the propositions of the plan, to which it may be necessary to add some explanations.

The Militia of the United States.

Although the substantial political maxim, which requires personal service of all the members of the community for the defence of the State is obligatory under all forms of society, and is the main pillar of a free Government, yet the degrees thereof may vary at the different periods of life, consistently with the general welfare. The public convenience may also dictate a relaxation of the general obligation, as it respects the principal magistrates and the ministers of justice and of religion, and perhaps some religious sects. But it ought to be remembered, that the measures of national importance never should be frustrated by the accommodation of individuals.

The military age has generally commenced at sixteen, and terminated at the age of sixty years; but the youth of sixteen do not commonly attain such a degree of robust strength as to enable them to sustain, without injury, the hardships incident to the field; therefore the commencement of military service is herein fixed at eighteen, and the termination, as usual, at sixty years of age.

As the plan proposes that the militia shall be divided into three capital classes, and that each class shall be formed into legions, the reasons for it shall be given in succession.

The advance corps, and annual camps of discipline, are instituted in order to introduce an operative military spirit in the community; to establish a course of honorable military service, which will at the same time mould the minds of the young men to a due obedience of the laws; instruct them in the art of war; and, by the manly exercise of the field, form a race of hardy citizens, equal to the dignified task of defending their country.

An examination into the employments and obligations of the individuals composing the society, will evince the impossibility of diffusing an adequate knowledge of the art of war by any other means than a course of discipline, during the period of non-age. The time necessary to acquire this important knowledge cannot be afforded at any other period of life, with so little injury to the public or private interests.

Without descending to minute distinctions, the body of the people of the United States may be divided into two parts: the yeomanry of the country, and the men of various employments resident in towns and cities. In both parts it is usual for the male children, from the age of fourteen to twenty-one years, to learn some trade or employment, under the direction of a parent or master. In general, the labor or service of the youth during this period, besides amply repaying the trouble of tuition, leaves a large profit to the tutor. This circumstance is stated to show that no great hardships will arise in the first operations of the proposed plan; a little practice will render the measure perfectly equal, and remove every difficulty.

Youth is the time for the State to avail itself of those services which it has a right to demand, and by which it is to be invigorated and preserved; in this season, the passions and affections are strongly influenced by the splendor of military parade. The impressions the mind receives will be retained through life. The young man will repair with pride and pleasure to the field of exercise; while the head of a family, anxious for its general welfare, and perhaps its immediate subsistence, will reluctantly quit his domestic duties for any length of time.

The habits of industry will be rather strengthened than relaxed by the establishment of the annual camps of discipline, as all the time will be occupied by the various military duties. Idleness and dissipation will be regarded as disgraceful, and punished accordingly. As soon as the youth attain the age of manhood, a natural solicitude to establish themselves in the society will occur in its full force. The public claims for military service will be too inconsiderable to injure their industry. It will be sufficiently stimulated to proper exertions, by the prospects of opulence attending on the cultivation of a fertile soil, or the pursuits of a productive commerce.

It is presumed that thirty days, annually, during the eighteenth and nineteenth, and ten days during the twentieth year, is the least time that ought to be appropriated by the youth to the acquisition of the military art. The same number of days might be added during the twentieth as during the two preceding years, were not the expense an objection.

Every means will be provided by the public to facilitate the military education of the youth, which it is proposed shall be an indispensable qualification of a free citizen; therefore they will not be entitled to any pay. But the officers, being of the main corps, are in a different predicament; they are supposed to have passed through the course of discipline required by the laws, and to be competent to instruct others in the military art. As the public will have but small claims for personal services on them, and as they must incur considerable expenses to prepare themselves to execute properly their respective offices, they ought to be paid while on actual duty.

As soon as the service of the youth expires in the advanced corps, they are to be enrolled in the main corps. On this occasion the Republic receives disciplined and free citizens, who understand their public rights, and are prepared to defend them.

The main corps is instituted to preserve and circulate throughout the community the military discipline acquired in the advanced corps—to arm the people, and fix firmly, by practice and habit, those forms and maxims which are essential to the life and energy of a free Government.

The reserved corps is instituted to prevent men being sent to the field whose strength is unequal to sustain the severities of an active campaign; but by organizing and rendering them eligible for domestic service, a greater proportion of the younger and robust part of the community may be enabled, in cases of necessity, to encounter the more urgent duties of war.

It would be difficult, previously to the actual formation of the annual camps of discipline, to ascertain the number in each State of which it would be composed. The frontier counties of several States are thinly inhabited, and require all their internal force for their immediate defence. There are other infant settlements from which it might be injurious to draw away their youth annually for the purpose of discipline.

No evil would result, if the establishment of the advanced corps should be omitted in such districts for a few years. Besides, the forbearance in this respect would lessen the expense, and render the institution more compatible with the public finances.

The several State Legislatures, therefore, as best understanding their local interests, might be invested with a discretionary power to omit the enrolments for the advanced corps in such of their frontier and thinly-inhabited counties as they may judge proper.

If the number of three millions may be assumed as the total number of inhabitants within the United States, half a million may be deducted therefrom for blacks; and, pursuant to the foregoing ideas, another half million may be deducted on account of the thinly-settled parts of the country.

The proportion of men of the military age, from eighteen to sixty years, inclusively, of two millions of people, of all ages and sexes, may be estimated at four hundred thousand. There may be deducted from this number, as actual mariners, about fifty thousand, and a further number of twenty-five thousand, to include exempted of religious sects, and of every other sort which the respective States may think proper to make.

Three hundred and twenty-five thousand, therefore, may be assumed as the number of operative fencible men to compose the militia. The proportion of the several classes of which would be nearly as follows:

Firstly. The advanced corps, one-tenth composed of the youth of the ages of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty years - 32,500
Secondly. The main corps, six-tenths and one-twentieth - 211,250
Thirdly. The reserved corps, two-tenths and one-twentieth - 81,250

325,000

The following estimate is formed, for the purpose of exhibiting the annual expense of the institution of the advanced corps, stating the same at thirty thousand men.

Estimate of the expense of the annual camps of discipline, as proposed in the foregoing plan, arising on each of the first three years, and, after that period, of the annual expense of the institution.

10,000 suits of uniform clothing, stated at eight dollars, each suit of which shall serve for three years' discipline - $80,000

10,000 rations per day for thirty days, each ration stated at ten cents - 30,000

The expense of four complete corps of legionary officers of all descriptions for thirty days, including pay, subsistence, and forage - 27,870

Forage for the cavalry - - - - -	4,800
Straw, camp-kettles, bowls, axes, canteens, and fuel - - - - -	20,000
Annual proportion of the expense of tents for officers and soldiers, which may serve for eight annual encampments - - - - -	3,000
Four legionary standards - - - - -	2,000
Regimental colors - - - - -	1,000
Consumption of powder and ball, shot and shells, damage to arms and accoutrements, and artillery, and transportation of the same, stated at - - - - -	25,000
Hospital department - - - - -	5,000
Contingencies of the Quartermaster's and other departments - - - - -	15,000
General staff, Adjutant General, Quartermaster General, Inspector General, and their deputies - - - - -	12,000

Entire expenses of the first year - $225,670

Additional expenses on the second year.

10,000 rations per day for thirty days, are 300,000 rations, at 10 cents - - - - -	$30,000
The expense of four complete corps of legionary officers, of all descriptions, for thirty days, including pay, subsistence, and forage - - - - -	27,870
Four legionary standards - - - - -	2,000
Regimental colors - - - - -	1,000
Forage for the cavalry - - - - -	4,800
Tents, straw, camp-kettles, bowls, axes, canteens, and fuel - - - - -	26,000
Hospital department - - - - -	5,000
Contingencies in Quartermaster's and other departments - - - - -	15,000
Ammunition, damage to arms and accoutrements - - - - -	15,000

Expense of the first year - 120,670
225,670

Combined expenses of the first and second years - $346,340

Additional expenses on the third year.

The expense of 10,000 rations for ten days, is 100,000 rations, at 10 cents - - - - -	$10,000
Forage - - - - -	1,600
For the camp equipage - - - - -	10,000
Tents - - - - -	1,500
Hospital stores - - - - -	1,000
Ammunition, damage to arms and accoutrements - - - - -	10,000
Contingencies in the Quartermaster's and other departments - - - - -	10,000

Combined expenses of the first and second years - 44,100
346,340

The total expense of the first three years - $390,440

It is to be observed, that the officers for four legions will be adequate to command the youth of eighteen who commence their discipline the first year, and that the same number of officers will be required for the second year. The youth of the third year may be incorporated by sections, in the existing corps, so that no additional officers will be required on their account.

Hence it appears that the expense of 10,000 men for one year, amounts to - $225,670
Twenty thousand, for the second year, to - 346,340
Thirty thousand, for the third year, to - 390,440

If the youth of the three ages of eighteen, nineteen, and twenty, be disciplined at once, the last mentioned sum will be about the fixed annual expense of the camps of discipline; from which, however, is to be deducted $6,000, being the expense of the standards and colors, the former of which will be of a durable nature, and the latter will not require to be replaced oftener than once in twenty years - 6,000

The annual expense of the advance corps - 384,440

Thus, for a sum less than four hundred thousand dollars annually, which, apportioned on three millions of people, would be little more than one-eighth of a dollar each, an energetic republican militia may be durably established; the invaluable principles of liberty secured and perpetuated; and a dignified national fabric erected on the solid foundation of public virtue.

The main and reserved corps must be perfectly organized in the first instance, but the advanced corps will not be completed until the third year of its institution.

The combination of troops, of various descriptions, into one body, so as to invest it with the highest and greatest number of powers, in every possible situation, has long been a subject of discussion and difference of opinion. But no other form appears so well to have sustained the criterion of time and severe examination, as the Roman legion. This formidable organization, accommodated to the purposes of modern war, still retains its original energy and superiority. Of the ancients, Polybius and Vegetius have described and given the highest encomiums of the legion. The former, particularly, in his comparative view of the advantages and disadvantages of the Macedonian and Roman arms, and their respective orders of battle, has left to mankind an instructive and important legacy. Of the moderns, the illustrious Mareschal Saxe has modelled the legion for the use of fire-arms, and strenuously urges its adoption, in preference to any other form. And the respectable and intelligent veteran, late Inspector General of the armies of the United States, recommends the adoption of the legion.

"Upon a review," says he, "of all the military of Europe, there does not appear to be a single form which could be safely adopted by the United States. They are unexceptionably different from each other, and, like all other human institutions, seem to have started as much out of accident as design. The local situation of the country, the spirit of the Government, the character of the nation, and, in many instances, the character of the prince, have all had their influence in settling the foundation and discipline of their respective troops, and render it impossible that we should take either as a model. The legion alone has not been adopted by any; and yet I am confident in asserting, that whether it be examined as applicable to all countries, or as it may immediately apply to the existing or probable necessity of this, it will be found strikingly superior to any other:

"1st. Being a complete and little army of itself, it is ready to begin its operations on the shortest notice, or slightest alarm.

"2d. Having all the component parts of the largest army of any possible description, it is prepared to meet every species of war that may present itself; and

"3d. As in every case of detachment, the first constitutional principle will be preserved, and the embarrassments of draughting and detail, which, in armies differently framed, too often distract the commanding officer, will be avoided."

It may easily suggest itself from this sketch, that, in forming a legion, the most difficult task is to determine the necessary proportion of each species of soldiers which is to compose it.

This must obviously depend upon what will be the theatre, and what the style of the war. On the plains of Poland, whole brigades of cavalry would be necessary against every enemy; but in the forests and among the hills of America, a single regiment would be more than sufficient against any. And as there are but two kinds of war to which we are much exposed, viz: an attack from the sea side by a European Power, aided by our sworn enemies settled on our extreme left, and an invasion of our back settlements by an Indian enemy, it follows, of course, that musketeers and light infantry should make the greatest part of our army.

The institution of the section is intended to interest the patriotism and pride of every individual in the militia; to support the legal measures of a free Government; to render every man active in the public cause, by introducing the spirit of emulation, and a degree of personal responsibility.

The common mode of recruiting is attended with too great destruction of morals to be tolerated, and is too uncertain to be the principal resource of a wise nation in time of danger. The public faith is frequently wounded by unworthy individuals, who hold out delusive promises which can never be realized. By such means, an unprincipled banditti are often collected for the purpose of defending everything that should be dear to freemen. The consequences are natural; such men either desert in time of danger, or are even ready, on the slightest disgust, to turn their arms against their country.

By the establishment of the sections, an ample and permanent source is opened, whence the State, in every exigence, may be supplied with men whose all depends upon the prosperity of their country.

In cases of necessity, an army may be formed of citizens, whose previous knowledge of discipline will enable it to proceed to an immediate accomplishment of the designs of the State, instead of exhausting the public resources by wasting whole years in preparing to face the enemy.

The previous arrangements necessary to form and maintain the annual encampments, as well as the discipline acquired therein, will be an excellent preparation for war.

The artillery and its numerous appendages, arms, and accoutrements of every kind, and all species of ammunition, ought to be manufactured within the United States. It is of high importance that the present period should be embraced to establish adequate institutions to produce the necessary apparatus of war.

It is unworthy the dignity of a rising and free empire to depend on foreign and fortuitous supplies of the essential means of defence.

The clothing for the troops could, with ease, be manufactured within the United States, and the establishment in that respect would tend to the encouragement of important manufactories.

The disbursements made in each State for the rations, forage, and other necessary articles for the annual camps of discipline, would most beneficially circulate the money arising from the public revenue.

The local circumstances of the United States, their numerous seaports, and the protection of their commerce, require a naval armament. Hence, the necessity of the proposed plan, embracing the idea of the States obtaining men on republican principles, for the marine as well as the land service. But one may be accomplished with much greater facility than the other, as the preparation of a soldier for the field requires a degree of discipline which cannot be learned without much time and labor; whereas, the common course of sea service on board of merchant vessels differs but little from the service required on board of armed ships; therefore, the education for war, in this respect, will be obtained without any expense to the State. All that seems to be requisite on the head of marine service is, that an efficient regulation should be established in the respective States to register all actual seamen, and to render those of a certain age amenable to the public for personal service, if demanded within a given period.

The constitutions of the respective States, and of the United States, having directed the modes in which the officers of the militia shall be appointed, no alteration can be made therein. Although it may be supposed that some modes of appointment are better calculated than others to inspire the highest propriety of conduct, yet there are none so defective as to serve as a sufficient reason for rejecting an efficient system for the militia. It is certain that the choice of officers is the point on which the reputation and importance of a corps must depend. Therefore, every person who may be concerned in the appointment should consider himself as responsible to his country for a proper choice.

The wisdom of the States will be manifested by inducing those citizens of whom the late American army was composed to accept of appointments in the militia. The high degree of military knowledge which they possess was acquired at too great a price, and is too precious, to be buried in oblivion; it ought to be cherished, and rendered permanently beneficial to the community.

The vigor and importance of the proposed plan will entirely depend on the laws relative thereto; unless the laws shall be equal to the object, and rigidly enforced, no energetic national militia can be established.

If wealth be admitted as a principle of exemption, the plan cannot be executed. It is the wisdom of political establishments to make the wealth of individuals subservient to the general good, and not to suffer it to corrupt or attain undue indulgence.

It is conceded that people, solicitous to be exonerated from their proportion of public duty, may exclaim against the proposed arrangement as an intolerable hardship. But it ought to be strongly impressed, that while society has its charms, it also has its indispensable obligations. That to attempt such a degree of refinement as to exonerate the members of the community from all personal service, is to render them incapable of the exercise, and unworthy of the characters of freemen.

Every State possesses not only the right of personal service from its members, but the right to regulate the service on principles of equality for the general defence. All being bound, none can complain of injustice, on being obliged to perform his equal proportion. Therefore, it ought to be a permanent rule, that those who in youth decline or refuse to subject themselves to the course of military education established by the laws, should be considered as unworthy of public trust or public honors, and be excluded therefrom accordingly.

If the majesty of the laws should be preserved inviolate in this respect, the operations of the proposed plan would foster a glorious public spirit, infuse the principles of energy and stability in the body politic, and give a high degree of political splendor to the national character.

ADDITIONAL MILITARY ACADEMY.

[Communicated to the House January 29, 1819.]
Letter from the Secretary of War to the Chairman of the Military Committee, on the subject of an additional Military Academy, and a School of Practice.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 15, 1819.

SIR: In reply to that part of your letter of the 20th of November, which requests my opinion on the expediency of establishing one or more additional military academies, and their places of location, and such other information and facts as I may deem proper to communicate on these subjects, with the probable annual expenses of these establishments, I have the honor to make the following statement:

Additional Military Academy.

The number of cadets now authorized by law is two hundred and fifty, who are divided into four classes; the cadets of one of which every year terminate their studies, and are promoted into the Army. As the academy is now nearly full, it is probable that the number which will annually terminate their studies, and, consequently, will be candidates for promotion, will not be much short of fifty. The number of vacancies in the Army which have occurred, from the 1st of August, 1816, to the 1st of May, 1818, has been one hundred and forty-eight, or about eighty-four per annum; but, as it is probable that the causes which have operated to produce so many vacancies in this time have been accidental and consequent on the change from active service to the inactivities of a peace establishment, there will not, it is believed, in future, be so many; and that the cadets who will annually terminate their studies at West Point, will be equal, or nearly so, to the annual average vacancies. In this view of the subject, an additional military academy would not now be required. But it seems to me that the question ought not to be determined by a reference simply to the wants of our military peace establishment, which, from our geographical position, and the policy of our Government, will always bear a small proportion to the population of the country, and to our military establishment in time of war. So far from graduating the number or extent of our military academies by the wants of the Army in time of peace, the opposite principle would, probably, be more correct; that, in proportion as our regular military establishment is small, the Government ought to be careful to disseminate, by education, a knowledge of the art of war. The Army itself is a practical school of this art, which, except in the higher branches, may, where it bears a large proportion to the population of the country supersede other modes of perpetuating or disseminating this indispensable art. But, in a country situated as ours is, with a small standing army, and far removed from any Power from which we have much to fear, the important knowledge of the art of defending our shores, will, in a long peace, without the particular patronage of the Government, be nearly lost. The establishment of military academies is the cheapest and safest mode of procuring and perpetuating this knowledge. The Government ought to furnish the means to those who are willing to bestow their time to acquire it. The cadets who cannot be provided for in the Army will return to private life; but, in the event of war, their knowledge will not be lost to the country. The Government may then avail itself of their military science, and, though they may not be practically acquainted with all the details of duty in an army, they will acquire it in a much shorter time than those who have not had the advantage of a military education. No truth is better supported by history than that, other things being nearly equal, victory will be on the side of those who have the best instructed officers. The duties of a soldier are few and simple, and, with well instructed officers, they can be acquired in a short time, as our own experience, and that of other countries has satisfactorily proved. To form competent officers, in the present improved state of the art of war, is much more difficult; as an officer, besides a knowledge of the duties belonging to the soldier, has others of a more difficult nature to acquire, and which can only be acquired by long experience, or by a regular military education.

With these views, I would recommend one additional military academy. It ought to be placed where it would mutually accommodate the Southern and Western portions of our country, which are the most remote from the present institution.

Besides an additional academy, I would submit, for the consideration of the committee, the propriety of establishing a school of practice, to be fixed near the Seat of Government. On this important subject I respectfully annex, as a part of this communication, a report from General Bernard and Colonel McRee, to this Department, in which the subject is so fully discussed as to supersede the necessity of any further observations.

The expenses of erecting the necessary buildings for an additional military academy, on a scale as extensive as that of West Point, would cost about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars, of which sum, however, but a small part would be required for this year. The current expenses of this institution would (excluding the pay of the cadets, which is sixteen dollars per month, and two rations per day,) probably amount to about twenty-two thousand dollars per annum.

For the school of practice there would be but little expense, except the erection of the necessary buildings for the accommodation of the institution. The pay of the superintendent and professors, should they be even taken from the citizens, would not exceed eight thousand five hundred dollars, which would constitute nearly the whole of the current expense, as the lieutenants of artillery and engineers, while at the institution, will not receive any additional pay or emoluments. The expense of the buildings may be estimated at eighty thousand dollars, of which, however, but a small part would be required for the present year.

I have the honor to be, &c.

J. C. CALHOUN.

Chairman Com. Military Affairs.

Considerations on the course of instruction necessary for the officers of the different arms of an Army.

Circumstances of locality, the nature of the operations of war, and the variety of the means employed for the purposes of destruction and preservation, have naturally led to the subdivision of an army into several parts, which differ in their manner of combating, but which are also intended to render reciprocal aid to each other, to co-operate most efficaciously to the same end, and to constitute, when in action, but one combined whole.

This subdivision existed among the ancients, as it does among the moderns; and with both, (the absolute and relative numerical force of these subdivisions being supposed nearly equal) the systems of war have been uniformly more perfect, and productive of greater results, in proportion as the several parts were better calculated to act with promptitude, precision, and in concert. These parts are designated in modern armies by the word arm; and consist of infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers. Each of these arms acts occasionally as principal or accessory. In a battle the infantry is, in general, the principal arm; while the three others are more or less accessories; in the pursuit of a retreating army, the cavalry becomes the principal; and in a siege, the artillery and engineers are the principal arms, and the rest are merely great auxiliaries.

Among the means which modern discipline employs to give the greatest effect to the combined action of these arms, is instruction. And here the same motives which have resorted to a subdivision of labor, as a powerful cause of perfection in objects of general industry, have also led to a subdivision of military instruction, as most productive of that concert and efficiency desirable in the operation of an army. This instruction, and the objects and advantages of its subdivision, are the subjects of present consideration.

To obtain, by the aid of military instruction, greater effect in the particular or combined employment of the different arms, two modes immediately present themselves: First, That each arm should be composed of individuals versed exclusively in the theory and practice of that arm; Second, That the individuals composing each arm should be instructed equally in the theory and practice of all other arms. The first of these methods is insufficient; because, in giving to each individual merely the knowledge necessary to the duties of his own arm, it leaves him deficient of what is necessary to connect the operations of that arm with the operations of the rest, as parts of one general system. The second is impracticable; because it is the privilege of but few individuals to possess that facility of intellect which is requisite to embrace four branches of knowledge as extensive as are those in question, and to practise them all with that correctness and promptitude which is the peculiar advantage of such as devote themselves principally to but one of these branches. In order to avoid both of these inconveniences, the theoretical and practical knowledge necessary in the conduct and operations of an army has been divided into two distinct classes: the one embracing whatever is common to all other arms; the other confined to what particularly appertains to each arm. A consequent and similar division has followed in the instruction; the first branch to include what is necessary and useful to the service of every arm; the second to include the theory and practice of each arm in particular. Hence the necessity of an elementary or common school, where the knowledge common to every arm should be given alike to all who are intended for the army; and a school of a higher order for the purpose of increasing, when necessary, the elementary knowledge which has previously been acquired to the extent demanded; and teaching its application to the particular objects and duties of each arm, which constitute a school of application. In those countries which have large military establishments, there is a school of application for each arm. But those nations who in time of peace kept but a feeble military force on foot, find it advantageous to unite, as far as possible, these different schools of application in one; where such as are admitted for the service of those arms which demand a more advanced theoretical, or more varied practical knowledge, receive their last degree of academical instruction. In this last case, the students at the school of application receive likewise two kinds of instruction: First, that which is common to the several arms to which they are destined; and, second, that which is exclusively necessary to the arm in which they are respectively to serve.

Among all nations possessing military academies, the schools of application for such as are destined for the infantry and cavalry, are the regiments of the army in which they are to serve. It is on joining and doing duty with their respective regiments, that they learn to apply the instruction received at the elementary school, and acquire whatsoever relates to the discipline, the conduct, administration, and legislation of troops.*

This cannot be the case, however, with those destined for the artillery and engineers, or the topographical corps. They are all more or less liable to be employed separately, and immediately after leaving the school; and are deprived of the advantages peculiar to the officer of infantry or cavalry, of making their first essays in their professional duties, under the eyes of their chiefs, or of those who have preceded them; and being unassisted by the advice or opinions of their superiors in rank, knowledge, and experience, they are not only left without the means of obtaining the instruction of which they are yet deficient, but are also frequently exposed in the execution of the duties confided to them, to compromise the public service by the commission of errors, which too often lead to irreparable misfortunes, and which are productive at least of a wasteful expenditure of public property, always beyond, sometimes exceeding a hundred fold the expense of giving a proper education to the individual who has not been qualified to exercise his profession with satisfaction to himself or utility to his country.

These considerations alone appear to us sufficient to show the advantage, if not necessity, of dividing the course of military instruction between two schools; the one elementary and the other a school of application.

The elementary school at West Point has hitherto been very inferior as such; and altogether inadequate to the objects for which it was established. A project has been presented, however, calculated to place this school upon the footing of the most perfect of the kind which exist. As to the school of application there is none. The degree of instruction given to the cadets at the school of West Point, has heretofore been for the most part limited to a general acquaintance with those branches of knowledge, which are common to all the arms of an army; and which ought to have been extended, and applied to artillery, fortification, and topography. The consequence has been, that the officers of infantry, artillery, engineers, and of the topographical corps, have had the same degree and kind of instruction; and the only real difference which existed between them on leaving the school, consisted in the uniform of their respective corps or regiments. If any have been so fortunate as to render themselves serviceable, either in the artillery or engineers, the cause must be sought for in their own industry, and not in the education received by them at West Point, which was barely sufficient to excite a desire for military inquiries and of military pursuits.

* In the military schools of infantry and cavalry in France, theoretical lessons in these branches of military instruction were given to the scholars; and, for the sake of uniformity in that instruction, these courses were very useful. The service of the despot served afterwards as a school of application.

It remains to enumerate the branches of knowledge which are common to all the arms; and those which are necessary, and appertain more or less exclusively to each or several of these arms. The subjoined table exhibits the two principal divisions of the instructions. The first part includes the branches of knowledge that are necessary to all who are destined for any arm of the military establishment; either as officers in the exercise of their immediate professional duties, or as men of information, liable, in the course of their military career, to be intrusted with other interests. It is, therefore, that the mathematics, for instance, are extended further than is strictly necessary to the officer of infantry; that natural and experimental philosophy and chemistry are inserted under the elementary division, rather as forming part of a liberal education than of mere military utility; and, finally, the several kinds of drawings are only taught in the elementary division, as an advantageous introduction to the prompt acquisition and exercise of the art of topographical delineations. This division, or elementary part of the instruction, will require five professors, three teachers, and two instructors. The number of assistants, &c. depends upon the number of individuals at the school.

The same table presents the second part of the instruction, which is in addition to the first, and is necessary to those destined to the engineers, artillery, or topographical corps. Here the mathematics are carried to a higher degree, which is rendered necessary by their application to machines, the theory of artillery, the construction of charts, &c. Descriptive geometry is applied to machines and fortification. Fortification is taught to the extent which is exclusively necessary to the officer of engineers; and artillery to the extent that is only required for the officers at that arm. Geometry and trigonometry receive their applications to topographical operations; and spherical trigonometry and descriptive geometry, to the projection, &c., of charts. This part of the instruction will demand four professors. Because, either these two divisions of the instruction will be taught at one school, or two separate schools. In the first case, the professors of the elementary course will be insufficient, and cannot attend to a course of instruction thus extended: in the second case, the four professors before mentioned become absolutely necessary. But whether the entire course (or both of these divisions of the instruction) shall be taught at the same, or at two separate schools, it will not be the less indispensable that a division of it, similar to that here established, should exist in fact. The question is, therefore, reduced to this: shall the elementary, or first part of the course of the instruction, be taught at West Point, and the second part at a separate school, to be established elsewhere? Or shall the second part constitute an additional class or classes, at the school of West Point, to consist of those cadets only who are destined for the engineers, artillery, and topographical corps, and who shall have previously passed through the elementary classes?

The second division of the course of instruction exhibited by the annexed table, and which must constitute either a school, or classes of application, is practical as well as theoretical. The application of the elementary branches of instruction, and the branches of mathematics, to the theory of artillery, fortification, and topography, forms the theoretical or academic part of the division of the course of instruction, while the application of these theories to the circumstances of the ground, &c., requires, and must be taught to the students, by a course of actual experiments, and practical exemplifications in the field. It is necessary to make this remark, in order to a just appreciation of all the considerations which should influence in the decision of the present question.

The advantages which may be derived from a union of the school of application, in the shape of additional classes, to the elementary school, are almost exclusively those of economy, and admit of being correctly ascertained; they consist—

1st. In having certain duties that are common and necessary to both establishments performed by the same individuals who are now employed for those purposes at West Point. Such are the duties of the superintendent, most of the officers of the military staff, and disbursing department.

2d. In the purchase of an additional site, which will be avoided.

3d. In saving the additional expense of quarters, academical, and any other buildings, to the extent that they now exist at West Point, beyond the wants of that establishment.

4th. In saving the expense of purchasing a library, instruments, &c., to the extent of those now on hand at West Point.

5. In saving the travelling and other expenses to which the graduates of the elementary school would be subjected, in order to join and commence their course at the school of application, if these institutions were separate; and,

Additional Military Academy.

6th. In avoiding a loss of time on the part of the graduates, which would take place on their transfer to the school of application in the case just supposed.

The following are the considerations which oppose a union, and which consequently urge a separation of these two schools.

1st. The classes of application will consist of those individuals destined for the artillery, engineers, and topographical corps, who shall have graduated at the termination of the elementary course of instruction, and who will consequently be then promoted, by brevet or otherwise, in the same manner as those destined for the infantry. There must probably be two classes of application; and the number of students of which they ought to consist, in order to supply the annual vacancies in their respective arms, will not be less than seventy. The school will, therefore, be augmented to this amount, and will be composed of commissioned officers and cadets, whose rights, interests, and occupations, will be more or less dissimilar; and who must, consequently, be governed by regulations, &c., essentially different, which will at once destroy that unity of system necessary to all military institutions.

2d. The difference in point of rank, in the students of the elementary classes, and those composing the classes of application, will originate claims to precedence and superiority on the one part, and resistance to such pretensions on the other, which no regulations can restrain within proper limits.

3d. It will be necessary to have two sets of professors at the same school, and in several instances two professors of the same department of science, who will be independent of each other. Hence, increased occasions of discord. Individual interest and feelings must of necessity, and frequently will be brought into collision; which experience has sufficiently proved, would lead, first to divisions among the academic staff, and finally to the formation of parties among the officers and cadets, destructive of that harmony and order which should prevail, and are believed essential to the successful operations of the school.

4th. The duties of the two sets of professors, the studies and occupations of the officers and cadets, being different in their character, and requiring to be arranged differently, as to time and other circumstances, will render two distinct systems of organization and police indispensable, which frequently cannot be made to accord, without incurring some inconvenience or injury, or without the sacrifice of some advantage on the part of one or the other division of the school, and perhaps of both. The superintendent will, in fact, have two schools to govern and conduct. His time and attention will, therefore, be divided, alternately occupied with the peculiar concerns of each, and frequently employed in reconciling conflicting interests. The whole system of administration for the two schools will be more or less controlled or influenced by the inconvenient and unnecessary relations in which they are placed to each other.

The advantages and disadvantages here enumerated, as attending the union of the two divisions of the course of military instruction, at the same school, are obviously too different in their kind to admit of being compared; nor is it necessary that they should be. The expense attending the separate establishment of a school of application might be offered as a reason for rejecting it altogether, but by no means for uniting it to the elementary school, when the operations of both would be obstructed in consequence of so doing, and their ultimate success rendered more than doubtful.

Among the advantages that will be derived from the establishment of a school of application, are the means it will afford of providing for other departments of national service, besides those which have been mentioned; and, by locating it immediately under the eyes of the Government, the measures necessary to enlarge, or to adapt it to the particular objects in view, will be more readily ascertained, and applied with greater certainty of effect. The necessity of this institution will become urgent, in the event of one or more additional elementary schools being created. It will then be expedient for those very reasons of economy which now form the only objections that can be opposed to it; and it will be necessary, because it will enable the respective candidates for the engineer, artillery, and topographical corps, to be assembled at the same school, and to receive, in common, their last degree of instruction; and because that by no other means can that uniformity in the instruction and duties of each of these arms be attained, which is essential to their perfection.

We are, therefore, of opinion, that a school of application is decidedly necessary to the military service of the country; that, to be rendered efficient, it ought to be separate from all immediate connexion with any other institution; and that it should have a central location, and as little removed as possible from under the observation of Government.

Which is respectfully submitted to the honorable J. C. Calhoun, Secretary of War.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 5, 1819.]

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 25th of last month, requesting me "to cause to be laid before it a copy of the rules and regulations adopted for the government of the Military Academy at West Point; also, how many cadets have been admitted into the Academy; the time of the residence of each cadet at that institution; and how many of them have been appointed officers in the Army and Navy of the United States," I transmit a report from the Secretary of War, which, with the accompanying documents, will afford all the information required by the said resolution.

If it would not be presumptuous in me to offer an improvement on the proposed plans of so excellent a judge as General Bernard, I would suggest that another course requiring another instructor for teaching military administration and legislation, an abstract of the American Constitution, of our militia laws, would be useful to all the young officers in the school; and more particularly so to the officers of infantry, than chemistry and natural philosophy.

† In addition to these lessons, I think the same instructor, who should be some experienced officer, might give some lessons of the service of the infantry in garrison and in the field, of daily discipline; and more particularly of the service of the light infantry and riflemen, adapted to Indian warfare, &c.

Military Academy at West Point.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, July 1, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to return the regulations defining a complete course of education, drawn up by the academical staff, and transmitted by you to this department, which has been approved, with such modifications as have been judged necessary, by the President.

From the age at which cadets are admitted into the Academy, the study of the English grammar is deemed indispensable to give them a correct and intimate knowledge of the structure of their own language.

Although a critical knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages is not considered essentially necessary, yet, where the cadets have studied those languages before their appointments, it is believed that the review of those languages during the last year of study will add to the reputation of the institution, and cannot fail to be useful to the cadets.

It is expected that the duties required by these additions will be performed by the chaplain employed in the Academy. The performance of these duties, it is hoped, will be an inducement with Congress, when this subject shall again be brought under their consideration, to make the appointment permanent, not only at West Point, but at such other establishment of that nature as shall be deemed necessary by that body.

If, in the opinion of the academical staff, these branches of education can be advantageously prosecuted at periods different from those fixed in the regulations, their suggestions will be attended to with pleasure.

The inducement to the other alterations will readily suggest itself to your mind. That a cadet, who having been thrown into a class below him, and subsequently in the course of his education finds himself placed in the same situation, will not be qualified for an engineer, may be readily conceived; but it by no means follows that he may not possess many of the qualifications of a general in a higher degree than some of those who greatly excel him in his studies. The absolute dismissal for that cause has, therefore, been changed into a reference to the War Department.

These regulations will apply to all cases where the cadet presents himself for admission after they are received at the Academy, notwithstanding their appointments may be of anterior date.

The regulation requiring the unmarried professors, teachers, and assistants to eat with the cadets, is believed to be conformable to the general usage of colleges, and ought not to be considered onerous. I understand, also, that Captain Partridge is himself a bachelor, and of course subject to the regulation. From his signing some of his acts as superintendent of the Academy, he may have supposed that he was not embraced by the rule. This, however, is a mistake. No officer, as long as the law remains as it is, can be the superintendent of the institution but the principal officer of the corps of engineers, or the next in command of that corps, in case of his absence. If, however, in your opinion, the proposition made by the academical staff to attend the mess-houses, and make daily reports of the fare, will protect the cadets from imposition, you are authorized to suspend the rule until further orders.

I have the honor, &c.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD.

Gen. JOSEPH G. SWIFT, New York.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY,
West Point, May 22, 1816.

The following branches of science and instruction shall be considered as comprising a complete course of education at the Military Academy at West Point, State of New York:

The English and French languages, and the review of the Latin and Greek languages, mathematics, military drawing, natural and experimental philosophy, including astronomy, engineering, geography, history, ethics, military instruction, and the sword exercises.

English language.—A course of English shall embrace English grammar and composition.

French language.—A course of French shall consist in pronouncing the language tolerably, and translating from French into English, and from English into French, with accuracy.

Latin and Greek languages.—A course of Latin and Greek shall embrace the review of the Latin and Greek authors usually taught in academies.

No cadet shall be compelled to study these languages who shall not have been taught them previously to his appointment.

Mathematics.—A complete course of mathematics shall embrace the following branches, viz: The nature and construction of logarithms and the use of the tables; algebra, to include the solution of cubic equations, with all the preceding rules; geometry, to include plane and solid geometry, also ratios and proportions, and the construction of geometrical problems; application of algebra to geometry; practical geometry on the ground; mensuration of planes and solids; plane trigonometry, with its application to surveying and measuring heights and distances; spherical trigonometry, with its application to the solution of spherical problems; the doctrine of infinite series; conic sections, with their application to military and other projectiles; fluxions, to be taught and studied at the option of the professor and student.

Drawing.—A complete course of drawing shall include the elementary drawing of figures; rules and practice of perspective plans and profiles of permanent fortifications; of every kind of field works; and, also, topographical plans.

Philosophy.—A complete course of philosophy shall embrace the following branches, viz: The principles of mechanics, with their general application; hydrostatics, hydraulics, pneumatics, optics; the elements of chemistry, electricity, magnetism, and astronomy.

Engineering.—A complete course of engineering shall embrace the following branches, viz: Military and civil architecture; permanent and field fortification; field works, generally; rules for the labor, time, and materials necessary for the construction of different kinds of works; also, rules for the construction of all the appendages necessary in field works; the construction of mines and fougasses, and the different modes of attacking and defending fortified places; also, castrametation.

Geography.—A complete course of geography shall embrace the solution of the several problems of the spheres, usually prefixed to the systems of geography, by means of the globe. A knowledge of the grand divisions of the earth; of the extent, boundaries, and relative situations of the several countries situated in each of these grand divisions; embracing, likewise, a knowledge of their natural productions, commerce, manufactures, government, naval and military strength, relative importance, and the use of the maps, &c.

History.—A complete course of history shall embrace a course of universal history; the history of America generally; the history of the American Revolutionary war, &c.; the history of the United States, or such particular States as the professor in that department shall judge proper.

Ethics.—A course of ethics shall include the elements of moral science, also of natural and political law.

Military instruction.—A complete course of military instruction shall embrace a general course of tactics; a knowledge of infantry duty, to commence with the elementary drill of the soldier, and to include the discipline and police of the battalion and platoon in all their parts; a knowledge of artillery duty, including the artillery drill; practical gunnery; and, also, all the performance of all the regular duties of the camp.

Sword exercise.—Under the sword exercise shall be included the broad sword exercise, and the cut and thrust, or small sword, either or both, according to circumstances.

Assignment of duties.—Each professor and instructor shall be limited in the discharge of his official duties to his own department, and not to interfere with any other department. Each professor and teacher, at the head of a separate department, shall be the judge of the proper mode of conveying instruction in his own department, and shall be held responsible for the correctness of this mode.

Division of time.—To complete the preceding course of studies will require four years. The branches to be pursued, and the course to be completed in each year, shall be as follows:

First year.—The course of the first year shall embrace English grammar and composition, and the French language, logarithms, algebra, and plane geometry, to include ratios and proportions.

Second year.—The course of the second year shall embrace a continuation of the French language; the geometry of planes and solids, and the construction of geometrical problems; the application of algebra to geometry, and the mensuration of planes and solids; plane and spherical trigonometry, with their applications; conic sections; practical geometry and drawing.

Third year.—A course for the third year shall embrace natural and experimental philosophy, astronomy, engineering, and drawing continued.

Fourth year.—A course for the fourth year shall embrace geography, history, and ethics, the review of the English grammar, and of the Latin and Greek languages; also, a general review of the most important branches in each of the departments.

Rules for classification.—The cadets at the Military Academy shall constitute four classes. All the cadets who are admitted as members of the academy in each year shall constitute the first lower class. If, however, at the general examination next ensuing the time of admission, it shall appear that any cadet is sufficiently advanced in his studies, he may be admitted into the next higher class. On the contrary, if, at either of the general examinations, any cadet shall be found unqualified to proceed with his class, he shall be put back into the next lower class. No intermediate classes will, in any case, be allowed.

Qualifications necessary for admission.—Each cadet, previous to his being admitted a member of the Military Academy, must be able to read distinctly and pronounce correctly; to write a fair legible hand; and to perform with facility and accuracy the various operations of the ground rules of arithmetic, both simple and compound; of the rules of reduction of single and compound proportion, and also of vulgar and decimal fractions.

Promiscuous regulations.—1st. Every cadet, when he shall have completed the foregoing course of studies, shall be entitled to his diploma signed by the academic staff, agreeably to law and existing regulations.

2d. The military instruction of the cadet shall be under the immediate direction of the superintendent of the academy, and shall be attended to at such times as will interfere the least with their other academic duties.

3d. The particular course of studies to be completed by the classes, between the general examinations in each year, shall be determined by the superintendent and academic staff, in such manner as experience shall point out to be the most conducive to the interests of the institution.

4th. Any cadet who shall have been reduced to a lower class, and shall, upon a second examination, be found unqualified to advance with this class to the next higher grade, shall, unless he shall have been prevented from attending to his studies by sickness, necessary absence, or some other evident necessity, be reported to the Secretary of the Department of War by the academic staff, stating the branches of science in which he is most deficient, those in which he has made the greatest proficiency, as well as the general inclination, temper, and habits, which appear to predominate in his actions; and especially whether his dominant propensities impel him to the profession of arms. Upon this report he shall be dismissed, or retained, at the will of the President.

5th. The superintendent of the academy and the academic staff shall be at liberty to propose to the Secretary of War such alterations and amendments to the foregoing course of studies as they shall, at any time, conjointly deem necessary for the good of the institution; the whole, or a majority of them, agreeing to such alterations and amendments.

6th. Should it be found, by experience, that too large a portion of study or instruction is assigned in the preceding course of studies to any particular year, the superintendent and academic staff conjointly shall be at liberty to transfer, from the course of one year to that of another, such particular portions of study or instruction as may appear necessary to produce an equality; the whole, or a majority of them, agreeing to such transfer.

The foregoing course of studies and instructions is respectfully submitted to the honorable Secretary of War.

Rules with respect to the promotion of cadets of the United States Military Academy.

1. That, in the governmental promotion of the cadets, the lineal rank of each graduating class shall be established in conformity to the principle of general merit, as ascertained by a competent board of examiners.

2. That the distribution of cadets to the several corps of the army at the time of promotion, shall be made according to their particular talents and qualifications ascertained in like manner; provided, that this distribution be allowed, in no instance, to interfere with the principle of rank according to general merit.

3. No cadet to be promoted from the academy until he shall have completed his course of studies at the same, and received the diploma of the academic staff to that effect.

4. No cadet who shall resign his warrant, or otherwise be separated from the academy, before the completion of his studies, shall, on any account, receive an appointment in the Army of the United States, until after the promotion of the class to which he belonged; nor then, if such appointment interfere in the smallest degree with the rank of any member of that class.

5. No cadet who shall be dismissed from the institution, or compelled to resign on account of idleness, neglect of duty, or any species of bad conduct, shall be eligible to any office or post in the Army of the United States, until at least five years after the promotion of the class to which he belonged.

ROADS AND CANALS.—REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

[Communicated to the House, January 14, 1819.]

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Jan. 7, 1819.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 4th of April, 1818, instructing the Secretary of War to report to that House, at their next session, "a plan for the application of such means as are within the power of Congress for the purpose of opening and constructing such roads and canals as may deserve and require the aid of Government, with a view to military operations in time of war; the transportation of munitions of war; and also a statement of the works of the nature above-mentioned which have been commenced, the progress which has been made, and the means and prospect of their completion; together with such information as, in the opinion of the Secretary, shall be material in relation to the objects of the resolution," I have the honor to make the following report:

A judicious system of roads and canals, constructed for the convenience of commerce and the transportation of the mail only, without any reference to military operations, is itself among the most efficient means for "the more complete defence of the United States." Without advertent to the fact, that the roads and canals which such a system would require are, with few exceptions, precisely those which would be required for the operations of war, such a system, by consolidating our Union, increasing our wealth and fiscal capacity, would add greatly to our resources in war. It is in a state of war when a nation is compelled to put all of its resources, in men, money, skill, and devotion to country, into requisition, that its Government realizes, in its security, the beneficial effects from a people made prosperous and happy by a wise direction of its resources in peace. But I forbear to pursue this subject, though so interesting, and which, the further it is pursued, will the more clearly establish the intimate connexion between the defence and safety of the country and its improvement and prosperity, as I do not conceive that it constitutes the immediate object of this report.

There is no country to which a good system of military roads and canals is more indispensable than to the United States. As great as our military capacity is, when compared with the number of our people, yet, when considered in relation to the vast extent of our country, it is very small; and, if so great an extent of territory renders it very difficult to conquer us, as has been frequently observed, it ought not to be forgotten that it renders it no less difficult for the Government to afford protection to every portion of the community. In the very nature of things, the difficulty of protecting every part, so long as our population bears so small a proportion to the extent of the country, cannot be entirely overcome; but it may be very greatly diminished by a good system of military roads and canals. The necessity of such a system is still more apparent if we take into consideration the character of our political maxims and institutions. Opposed in principle to a large standing army, our main reliance for defence must be on the militia, to be called out frequently from a great distance, and under the pressure of an actual invasion. The experience of the late war amply proves, in the present state of our internal improvements, the delay, the uncertainty, the anxiety, and exhausting effects of such calls. The facts are too recent to require details, and the impression too deep to be soon forgotten. As it is the part of wisdom to profit by experience, so it is of the utmost importance to prevent a recurrence of a similar state of things, by the application of a portion of our means to the construction of such roads and canals as are required "with a view to military operations in time of war, the transportation of the munitions of war, and more complete defence of the United States."

In all questions of military preparation, three of our frontiers require special attention; the Eastern or Atlantic frontier; the Northern, or the Canadian frontier; and the Southern, or the frontier of the Gulf of Mexico. On the West and Northwest we are secure, except against Indian hostilities; and the only military preparations required in that quarter, are such as are necessary to keep the Indian tribes in awe, and to protect the frontier from their ravages. All of our great military efforts, growing out of a war with an European Power, must, for the present, be directed towards our Eastern, Northern, or Southern frontiers; and the roads and canals which will enable the Government to concentrate its means for defence, promptly and cheaply, on the vulnerable points of either of those frontiers, are those which in a military point of view, require the aid of Government. I propose to consider each of those frontiers separately, beginning with the Atlantic, which, in many respects, is the weakest and most exposed.

From the mouth of St. Croix to that of St. Marys, the two extremes of this frontier, is a distance, along the line of the coast and principal bays, without following their sinuosities, of about two thousand one hundred miles. On this line, including its navigable rivers and bays, are situated our most populous cities, the great depots of the wealth and commerce of the country. That portion of it which extends to the south of the Chesapeake has, with the exceptions of the cities and their immediate neighborhood, a sparse population, with a low marshy country, extending back from 100 to 150 miles. To the north of the Chesapeake, inclusive, it affords, everywhere, deep and bold navigable bays and rivers, which readily admit vessels of any size. Against a line so long, so weak, so exposed, and presenting such strong motives for depredations, hostilities the most harassing and exhausting may be carried on by a naval Power; and, should the subjugation of the country ever be attempted, it is probable that against this frontier, facing Europe, the seat of the great Powers of the world, the principal efforts would be turned. Thus circumstanced, it is the duty of the Government to render it as secure as possible. For much of this security we ought to look to a navy, and a judicious and strong system of fortifications; but not to the neglect of such roads and canals as will enable the Government to concentrate, promptly and cheaply, at any point which may be menaced, the necessary force and means for defence.

To resist ordinary hostilities, having for their object the destruction of our towns and the exhaustion of our means, the force ought to be drawn from the country lying between the coasts and the sources of the principal rivers which discharge through it into the ocean; but, to resist greater efforts, aiming at conquest, should it ever be attempted, the force and resources of the whole community must be brought into resistance. To concentrate, then, a sufficient force, on any point of this frontier which may be invaded, troops must be marched, and munitions of war transported, either along the line of the coast, or from the interior of the Atlantic States to the coast, or, should the invading force be of such magnitude as to require it, from the Western States; and the roads and canals necessary for the defence of this frontier are those which will render these operations prompt, certain, and economical.

From the coast to the Alleghany mountains and the high land separating the streams which enter into the St. Lawrence from those of the Atlantic, in which the principal Atlantic rivers take their rise, the distance may be averaged at about 250 miles; and the whole extent, from the St. Marys to the St. Croix, is intersected, at short intervals, by large navigable rivers and the principal roads of this portion of our country, through which its great commercial operations are carried on. These, aided by the steamboats, now introduced on almost all of our great rivers, present great facilities to collect the militia from the interior, and to transport the necessary supplies and munitions of war.

Much undoubtedly remains to be done to perfect the roads and improve the navigation of the rivers; but this, for the most part, may be safely left to the States and the commercial cities particularly interested, as the appropriate objects of their care and exertions. The attention of both have recently been much turned towards these objects, and a few years will probably add much to facilitate the intercourse between the coast and the interior of the Atlantic States. Very different is the case with the great and important line of communication, extending along the coast, through the Atlantic States. No object of the kind is more important; and there is none to which State or individual capacity is more inadequate. It must be perfected by the General Government, or not perfected at all, at least for many years. No one or two States have a sufficient interest. It is immediately beneficial to more than half of the States of the Union, and, without the aid of the General Government, would require their co-operation. It is, at all times, a most important object to the nation; and, in a war with a naval Power, is almost indispensable to our military, commercial, and financial operations. It may, in a single view, be considered the great artery of the country; and, when the coasting trade is suspended by war, the vast intercourse between the North and South, which annually requires five hundred thousand tons of shipping, and which is necessary to the commerce, the agriculture, and manufactures of more than half of the Union, seeks this channel of communication. If it were thoroughly opened by land and water; if Louisiana were connected, by a durable and well finished road, with Maine; and Boston with Savannah, by a well established line of inland navigation, for which so many facilities are presented, more than half of the pressure of war would be removed. A country so vast in its means, and abounding, in its various latitudes, with almost all the products of the globe, is a world of itself; and, with that facility of intercourse, to perfect which, the disposable means of the country is adequate, would flourish and prosper under the pressure of a war with any Power. But, dropping this more elevated view, and considering the subject only as it regards "military operations in time of war, and the transportation of the munitions of war," what could contribute so much as this communication to the effectual and cheap defence of our Atlantic frontier? Take the line of inland navigation along the coast, the whole of which, it is estimated, could be completed, for sea vessels; by digging one hundred miles, and at the expense of $3,000,000, the advantage which an enemy with a naval force now has, by rapidly moving along the coast, and harassing and exhausting the country, would be in a great measure lost to him. In fact, the capacity for rapid and prompt movements and concentration, would be, to the full, as much in our power. We would have, in most of the points of attack, a shorter line to move over, in order to concentrate our means; and, aided by steamboats, would have the capacity to pass it in a shorter time, and with greater certainty, than what an enemy, even with a naval superiority, would have, to attack us. Suppose the fleet of such an enemy should appear off the Capes of Delaware; before it could possibly approach and attack Philadelphia, information, by telegraphic communication, might be given to Baltimore and New York, and the forces stationed there thrown in for its relief. The same might take place if Baltimore or New York should be invaded; and, should an attack be made on any of our cities, the militia and regular forces, at a great distance along the coast, could, in a short time, be thrown in for its relief. By this speedy communication, the regular forces, with the militia of the cities and their neighborhood, would be sufficient to repel ordinary invasions, and would either prevent, or greatly diminish, the harassing calls upon the militia of the interior. If to these considerations we add the character of the southern position of the Atlantic frontier, so fatal to those whose constitutions are not inured to it, the value of this system of defence, by the regular troops and the militia accustomed to the climate, will be greatly enhanced. Should this line of inland navigation be constructed, to enjoy its benefits fully, it will be necessary to cover it against the naval operations of an enemy. It is thought that this may be easily effected, to the south of the Chesapeake, by land and steam batteries. That bay is itself one of the most important links in this line of communication; and its defence against a naval force ought, if practicable, to be rendered complete. It was carefully surveyed, the last Summer, by skilful officers, for this purpose in part, and it is expected that their report will throw much light upon this important subject. Long Island Sound, another part of the line which is exposed, can be fully defended by a naval force only.

It remains, in relation to the defence of the Atlantic frontier, to consider the means of communication between it and the Western States, which require the aid of the Government. Most of the observations made relative to the increased strength and capacity of the country to bear up under the pressure of war, from the coastwise communication, are applicable in a high degree at present, and are daily becoming more so, to those with the Western States; and should a war for conquest ever be waged against us, an event not probable, but not to be laid entirely out of view, the roads and canals necessary to complete the communication with that portion of our country would be of the utmost importance.

The interest of commerce, and the spirit of rivalry between the great Atlantic cities, will do much to perfect the means of intercourse with the West. The most important lines of communication appear to be from Albany to the Lakes; from Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and Richmond, to the Ohio river; and from Charleston and Augusta, to the Tennessee; all of which are now commanding the attention, in a greater or less degree, of the sections of the country immediately interested. But in such great undertakings, so interesting in every point of view to the whole Union, and which may ultimately become necessary to its defence, the expense ought not to fall wholly on the portions of the country more immediately interested. As the Government has a deep stake in them, and as the system of defence will not be perfect without their completion, it ought at least to bear a proportional share of the expense of their construction.

I proceed next to consider the roads and canals connected with the defence of our Northern frontier. That portion of it which extends to the east of Lake Champlain has not heretofore been the scene of extensive military operations; and I am not sufficiently acquainted with the nature of the country, to venture an opinion whether we may hereafter be called on to make considerable military efforts in that quarter. Without, then, designating any military improvements, as connected with this portion of our Northern frontier, I would suggest the propriety, should Congress approve of the plan for a military survey of the country to be hereafter proposed, to make a survey of it the duty of the engineers who may be designated for that purpose.

For the defence of the other part of this line of frontier, the most important objects are, a canal or water communication between Albany and

Report on Roads and Canals.

Lake George, and Lake Ontario, and between Pittsburgh and Lake Erie. The two former have been commenced by the State of New York, and will, when completed, connected with the great inland navigation along the coast, enable the Government, at a moderate expense, and in a short time, to transport munitions of war, and to concentrate its troops from any portion of the Atlantic States, fresh and unexhausted by the fatigue of marching on the inland frontier of the State of New York. The road commenced, by order of the Executive, from Plattsburg to Sackett's Harbor, is essentially connected with military operations on this portion of the Northern frontier. A water communication from Pittsburgh to Lake Erie, would greatly increase our power on the upper Lakes. The Alleghany river, by its main branch, is said to be navigable within seven miles of Lake Erie, and by French creek, within sixteen miles. Pittsburgh is the great military depot of the country to the west of the Alleghany, and, if it were connected by a canal with Lake Erie, would furnish military supplies with facility to the upper lakes, as well as to the country watered by the Mississippi. If to these communications we add a road from Detroit to Ohio, which has already been commenced, and a canal from the Illinois river to Lake Michigan, which the growing population of the State of Illinois renders very important, all the facilities which would be essential "to carry on military operations in the time of war, and the transportation of the munitions of war" for the defence of the western portion of our Northern frontier, would be afforded.

It only remains to consider the system of roads and canals connected with the defence of our Southern frontier, or that on the Gulf of Mexico. For the defence of this portion of our country, though at present weak of itself, nature has done much. The bay of Mobile, and the entrance into the Mississippi through all of its channels, are highly capable of defence. A military survey has been made, and the necessary fortifications have been commenced, and will be in a few years completed. But the real strength of this frontier is the Mississippi, which is no less the cause of its security than that of its commerce and wealth. Its rapid stream, aided by the force of steam, can, in the hour of danger, concentrate at once an irresistible force. Made strong by this noble river, little remains to be done by roads and canals, for the defence of our Southern frontier. The continuation of the road along the Atlantic coast, from Milledgeville to New Orleans, and the completion of the road which has already been commenced from Tennessee river to the same place, with the inland navigation through the canal of Carondelet, Lake Pontchartrain, and the islands along the coast of Mobile, covered against the operations of a naval force, every facility required for the transportation of munitions of war, and movement and concentration of troops, to protect this distant and important frontier, would be afforded.

Such are the roads and canals which military operations in time of war, the transportation of the munitions of war, and the more complete defence of the United States, require.

Many of the roads and canals which have been suggested, are no doubt of the first importance to the commerce, the manufactures, the agriculture, and political prosperity of the country; but are not, for that reason, less useful or necessary for military purposes. It is, in fact, one of the great advantages of our country, enjoying so many others, that, whether we regard its internal improvements in relation to military, civil, or political purposes, very nearly the same system, in all its parts, is required. The road or canal can scarcely be designated, which is highly useful for military operations, which is not equally required for the industry or political prosperity of the community. If those roads or canals had been pointed out, which are necessary for military purposes only, the list would have been small indeed. I have, therefore, presented all, without regarding the fact that they might be employed for other uses, which, in the event of war, would be necessary to give economy, certainty, and success to our military operations; and which, if they had been completed before the late war, would, by their saving in that single contest, in men, money, and reputation, have more than indemnified the country for the expense of their construction. I have not prepared an estimate of expenses, nor pointed out the particular routes for the roads or canals recommended, as I conceive that this can be ascertained with satisfaction only by able and skilful engineers, after a careful survey and examination.

I would, therefore, respectfully suggest, as the basis of the system, and the first measure in the "plan for the application of such means as are in the power of Congress," that Congress should direct such a survey and estimate to be made, and the result to be laid before them as soon as practicable. The expense would be inconsiderable; for, as the army can furnish able military and topographical engineers, it would be principally confined to the employment of one or more skilful civil engineers, to be associated with them. By their combined skill, an efficient system of military roads and canals would be presented in detail, accompanied with such estimates of expenses as may be relied on. Thus full and satisfactory information would be had; and though some time might be lost in the commencement of the system, it would be more than compensated by its assured efficiency when completed.

For the construction of the roads and canals, which Congress may choose to direct, the army, to a certain extent, may be brought in aid of the moneyed resources of the country. The propriety of employing the army on works of public utility cannot be doubted. Labor adds to its usefulness and health. A mere garrison life is equally hostile to its vigor and discipline. Both officers and men become the subjects of its deleterious effects. But when the vast extent of our country is compared with the extent of our military establishments, and taking into consideration the necessity of employing the soldiers on fortifications, barracks, and roads, connected with remote frontier posts, we ought not to be sanguine in the expectation of aid to be derived from the army in the construction of permanent military roads and canals, at a distance from the frontiers. When our military posts come to be extended up the Mississippi and Missouri, as far as is contemplated, the military frontier of the United States, not including sinuosities, and the coasts of navigable bays and lakes opening into our country, as was stated in a former report, will present a line of more than nine thousand miles, and, including them, of more than eleven thousand. Thinly scattered along so extensive a frontier, it will be impossible, I fear, without having some points exposed, to collect any considerable bodies in the interior of the country, to construct roads and canals.

As connected with this subject, I would respectfully suggest the propriety of making an adequate provision for the soldiers, while regularly and continually employed in constructing works of public utility. The present allowance is fifteen cents a day, which is considered sufficient in occasional fatigue duty, such as is now done at most of the posts; but if systematic employ, on permanent works, should be made the regular duty of the soldiers who can be spared for that purpose, a compensation, taking into the estimate the obligation of the Government to provide medical attendance and pensions to the deceased and disabled soldiers, not much short of the wages of daily labor ought to be granted to them. Without such provision, which is dictated by justice, an increase of desertion and difficulty in obtaining recruits ought to be expected. Among the leading inducements to enlist is the exemption from labor; and, if the life of a soldier should be equally subject to it as that of other citizens in the same grade, he will prefer, if the wages are much inferior, to labor for himself to laboring for the public. The pay of a soldier is sixty dollars per annum; and if he were allowed, when employed permanently on fatigue, twenty-five cents a day, and suppose him to be employed two hundred days in the year, his compensation, including his pay, would be $110 per annum—a sum, it is thought, considerably short of the average wages of labor. If this sum should be allowed, the greater portion of it ought to be paid at the expiration of the term of enlistment. If fifteen cents a day were so reserved, and the soldier should be employed one thousand days in the five years for which he is enlisted, it would constitute a sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid at the expiration of his term, which ought, in the same manner as the bounty land, be made to depend on an honorable discharge. This would furnish an important hold on the fidelity of the soldier, and would be a powerful check to the great and growing crime of desertion. An honorable discharge is now worth but little to the soldier, and the consequence is, that desertions are more frequent with those enlisted since the war, than those who were then enlisted, and are entitled to the bounty in land on their honorable discharge. The latter patiently awaits the expiration of his term of service, while the former frequently seizes the first favorable opportunity for desertion.

Should Congress think proper to commence a system of roads and canals for the "more complete defence of the United States," the disbursement of the sums appropriated for the purpose might be made by the Department of War, under direction of the President. Where incorporate companies are already formed, or the road or canal commenced under the superintendence of a State, it perhaps would be advisable to direct a subscription on the part of the United States, on such terms and conditions as might be thought proper. In other cases, and where the army cannot be made to execute it, the work ought to be done by contract, under the superintendence and inspection of officers of the engineer corps, to be detailed for that purpose. It is thus the Government will be able, it is thought, to construct upon terms at least as favorable as corporate companies. The system of constructing all public works, which admit of it, by contract, would be attended with important advantages. It has recently been adopted in the construction of fortifications, and it is expected will be attended with beneficial results. The principal works at Mobile and New Orleans have been contracted for on terms considerably under the estimates of the engineers. Such a system, extended to military roads and canals, combined with a careful inspection and superintendence by skilful engineers, will enable the Government to complete them with economy, durability, and despatch.

In the view which has been taken I have thought it improper, under the resolution of the House, to discuss the Constitutional question, or how far the system of internal improvements which has been presented may be carried into effect on the principle of our Government; and, therefore, the whole of the arguments which are used, and the measures proposed, must be considered as depending on the decision of that question.

The only military roads which have been commenced are from Plattsburg to Sackett's Harbor, through the Chateaugay country; from the southern boundary of the State of Tennessee, and crossing the Tennessee river near the Muscle Shoals, to Madisonville, Louisiana; and from Detroit to Fort Meigs, at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami of the Lakes. Documents marked A, B, C, show the progress which have been made. These roads have been commenced, and thus far completed by the labor of the soldiers, who, while they are so employed, receive fifteen cents per day, with an extra allowance of a gill of whiskey. The labor of the troops is the only means within the reach of the Department of completing these roads; and, as the troops are so employed, only when they are not engaged in active service, it is impossible to state, with accuracy, when the roads will be completed.

HEADQUARTERS, BROWNSVILLE,
December 6, 1818.

Sir: Your letter, covering a copy of one of the 11th of August, calling for a report of the labor performed on the road leading from Sackett's Harbor, through the Chateaugay country, is before me.

My letter of the 29th of November will inform you what has been done, but I fear will not exhibit the progress of this work to the extent you have expected. It may, therefore, be proper to state, in this place, that when the President, in the Autumn of 1817, directed the road in question to be opened and improved, I did not understand that the second regiment were to be ordered from the duty they were then upon. This regiment, at the time referred to, were employed, enclosing with pickets the public ground at Sackett's Harbor, and that duty occupied them the remainder of the season. Expecting the troops at the Harbor would have been employed in completing the barracks at that place this year, they were not put upon the road, but allowed to be engaged in improving the public grounds for gardens; and, as these grounds were new, it required much labor to put them in good condition.

These causes, and the reasons assigned in my letters from this place and Plattsburg, produced the delay that has occurred in putting Colonel Brady's command upon the road, and, if your letter of the 11th of August had not been received upon my return to this place, I fear that this work would not yet have commenced.

I pray you to believe, that I regret the delay, and I beg you to see good cause for it in the reasons I have endeavored to assign.

It is due to the command of Colonel Brady and Colonel Atkinson to say, that they have discovered not only a becoming cheerfulness in obeying the orders received for perfecting the Plattsburg and Sackett's Harbor road, but much zeal in the performance of this duty, and, if these regiments are continued upon this important work the next season, more than double the length of way will be completed, that has been passed the last and the present year.

With respect, I have the honor to be, &c., JAC. BROWN.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,

HEADQ'RS, DIVISION OF THE SOUTH,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Nashville, Sept. 19, 1818.

Sir: On the eve of setting out for the Chickasaw Territory, I deem it necessary to inform you that no reports have been received as yet, of a particular character, in relation to the military road now opening from Columbia, Tennessee, to Madisonville; but I am enabled to inform you, officially, that fifty miles have been completed by the troops on the lower part of the road, making many causeways and bridges of the most durable materials; and the detachment on this end have progressed about forty miles south of the Tennessee river, making in like manner many bridges and causeways.

It is considered that the most laborious part of the road has been completed; and, from every information, it has been done in the best manner. An increase of men has been recently afforded to the detachment south of Tennessee river, which enables it to progress with much greater facility.

Should I receive minute reports shortly, I shall communicate their contents without delay.

And have the honor to be, &c.,
ROBERT BUTLER,
Adjutant General.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN,

HEADQUARTERS, DETROIT,
November 2, 1819.

Sir: I have the honor to report that the military way, directed to be opened from this place to the Rapids of the Miami, has progressed as far as the Eight Mile Creek, that is, within eight miles of the Rapids, making in all a distance of seventy miles. The road is truly a magnificent one, being eighty feet wide, cleared of all the logs and underbush, every low place causewayed, and all the creeks and rivers requiring it bridged in a substantial manner. The number of causeways exceeds sixty, and the bridges are of considerable length. The one on which the troops are now employed is four hundred and fifty feet in length, constructed of strong oak framed work. It was found impossible to complete the road to the Rapids this season, on account of the time and labor required in throwing bridges over the larger streams: it was also deemed more essential to complete the bridges, than cut the road this season to the Rapids, as the road would be useless without the means of crossing the large streams.

The officers and soldiers who have been employed in this service deserve much credit for the zeal and perseverance they have displayed on this occasion. The work they have performed has proved highly beneficial, both to the people of the country and of the Government. Besides greatly adding to the defence and strength of this frontier, the road has been the means of developing the richness of the public lands in this Territory, and greatly augmenting their value.

As soon as Major Anderson, topographical engineer, can complete the survey of the road, a more minute and particular description of the work will be forwarded.

I have the honor to be, &c.,
ALEX. MACOMB.

Trade with the Indians.

INDIAN TRADE.

Report from the War Department.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
December 5, 1818.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 4th of April, 1818, directing the Secretary of War to prepare and report, at their next session, "a system providing for the abolition of the existing Indian trade establishments of the United States, and providing for the opening of the trade with the Indians to individuals, under suitable regulations," I have the honor to make the following report:

The nations of Indians who inhabit this portion of our continent were, on its first discovery, in a state of the most perfect commercial independence. Their knowledge of the useful arts was, indeed, very limited; but it was commensurate with their wants and desires. With their rude implements of husbandry, their hook, and bow, in the construction of which they were well instructed, they drew a scanty, but for them a sufficient supply from the soil, the water, and the forest. A great change has since taken place, such as appears to be inevitable, by a fixed law of nature, in the intercourse between a civilized and savage people. Helplessness has succeeded independence. While their wants have been greatly multiplied and enlarged, by their intercourse with their more civilized neighbors, their knowledge even of their former rude arts has been lost, without acquiring those which are necessary in their new condition. The manufacture of the axe and the hoe, by which they now clear and cultivate the soil, and the gun and ammunition, by which they take their game, are far above their skill; and with the exhaustion of the present stock, without a new supply, they would be reduced to extreme want. On trade, then, with those from whom they can draw these and other supplies, they are wholly dependent. We have the exclusive right to trade with those within our limits; and cut off, as the southern tribes are, by our acquisition in the late war, from intercourse with foreigners on the side of the Gulf of Mexico, we have the means, by a proper extension of our posts, on the Lakes, the Mississippi, and the Missouri, (to effect which measures have already been taken,) to enforce effectually, without much additional expense, this important right. The period seems, then, to have arrived, to give to our control over the Indians, through an exclusive supply of their wants, the greatest efficiency; and to promote theirs and our interest, by a judicious system of trade, fairly and justly directed.

A similar view of this branch of our trade seems to have been taken at an early period by our Government. It directed its attention to this interesting and important subject, as early as the year 1775, when a committee was appointed by Congress to devise a plan for carrying on trade with the Indians. In the next year a very considerable purchase of goods was directed to be made for the Indian trade; and trade with them, except under license or bond, was strictly prohibited. The subject was frequently acted on during the Confederation; but no systematic effort was made to regulate it till 1786, when an ordinance was passed, dividing the Indian department into two districts, and appointing a superintendent, with a deputy to each. It was made their duty to execute such regulations as Congress might establish in relation to Indian affairs; to correspond with the Secretary of War, through whom their communications were directed to be made to Congress; to obey the instructions of the War Department; and to grant license to trade with Indians. This ordinance directed that no license should be granted to foreigners, and only to citizens whose good moral character should be certified by the Governor of a State, under the seal of the State, and that bonds should be given to conform to established regulations. Licenses were granted, to continue in force for one year only, and upon the payment of fifty dollars. To trade without license incurred a penalty of five hundred dollars, and forfeiture of goods. The superintendents and their deputies were prohibited from engaging in trade.

The change in the form of the Government, a few years after the passing of this ordinance, and the debility into which public affairs fell, about the termination of the Confederation, prevented this judicious system from being carried into effect.

Under the present Constitution, the subject of Indian trade attracted the attention of Congress, as early as the year 1790. The system of trade by licenses was retained: they were directed to be granted for two years, by persons to be appointed by the President, to applicants of good character, who gave bonds to conform to regulations; and trading without license was subjected to a forfeiture of merchandise. The act contains no prohibitions to foreigners, and requires nothing to be paid for the licenses. In the years 1793 and 1796, acts were passed, very similar in their provisions to the one just recited; and in the year 1802, an act repealing former acts, and which still continues in force, was passed. It inflicts a fine of one hundred dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, in addition to the forfeiture of goods, for trading without license; and directs licenses to be granted on bond, with sufficient security to conform to law and regulations, without making a good character or citizenship a requisite.

By an act of 1816, the last passed on this subject, foreigners are prohibited from trading with the Indians, except permitted by the President, and under such regulations as he should establish. Instructions have been given under this act to prohibit foreigners from passing into the Indian country, except as boatmen, and, under certain conditions, as interpreters.

The system of trade by public factors, now proposed to be abolished, commenced in the year 1796; but without superseding the original mode of carrying on the trade by license. The President was authorized to establish trading-houses, and to appoint an agent to each house to carry on, as the act states, "a liberal trade with the Indians." The act appropriated $150,000, as the capital of this trade, and the additional sum of $8,000 annually for the payment of agents and clerks; and directed the trade to be carried on, so as not to diminish the capital. It was limited to two years; but was, by a subsequent act, continued in force till 1806. A Superintendent of Indians was then appointed, and the capital increased to $260,000, and $13,000 were annually appropriated for the payment of superintendent, agents, and clerks. This act was limited to three years; but afterwards continued in force till 1811. The capital was then increased to three hundred thousand dollars, with an annual appropriation of $19,250 for the payment of superintendent, agents, and clerks. It was limited to three years, but has been extended by subsequent acts to the first of March next.

The capital at present is distributed among eight trading-houses, or factories, established at the following places: Fort Mitchell; the Chickasaw Bluffs; Fort Confederation, on the Tombigbee; Fort Osage, on the Missouri; Prairie du Chien, on the Mississippi; Sulphur Fork, on Red river; Green Bay; and Chicago.

Such is the rise, progress, and present condition of our Indian trade. It was commenced and has been continued from motives both of prudence and humanity; and though it may not have fully realized the expectations of its friends, it has no doubt produced beneficial effects. If wars have not been entirely prevented by it, they probably, without it, would have been more frequent; and, if the Indians have made but little advances in civilization, they probably without it would have made less. If greater effects have not resulted, it is to be attributed not to a want of dependence on the part of the Indians on commercial supplies, but to defects in the system itself, or in its administration. Scarcely any attempt has been made till lately to exclude foreigners, and the granting of licenses has not been subject to those checks which are necessary to give to it the most salutary effects.

Should it be thought unadvisable to continue the present trading system by factories, by permitting the act to expire, by its limitation, on the first of March next, it will then of course terminate. In winding up its concerns, two points are to be regarded: to sustain as little loss as possible, and to withdraw from the trade gradually, in order that the capital employed may be supplied from other sources. To effect both of these objects, I would suggest, that so much of the act of 1811 as authorizes the appointment of a superintendent and factors, be continued in force for one year; and that they be authorized to make sales, as heretofore, of the goods and effects on hand, and those which may be acquired from the Indians.

The Superintendent of Indian trade should also be authorized and directed to exhibit at his office, for inspection, an inventory of the stock in trade, with the property attached to the respective factories; and he should be directed to sell the same on the best terms offered, provided the sales can be effected at cost and charges. It would be proper to allow considerable credit upon approved bonds and security; and the President ought to be empowered to annex, as the condition of the sale, if he should think it advisable to sell the goods to the Indians, at the place at which the factory is established, a provision that the sales be effected within the period of one year. The factory at Fort Clark, being established by a treaty with the Great and Little Osages in the year 1808, must be continued by the Government, or sold out, subject to the condition of being continued so long as the Indians may desire it. It would perhaps be advisable to direct a new treaty, rescinding, on suitable compensation, the stipulation referred to.

The establishment would by these means terminate gradually, without the hazard of any considerable losses.

To provide for opening the trade to individuals, under suitable regulations, is a task of much greater difficulty. The vast extent of the country inhabited by the Indians; and the numbers and variety of the tribes, render it impossible to apply, with propriety, any uniform system to the whole. The various tribes, for the purpose of trade, may, however, be comprehended in two classes. Those in our immediate neighborhood, surrounded by our settlements and our military posts, and who, from long intercourse with us, have become partially civilized; and those more remote, who still retain their original character and customs. In the former are comprehended the four southern tribes, the Osages and the small tribes, immediately west of the Mississippi, those within the limits of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and that part of the Michigan Territory east of Lake Michigan. The latter comprehends all the tribes without those limits. I propose to consider the system of trade best calculated for each division, beginning with the former.

After giving the subject that full consideration which its importance merits, it appears to me that the provisions of the ordinance of 1786, with a few additions and modifications, particularly in the administrative part, so as to adjust it to our present form of Government, are, for this division of our Indian trade, the best that can be devised. The provisions of the acts now in force, in relation to licenses, are not as well guarded or as efficient as those of the ordinance referred to. The introduction of the factories seems to have relaxed the attention of Government to the system of trade under license. I would then propose to assume the provisions of the ordinance referred to, as the basis of a system to open the trade with the contiguous tribes of Indians to individual enterprise. Instead, however, of appointing two superintendents, I would propose a Superintendent of Indian affairs to be attached to the War Department, with a salary of $3,000 per annum; the superintendent to be under the control of the Secretary of War, and to be charged, subject to such regulations as the President may prescribe, with the correspondence, superintendence, and general management of Indian affairs; and to be authorized, with the approbation of the Secretary of War, to grant licenses to trade with the Indians. Licenses to be granted to citizens of good moral character, and to continue in force till revoked. A sum not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, to be determined under regulations to be prescribed by the President, to be paid, for the privilege of using it, at the time of granting the license, and annually during its continuance; and bonds with sufficient security to be taken, to conform to law and regulations. Licenses to be revoked by the President whenever he may judge proper. To trade without license to subject to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not to exceed six months, with a forfeiture of the goods. Licenses to be granted to trade at specified places, to be selected by the applicants, and not to be changed without the consent of the superintendent. All peddling and sales of spirituous liquors to be strictly prohibited. Each trading-house, or establishment, to require a separate license; and books to be kept at the establishment, in which the prices of the goods sold, and the articles purchased, should be regularly and fairly entered, and to be subject at all times to the inspection of the Indian agent, or such person as the superintendent may appoint.

The reasons for most of these provisions are so obvious as to require no illustration. They will all be passed over, accordingly, without observation, except the provision which requires the payment of an annual sum for the use of license, and that which requires the trading establishment to be fixed. The former provision is taken from the ordinance of 1786, which directed licenses to be granted for one year only, and on payment of fifty dollars to the superintendent, for the use of the United States; a sum nearly equal to that now proposed, if the value of money at that time be taken into consideration.

But it will probably be objected, that it is our interest, and, as we propose to monopolize their trade, our duty, too, to furnish the Indians with goods on as moderate terms as possible; and that the sum to be paid for a license, by acting as a duty on the goods sold under it, will tend to enhance their price. In answer to which, it may be justly observed, that it is not a matter of so much importance that they should obtain their supplies for a few cents more or less, as that the trade should, as far as practicable, be put effectually under the control of the Government, in order that they may be protected against the fraud and the violence to which their ignorance and weakness would, without such protection, expose them. It is this very ignorance and weakness which render it necessary for the Government to interfere; and if such interference is proper at all, it ought to be rendered effectual. Such will be the tendency of this provision. Its first and obvious effects will be to diminish more certainly, and with less injurious effect, than any other provision which can be devised, the number of traders; and to increase the amount of capital which each would employ. The profit of a small capital of a few hundred dollars would scarcely pay for the license; while that on a large one would not be much diminished by it. Both of these effects, the diminution of the number of traders and the increase of the capital, would add greatly to the control of the Government over the trade. It would be almost impossible to inspect the conduct, and, consequently, control the actions of the multitude of traders, with small capitals, diffused over the Indian country, and settled at remote and obscure places. The greatest vigilance, on the part of the superintendent and his agents, would be unequal to the task. By diminishing the number, and bringing each more permanently before the view of the Government, a due inspection and superintendence becomes practicable. Again: what control can the Government have over the conduct of a trader with a capital of a few hundred dollars only? Suppose he should violate the express injunctions of law and regulations, what serious loss would he sustain by the revocation of his license, or by the putting his bond in suit? To him it would be nothing to wind up his business and give his capital another direction; and, as to the bond, in such distant and obscure transactions, he might pretty safely calculate on escaping its penalty. Very different would be the case with the trader of a large capital. To revoke his license would be a serious evil, which must subject him to certain loss; and, should he break the conditions of his bond, he would be much more in danger of feeling its penalty. The control of the Government would not only be greater over such traders, but, what is of equal importance, their influence with the Indians would have a more salutary direction. A war between them and us would, in all cases, be injurious, and, in many cases, would be ruinous to the trader of a large capital; but not so with one of small capital; a single profitable speculation may be of more importance to him than the continuance of peace. From the effects of war he can as easily escape as from the revocation of his license, or the penalty of his bond. Let the character of the former be what it may, he must, from interest, be the advocate of peace, and the influence of his own government; while the latter, unless influenced by virtuous motives, would feel in either but little interest.

From the nature of the trade, the more it can be concentrated, provided there is reasonable competition, the better it will be for the Indians and ourselves. The very opposite, it is true, would be the fact, if they had the capacity and intelligence to take care of their own interest, without our protection; but, situated as they are, indefinite competition would be no less injurious to them than to our citizens; and such appear to be their sentiments. The Chickasaws, in a late treaty, complained of the injury which they had sustained from pedlars and small traders; and they had a stipulation inserted against the granting of any license trade with their nation, as the only effectual means which suggested itself to prevent it.

The reasons for fixing the trading establishments are no less strong. By rendering them stationary, and compelling the proprietors to keep books, containing regular entries of all their sales and purchases, important checks will be presented to prevent fraud and exorbitant charges. It will also strongly tend to prevent collision between the traders, and, consequently, the creation of parties among the Indians, for or against particular traders; a state of things unfriendly to their interest, and dangerous to the peace of the frontier. Besides, the trading establishments being fixed, as they will be, in the most advantageous positions, each will, in time, become the nucleus of Indian settlements, which, by giving greater density and steadiness to their population, will tend to introduce a division of real property, and thus hasten their ultimate civilization.

Such are the provisions under which the trade with those tribes of Indians in our immediate neighborhood may with safety and advantage be opened to individual enterprise. With a vigilant administration, it will produce results equally salutary to the Indians and ourselves. In fact, the knowledge of the use of money, and the prices of most of the ordinary articles of trade, is so far advanced among them, as to guard them, to a considerable extent, against mere fraud and imposition; and, with the control which the Government may exercise over the trade with them, they would generally receive their supplies on fair and moderate terms. The system is not less calculated to secure peace. The regular traders, who have paid for the use of their licenses, will be the most active to prevent vexatious peddling and retailing of spirituous liquors, which are the bane of the frontier. They will, besides, become the most active promoters of industry, for the almost total destruction of game has rendered the amount of peltries and furs of little value in this branch of Indian trade, and the capacity of paying for the goods purchased must, consequently, in a great measure, depend on the product of the soil. In fact, the neighboring tribes are becoming daily less warlike, and more helpless and dependent on us through their numerous wants, and they are rendered still more pacific by the fear of forfeiting their lands and annuities. They have, in a great measure, ceased to be an object of terror, and have become that of commiseration. The time seems to have arrived, when our policy towards them should undergo an important change. They neither are in fact, nor ought to be, considered as independent nations. Our views of their interest, and not their own, ought to govern them. By a proper combination of force and persuasion, of punishments and rewards, they ought to be brought within the pales of law and civilization. Left to themselves, they will never reach that desirable condition. Before the slow operation of reason and experience can convince them of its superior advantages, they must be overwhelmed by the mighty torrent of our population. Such small bodies, with savage customs and character, cannot, and ought not, to be permitted to exist in an independent condition in the midst of civilized society. Our laws and manners ought to supersede their present savage manners and customs. Beginning with those most advanced in civilization, and surrounded by our people, they ought to be made to contract their settlements within reasonable bounds, with a distinct understanding, that the United States intended to make no further acquisition of land from them, and that the settlements reserved are intended for their permanent home. The land ought to be divided among families, and the idea of individual property in the soil carefully inculcated. Their annuities would constitute an ample school fund, and education, comprehending as well the common arts of life, as reading, writing, and arithmetic, ought not to be left discretionary with the parents. Those who might not choose to submit, ought to be permitted and aided in forming new settlements at a distance from ours. When sufficiently advanced in civilization, they would be permitted to participate in such civil and political rights as the respective States within whose limits they are situated might safely extend to them. It is only by causing our opinion of their interest to prevail, that they can be civilized, and saved from extinction. Under the present policy they are continually decreasing and degenerating, notwithstanding the Government has, under all its administrations, been actuated by the most sincere desire to promote their happiness and civilization. The fault has been, not in the want of zeal, but in the mode in which it has been attempted to effect these desirable objects. The Indians are not so situated as to leave it to time and experience to effect their civilization. By selecting prudently the occasion for the change, by establishing a few essential regulations, and by appointing persons to administer them fairly and honestly, our efforts could scarcely fail of success. Nor ought it to be feared that the power would be abused on our part, for, in addition to the dictates of benevolence, we have a strong interest in their civilization. The enmity even of the frontier settlers towards them, is caused principally by the imperfections of the present system; and, under the one which I have suggested, it will greatly abate if not entirely subside. The natural humanity and generosity of the American character would no longer be weakened by the disorders and savage cruelty to which our frontiers are now exposed. A deep conviction of the importance of the subject, and a strong desire to arrest the current of events which, if permitted to flow in their present channel, must end in the annihilation of those who were once the proprietors of this prosperous country, must be my apology for this digression.

It remains to consider in what manner our trade can be most successfully prosecuted with the numerous Indian tribes who occupy the vast region extending west to the Pacific Ocean. It is obvious that the system proposed for the partially civilized tribes, bordering on our settlements, would prove altogether inadequate to this branch of our Indian trade. It will require a system of far more energy to effect the great objects which ought to be pursued through it. To establish a decided control over the numerous and savage tribes within these vast limits, and to give to our trade with them its utmost extension, are deemed to be objects of great national importance. It is believed, that within our limits, along the range of the Rocky Mountains, quite to the Mexican frontier, is the best region for furs and peltries on this continent. With proper efforts the whole of this valuable trade, extending quite across to the great Western Ocean, would, in a few years, be exclusively in our possession. To produce these desirable results, foreign adventurers, whose influence must at all times be hostile to our interests, and dangerous to our peace, must be excluded. With this view, and to protect our own trade, means have been taken to extend our military posts on the Mississippi and Missouri. Whatever character our trade in that quarter may assume, the extension of our posts, as contemplated, will be indispensable to its enlarged and successful prosecution; but it is believed that with all the advantages which they will afford, unless the trade be properly and efficiently organized, we shall not be able to compete, with entire success, with the British companies on the North, nor to acquire that decided control over the Indians, which is indispensable to its complete success.

In order to have just ideas on this subject, it is necessary to take into consideration not only the vast extent and remoteness of the region, over which it is proposed to extend our trade, but the character of the numerous tribes who inhabit it. They are all more or less migratory; in the Summer moving towards the North, and in the Winter to the South, in pursuit of the buffalo, and other game. They are thus, in the Summer, brought into the neighborhood of the British establishment to the north of our limits, where, notwithstanding our military posts and the advantage of our position, much of the trade and influence over these fierce and warlike tribes will centre, unless our means of carrying it on should be as well organized and efficient as theirs. The difficulty, though of an opposite kind, is no less considerable on the Southern frontier of this portion of our country. The line between us and the Spanish possessions in Mexico, is, in its whole extent, a subject of discussion; and, even should it be adjusted, will probably, to a considerable extent, be without natural and visible boundaries. To a trade thus situated, extending over so vast a region, inhabited by numerous tribes not less warlike than savage, with the competition of powerful and long established companies on one side, and danger of collision on the other, the unorganized efforts of individuals, always with jarring, and frequently with opposing interests, appear to be wholly inadequate to its successful, or safe prosecution. The rivalry of trade, which, in well regulated communities, gives the greatest prosperity to commerce, would, in these distant regions, beyond the control of law, or superior authority, among fierce and ignorant savages, lead to the most fatal consequences. Each trader, or association of traders, would endeavor to monopolize the trade within certain limits, and would exert their cunning and influence to render the savages their partisans, and the enemies of their rivals in trade. Among a people at once so fierce and so easily duped, the result may be readily anticipated. A state of disorder and violence would universally prevail, equally unfortunate to the Indians and ourselves; and which would strongly tend to turn the trade, and with it the influence over the Indians, to the well-organized foreign fur companies near our limits.

If these observations are correct; if the uncombined efforts of individuals are inadequate to a successful competition with the British fur companies; if they will endanger our peace with our Southern neighbors, and lead to fierce and dangerous rivalry among themselves, it only remains to consider, whether a mode can be devised of carrying on this branch of our Indian trade, which will obviate these evils, and accomplish the desirable objects of giving the greatest extension to it, accompanied with the most efficient control over the Indians themselves.

The united influence and combined efforts of the fur companies referred to, can be met successfully, it is believed, only by an equal concentration of influence, and efforts on our part; the jealous rivalry of independent traders, with its fatal consequences, can be obviated only by removing the diversity of interest by which it would be excited, and the danger of collision, on our southern limits, by subjecting the trade completely to the will and control of the Government. The mode, then, which I would propose, would be to vest the trade in a company with sufficient capital; to be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each; and to be limited to the term of twenty years; to pay an annual tax on its subscribed capital, for the privilege of exclusive trade, and to be subject, in like manner, as private traders, to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed. It is thus that most of the evils to be apprehended by leaving the trade open to the competition of private adventurers would, it is believed, be avoided. The efforts of the company, undisturbed by rival interests, would be directed to establish its control over the various tribes of Indians—to exclude foreign adventurers, and to give the greatest degree of profit to its trade. The success of such a company, properly conducted, scarcely admits of a doubt. Our position in regard to this trade; the facility which the navigation of our great and numerous rivers in that quarter would afford; and the protection from our military posts, would speedily destroy all foreign competition, and would, in a few years, push our trade to the Pacific Ocean. The most profitable fur and peltry trade in the world would be ours, accompanied with a decided influence over the numerous and warlike tribes inhabiting those extensive regions. The mere objection that it would create a monopoly ought not to outweigh so many advantages. The trade with the Indians has never been opened without restrictions to our citizens. Licenses from the Government have at all times been required, and the Government has itself, through its factories, to a considerable extent, monopolized the trade; and, by an extension of its capital only, might engross the whole of it. All of these provisions, however necessary in the Indian trade, would be absurd in any other branch of our commerce. Besides, the profit of the trade with the Indians has, at all times, been confined to a few individuals; and it is highly probable that a greater portion of the community would participate in it by carrying it on in the manner proposed, than in any other mode. In fact, absurd as commercial monopoly would be, where law and authority exist to repress the mischievous effects, which might spring from unbounded rivalry, and to give to such rivalry salutary consequences; just in the same degree, would it be wise and advantageous to carry on the trade under consideration by an incorporated company. A nation discovers its wisdom no less in departing from general maxims, where it is no longer wise to adhere to them, than in an adherence to them in ordinary circumstances. In fact, it evinces a greater effort of reason. The first advance of a nation is marked by the establishment of maxims, which are deemed universal, but which further experience and reflection teach to be only general, admitting of occasional modifications and exceptions.

Should the House, however, not adopt these views, but prefer to open the trade to the enterprise of single individuals, or such associations as might be formed for the purpose, I would suggest the provisions already proposed for the trade with the neighboring tribes of Indians, as the most advisable, with the exception of the provisions, which require the trader to be located, and that regular books of sales and purchases should be kept. In lieu of which provisions, I would propose that the goods intended for this branch of Indian trade, and the articles acquired by purchase from the Indians, should be entered under oath, the former with a copy of the invoice, and the latter, with a statement of prices, with the Indian agent at Mackinaw, St. Louis, Belle Point, on the Arkansas river, or Natchitoches, on Red river; or such other places as the President may designate.

The entry can be made without much inconvenience to the trader, as the geography of the country is such as to make it necessary for the trade to pass by one or the other of the points proposed, at each of which there is now an agent.

It is believed that these provisions would be as effectual as any that can be devised, short of a company incorporated for the purpose; but it is proper to observe, that they are open to the objections which have already been stated. In fact, they equally apply to any system, so long as the trade is exposed to the effects which must flow from the jealous rivalry of independent traders, where law and authority cannot step in to restrain its consequences within proper bounds. The Indians themselves are not proper judges of their own interests, and so far from restraining the effects of such rivalry, they would become the instruments of the most cunning and vicious of the traders, to wreak their vengeance on such as might stand in the way of their profits.

All which is respectfully submitted.

SINKING FUND.

[Communicated to the Senate, February 5, 1819.]

The Commissioners of the Sinking Fund respectfully report to Congress: That the measures which have been authorized by the board, subsequent to the last report of the 7th of February, 1818, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this board, dated the 4th day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as a part of this report.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, Vice President of the United States.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, Secretary of State.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD, Secretary of the Treasury.

WILLIAM. WIRT, Attorney General of the United States.

WASHINGTON, February 5, 1819.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY respectfully reports to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund:

That the balance of moneys advanced on account of the public debt, remaining unexpended at the close of the year 1816, and applicable to the payments falling due after that year, which balance, as appears by statement B, annexed to the last annual report, amounted to $520,496 80
And the sums disbursed from the Treasury during the year 1817, on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, which sums, as appears by statement C, annexed to the said report, amounted to 25,883,600 92

15th CON. 2d Sess.—78

State of the Sinking Fund.

Together with the gain on remittances to Europe during the year 1817, as appears by statements D and D d, thereunto also annexed, amounted, as per statement D, to $1,379 80, and D d, to $2,132 79	$3,512 59
Together with a further sum, arising from damages and interest on a protested bill of exchange, being the difference between the amount of said bill at par, and the amount received into the Treasury in repayment thereof	416 00
And with a further sum, arising from interest on Treasury notes, placed in the hands of the late Commissioner of Loans in Massachusetts, for the payment of dividends, which interest accrued thereon previously to their being demanded by the stockholders, as per Treasury report No. 34,957	5,042 12

Amounting together, to - - - - - $26,413,068 43

Have been accounted for in the following manner, viz:

1. There was repaid into the Treasury, during the year 1817, on account of the principal of moneys heretofore advanced for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, as appears by statement E, annexed to the report of last year, the sum of	$460,564 80
There was also repaid into the Treasury, on account of the interest arising on Treasury notes, placed in the hands of the late Commissioner of Loans for Massachusetts, for the payment of dividends, but remaining unapplied, as appears by Treasury settlement No. 36,606, the sum of	5,845 33
	$466,410 13

2. The sums actually applied during the year 1817 to the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt, as ascertained by accounts rendered to this Department, amounted, as appears by the annexed statement A, to the sum of	26,639,716 75
---	---------------

In the reimbursement of the principal of the old 6 per cent. and deferred stocks	$1,699,430 66
In the redemption of the domestic debt	14,951,842 28
In the reimbursement of temporary loans	550,000 00
Payment of the principal of Treasury notes	3,057,234 00

	20,258,506 94
On account of the interest and charges of the same	6,381,209 81
	26,639,716 75

As the funds in the banks, out of which a part of the interest arising on the funded debt was paid, were not covered by warrants until after the 31st December, 1817, the amount short provided, as appears by the annexed statement B, forms a deduction of	693,058 45
--	------------

25,946,658 30

$26,413,068 43

That, during the year 1818, the following disbursements were made out of the Treasury on account of the principal and interest of the public debt:

On account of the interest on the funded domestic debt and reimbursement of the principal of the old 6 per cent. and deferred stocks	$7,355,061 38
On account of the principal and interest of Treasury notes	9,148,237 40
On account of the redemption of the Louisiana stock	4,750,598 12
On account of the interest on the same payable in Europe	67,226 50
On account of the purchase of the domestic debt	274,967 92
On account of certain parts of the domestic debt	792 36

Amounting together, as will appear by the annexed list of warrants marked C, to the sum of $21,596,783 68

Which disbursements were made out of the following funds, viz:

1. From the annual appropriation of ten millions of dollars for the year 1818, agreeably to the second section of the act to provide for the redemption of the public debt, passed the 3d March, 1817	$10,000,000 00
Deduct amount paid in anticipation of 1817, as per last report	2,830,108 52
	7,169,891 48

And so much of the surplus money in the Treasury, appropriated agreeably to the fourth section of the said act, and includes so much actually applied of the sum of $1,030,606 97, estimated in the last annual report	4,978,177 16
	$12,148,068 64

State of the Sinking Fund.

2. From repayments into the Treasury on account of moneys heretofore advanced for the purchase of bills of exchange, for the payment of interest and reimbursement of the funded debt, and of Treasury notes	$300,477 64
3. From the appropriations in relation to Treasury notes, being the amount of payments on account of the principal and interest thereof, as per statement C, above recited	9,148,237 40

Making the amount paid upon warrants, as before stated - - - - - $21,596,783 68

Have been accounted for, as far as respects the redemption of the funded debt, under the act passed the 3d March, 1817, and as exhibited in statement I, annexed, and which is rendered as a part of this report	415,993 87

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE FIFTEENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1818.

An Act to provide for the removal of the Library of Congress to the north wing of the Capitol.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the joint Library Committee of Congress be, and they are hereby, authorized to cause suitable apartments in the north wing of the Capitol to be fitted up and furnished for the temporary reception of the Library of Congress, and to cause the said Library to be removed to and placed in the same.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to settle the accounts of the expenditures which may be incurred under this act; and that the amount, so settled, be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of two thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to the further purchase of books for the said Library.

Approved, December 3, 1818.

An Act to increase the number of Clerks in the Department of War.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Department of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ an additional number of clerks in his Department, not exceeding twelve; and that the sum of twelve thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for their compensation; to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. This act to continue in force for one year, and no longer.

Approved, December 5, 1818.

An Act making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and to make good a deficit in the appropriation for holding treaties with the Indians.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and they are hereby appropriated to the objects herein specified, to wit:

For subsistence of the Army of the United States, two hundred thousand dollars.

For holding treaties with the Indian tribes, being a deficit in the appropriations for that object in the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, fifty thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said sums be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, December 16, 1818.

An Act concerning the Western District Court of Pennsylvania.

Be it enacted, &c., That no suit, action, plea, process, or proceeding, at law or in equity, which, on the twentieth day of April last, was depending and undetermined in the district or circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, and by law directed to be removed to the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, shall be discontinued or abated on account of the said court not having been opened or holden on the first Monday in June last, agreeably to the act of Congress passed on the twentieth day of April last; but that all such suits, actions, pleas, process, and proceedings, both at law and in equity, shall be deemed, taken, and, to all intents and purposes, be held to be depending in the said district court for the western district of Pennsylvania, as fully and effectually as if the said court had been opened and holden on the said first Monday of June last.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said court be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered, from time to time, to make all such rules and orders touching such suits, actions, pleas, process, and proceedings, at law and in equity, as they might or could have done, if said court had been opened or holden on the said first Monday of June.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all suits, actions, pleas, process, and proceedings, aforesaid, which may be hereafter certified and transferred from the district or circuit court of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania, to the district court of the United States for the western district of Pennsylvania, shall, to all intents and purposes, be deemed and taken to be depending in the said court on the said first Monday of June last, and the same proceedings may be had therein as if the same had been on that day entered in the said court agreeably to the act of Congress aforesaid.

Approved, December 16, 1818.

Public Acts of Congress.

An Act to establish a Judicial District in Virginia, west of the Alleghany Mountain.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the State of Virginia as is situate west of the summit of the mountains which separate the waters emptying into the Chesapeake bay and Roanoke river from the waters which fall into the Ohio river, shall be one judicial district; and there shall be a district court therein, to consist of one judge, who shall reside in the said district, and be called a district judge, and annually hold six sessions, as follows: At Clarksburg on the fourth Mondays of March and September; at Lewisburg, on the second Mondays of April and October; and at Wythe Courthouse, on the first Mondays of May and November.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said court shall, besides the ordinary jurisdiction of a district court, have jurisdiction of all causes, except of appeals and writs of error, cognizable by law in a circuit court, and shall proceed therein in the same manner as a circuit court; and writs of error shall be from decisions therein to the Supreme Court, in the same manner as from circuit courts.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a clerk appointed for the said court; and that a district attorney and marshal be appointed for the said district, in like manner as in other judicial districts.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the said judge of the said district court, the yearly compensation of one thousand six hundred dollars, to commence from the date of his appointment; that there shall be allowed to the said district attorney, the yearly compensation of two hundred dollars, to commence from the date of his appointment; and there shall be allowed to the said marshal the yearly sum of two hundred dollars, to commence from the date of his appointment; to be paid quarterly at the Treasury of the United States.

Approved, February 4, 1819.

An Act to authorize the payment, in certain cases, on account of the Treasury notes which have been lost or destroyed.

Be it enacted, &c., That, whenever proof shall be exhibited, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the loss or destruction of any Treasury note, issued under the authority of any act of Congress, it shall be lawful for the said Secretary, upon receiving bond, with sufficient security to indemnify the United States against any other claim on account of the Treasury note alleged to be so lost or destroyed, to pay the amount due on such note, to the person who had lost it, or in whose possession it has been destroyed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever proof shall be exhibited, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the loss or destruction of any certificate of Mississippi stock, it shall be lawful to issue, to the person who had lost it, or in whose possession it was destroyed, a new certificate of the same value with the one lost or destroyed; the person claiming such renewal complying with the rules and regulations at present established at the Treasury Department, for the renewal of certificates of stock lost or destroyed.

Approved, February 4, 1819.

An Act authorizing the distribution of a sum of money among the representatives of Commodore Edward Preble, and the officers and crew of the brig Syren.

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated; which sum shall be distributed by the Secretary of the Navy, as prize money, among the representatives of Commodore Edward Preble, deceased, and Captain Charles Stewart, the officers and crew of the brig-of-war Syren, or to the representatives of such as may be dead, on account of their proportion of the sum of five thousand dollars, the appraised value of the brig Transfer, captured by the said brig Syren, for a breach of the blockade of the port of Tripoli, in the year eighteen hundred and four, during the war carried on by the United States against that Power; the said brig Transfer having been taken into the service of the United States by Commodore Edward Preble, commander of the blockading squadron; which brig was regularly condemned, as a good prize, by sentence of a court of admiralty.

Approved, February 4, 1819.

An Act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year eighteen hundred and nineteen.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, respectively, appropriated:

For the pay of the Army of the United States, one million of dollars.

For subsistence, in addition to two hundred thousand dollars already appropriated, seven hundred and eighty-nine thousand two hundred and thirteen dollars.

For forage for officers, twenty-six thousand four hundred and ninety-six dollars.

For clothing, four hundred thousand dollars.

For bounties and premiums, sixty-two thousand five hundred dollars.

For the medical and hospital department, fifty thousand dollars.

For the quartermaster's department, five hundred and forty thousand dollars.

For arrearages, arising from a deficiency in the appropriation for the quartermaster's department, during the year eighteen hundred and eighteen, twenty-six thousand dollars.

For extra pay to non-commissioned officers and soldiers employed in the construction and repairs of military roads, ten thousand dollars.

For annuity to the Creek nation, under the treaty of one thousand eight hundred and two, three thousand dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 15, 1819.

An Act to extend the jurisdiction of the Circuit Courts of the United States to cases arising under the law relating to Patents.

Be it enacted, &c., That the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, as well in equity as at law, of all actions, suits, controversies, and cases, arising under any law of the United States, granting or confirming to authors or inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings, inventions, and discoveries; and upon any bill in equity, filed by any party aggrieved in any such cases, shall have authority to grant injunctions, according to the course and principles of courts of equity, to prevent the violation of the rights of any authors or inventors, secured to them by any laws of the United States, on such terms and conditions as the said courts may deem fit and reasonable: Provided, however, That from all judgments and decrees of any circuit courts, rendered in the premises, a writ of error or appeal, as the case may require, shall lie to the Supreme Court of the United States, in the same manner, and under the same circumstances, as is now provided by law in other judgments and decrees of such circuit courts.

Approved, February 15, 1819.

An Act to authorize the President and Managers of the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Road Company, of the State of Maryland, to extend and make their turnpike road to or from the boundary of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the law of the State of Maryland, entitled "An act to incorporate companies to make certain turnpike roads through the counties of Montgomery, Frederick, and Washington, and for other purposes," passed at December session, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, as relates to the Rockville and Washington Turnpike Road Company, be, and it hereby is, declared to be in full force within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the president and managers of the said turnpike road company be, and they are hereby, authorized to make said road from the boundary of the District of Columbia to the boundary of the city of Washington.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in relation to the process of constructing said road, and to toll-gates, and the rates of tolls thereon, the said company shall be, and hereby is, invested with all the rights, privileges, and immunities, and shall be subject to all the obligations, which, by the act of Congress, "to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the District of Columbia," passed April twenty-fifth, one thousand eight hundred and ten, are given, granted, imposed on, and vested in, the Company of the Columbia Turnpike Roads, had that company proceeded to make the said road according to the terms of the act of Congress aforesaid: Provided, That the formal written release, by the company last mentioned, of their right to make said road, according to their act of incorporation, be filed, within ten days after the passing of this act, in the office of the clerk of the Circuit court of the United States for Washington county, in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Corporation of Washington are hereby authorized and empowered, at any time, to purchase out the said road herein authorized to be made, with all the rights and profits thereto belonging, on paying to the said company a sum which shall be equal to the total amount expended on said road, with six per cent. interest thereon from the date of its expenditure.

Approved, February 15, 1819.

An Act authorizing the election of a Delegate from the Michigan Territory to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of said Territory.

Be it enacted, &c., That the citizens of the Michigan Territory be, and they are hereby, authorized to elect one Delegate to the Congress of the United States, who shall possess the qualifications, and exercise the privileges, heretofore required of, and granted to, the Delegates from the several Territories of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every free white male citizen of said Territory, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided therein one year next preceding an election, and who shall have paid a county or territorial tax, shall be entitled to vote at such election for a Delegate to the Congress of the United States, in such manner, and at such times and places, as shall be prescribed by the Governor and Judges of said Territory.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the person, duly qualified according to law, who shall receive the greatest number of votes at such election, shall be furnished, by the Governor of said Territory, with a certificate, under his official seal, setting forth that he is duly elected, by the qualified electors, the Delegate from said Territory to the Congress of the United States, for the term of two years from the date of said certificate, which shall entitle the person to whom the same shall be given to take his seat in the House of Representatives in that capacity.

Approved, February 16, 1819.

An Act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That Charles Worthington, James H. Blake, John T. Shaaff, Thomas Sim, Frederick May, Joel T. Gustine, Elisha Harrison, Peregrine Warfield, Alexander McWilliams, George Clark, Henry Hunt, Thomas Henderson, John Harrison, Benjamin S. Bohrer, Samuel Horseley, Nicholas W. Worthington, William Jones, James T. Johnson, Richard Weightman, George May, Robert French, and such persons as they may, from time to time, elect, and their successors, are hereby declared to be a community, corporation, and body politic, forever, by and under the name and title of the Medical Society of the District of Columbia; and by and under the same name and title they shall be able and capable in law to purchase, take, have, and enjoy, to them and their successors, in fee or for lease, estate or estates, any land, tenements, rents, annuities, chattels, bank stock, registered debts, or other public securities within the District, by the gift, bargain, sale, or demise, of any person or persons bodies politic or corporate, capable to make the same, and the same, at their pleasure, to alien, sell, transfer, or lease and apply, to such purposes as they may adjudge most conducive to the promoting and disseminating medical and surgical knowledge, and for no other purpose whatever: Provided, nevertheless, That the said society, or body politic, shall not, at any one time, hold or possess property, real, personal, or mixed, exceeding, in total value, the sum of six thousand dollars per annum.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the members of the said society above designated, shall hold, in the city of Washington, four stated meetings in every year, viz., on the first Mondays in January, April, July, and October; the officers of the society to consist of a president, two vice presidents, one corresponding secretary, one recording secretary, one treasurer, and one librarian, who shall be appointed on the second Monday in March, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, and on the annual meeting in January forever thereafter, (not less than seven members being present at such meeting.) And the society may make a common seal, and may elect into their body such medical and chirological practitioners, within the District of Columbia, as they may deem qualified to become members of the society; it being understood that the officers of the society now elected, are to remain in office until the next election after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the said medical society, or any number of them attending, (no less than seven,) to elect, by ballot, five persons, residents of the District, who shall be styled the Medical Board of Examiners of the District of Columbia; whose duty it shall be to grant licenses to such medical and chirological gentlemen as they may, upon a full examination, judge adequate to commence the practice of the medical and chirological arts, or as may produce diplomas from some respectable college or society; each person so obtaining a certificate to pay a sum not exceeding ten dollars, to be fixed on or ascertained by the society.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any three of the examiners shall constitute a board for examining such candidates as may apply, and shall subscribe their names to each certificate by them granted, which certificate shall also be countersigned by the president of the society, and have the seal of the society affixed thereto by the secretary, upon paying into the hands of the treasurer the sum of money to be ascertained, as above, by the society; and any one of the said examiners may grant a license to practise, until a board, in conformity to this act, can be held: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall authorize the said corporation in anywise to regulate the price of medical or surgical attendance on such persons as may need those services.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That after the appointment of the aforesaid medical board, no person, not heretofore a practitioner of medicine or surgery within the District of Columbia, shall be allowed to practice within the said District, in either of the said branches, and receive payment for his services, without first having obtained a license, testified as by this law directed, or without the production of a diploma, as aforesaid, under the penalty of fifty dollars for each offence, to be recovered in the county court where he may reside, by bill of presentment and indictment; one half for the use of the society and the other for that of the informer.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person who, upon application, shall be elected a member of the Medical Society, shall pay a sum not exceeding ten dollars, to be ascertained by the society.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Medical Society be, and are hereby, empowered, from time to time to make such by-laws, rules, and regulations, as they may find requisite, to break or alter their common seal, to fix the times and places for the meetings of the board, and to do and perform such other things as may be requisite for carrying this act into execution, and which may not be repugnant to the Constitution and laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to prohibit any person, during his actual residence in any of the United States, and who, by the laws of the State wherein he doth or may reside, is not prohibited from practising in this District: Provided always, That it shall and may be lawful for any person, resident as aforesaid, and not prohibited as aforesaid, when specially sent for, to come into any part of this District, and administer or prescribe medicine, or perform any operation, for the relief of such to whose assistance he may be sent for.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That Congress may, at any time, alter, amend, or annul, this act of incorporation of said society at pleasure.

Approved, February 16, 1819.

For military stores for the same, one thousand and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents.

For contingent expenses for the same, eighteen thousand six hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 16, 1819.

An Act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the Civil Department of the Government of the United States in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passage of this act, all those persons who are, or shall hereafter become members of the Provident Association of Clerks, employed in the civil department of the Government of the United States within the District of Columbia, be, and they are hereby, made a body corporate and politic, by the name and style of "The Provident Association of Clerks," and shall so continue until the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-four, and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, answer and be answered, defend and be defended, in courts of record and in any other place whatsoever; and by that name may make, have, and use, a common seal, and the same may break, alter, and renew, at pleasure; and shall have power to ordain, establish, and put in execution, such by-laws, ordinances, and regulations, as shall seem necessary and convenient for the government of said corporation, not being contrary to law nor the constitution thereof, and generally to do and exe-ecute all acts necessary or proper for the objects of said corporation, subject to the rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions herein described and declared.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the following rules, regulations, restrictions, limitations, and provisions, shall form, and be fundamental articles of, the constitution of the said corporation, to wit:

1st. The association shall be composed of clerks, employed in the civil department of the Government of the United States, within the District of Columbia; and its object shall be the benefit of the families of such clerks after their decease; and the funds thereof shall be applied agreeably to the provisions of this act, and for no other use or purpose whatever.

2d. Every such clerk shall, before he is considered a member of the association, sign these articles.

3d. Every member shall pay, on or before the fifth day of January, April, July, and October, respectively, the sum of two dollars and fifty cents.

4th. In addition to the payments mentioned in the preceding article, every member is at liberty to pay such further sums as he may think proper, which payments shall form a separate and special fund, and, on the death of any member by whom such payments shall have been made, his family shall, in addition to the relief provided by other articles of the association, be entitled to an annuity on other benefit out of the special fund, proportionate to the amount of the payments made thereto by such member.

5th. Any member who shall omit to pay his quarterly subscription, within the time prescribed by the third article, shall forfeit and pay, for the benefit of the association, the sum of fifty cents, and the like sum for every quarter during which the said subscription shall remain unpaid. And if any member shall omit, for more than one year, to pay the subscriptions required by these articles, together with such fines as he may have incurred, he shall thereby forfeit, both for himself and his family, all rights to any of the benefits of the association, together with all the moneys which he may have previously paid, and shall cease to be a member.

6th. Any member ceasing to be a clerk, or removing out of the District of Columbia, shall not thereby be deprived of his membership.

7th. The officers of the association shall consist of a president, six directors, a secretary, and treasurer, to be elected by ballot, at a general meeting of the association, on the last Saturday in March, annually; and they shall form a board, to be called the president and board of officers. In all elections for officers, the person having the greatest number of votes shall be considered as elected; but when two or more persons have an equal number of votes, the balloting shall be repeated to fill the office or offices for which no choice shall have been made. If any vacancy shall occur among the officers, a general meeting shall be called to fill the same.

8th. It shall be the duty of the president to preside at all meetings of the association, and of the board of officers. In the absence of the president, his duties shall be performed by the director present, senior on the list.

9th. The secretary [shall] keep a journal of the proceedings of the association, and of the president and board of officers; and he shall perform such other duties as may be assigned to him, either by the association or by the president and board of officers.

10th. The treasurer shall receive and pay all moneys of the association; he shall keep an account of its receipts and disbursements, and shall lay before the association, at its annual meeting in the month of March, a general statement of all its moneyed transactions, as also a list of those members who are two quarters or upwards in arrear, which list and accounts shall be read and examined previously to the election of officers.

11th. The quarterly subscriptions, and all other moneys received on account of the association, shall be paid to the treasurer, and shall be by him deposited, as soon as may be thereafter, in such bank as shall be fixed on by the president and board of officers; and shall, from time to time, be vested in the public stocks of the United States, or in loans to individuals, secured upon real estate, or in the stocks of any incorporated banking institution; and the moneys so deposited shall be drawn out of the bank only on the order of the treasurer, countersigned by the secretary, and approved by the president.

12th. The funds of the association shall be appropriated and paid to the families of deceased members, at the following rates, to wit: to the families of those members who may die after the expiration of the first year, and within five years from the time of their admission, twice the amount of the subscription which shall have been paid by such members, respectively: to the families of those members who may die within the sixth year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of two hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die within the seventh year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of three hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die within the eighth year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of four hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die within the ninth year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of five hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die within the tenth year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of six hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die within the eleventh year, from the time of their admission, respectively, the sum of seven hundred dollars; to the families of those members who may die after the expiration of the eleventh year from the time of their admission, not less than eight hundred dollars.

13th. In all cases the widow and children of a deceased member shall be deemed his family, and as such entitled to the relief provided under the foregoing article; but a member having no wife or children, may adopt any other person or persons as his family, for all the purposes of this association, by giving notice in writing, to the president and board of officers, of the name and residence of such person or persons.

14th. The relief to which the families of deceased members shall be entitled, may be granted either by the payment of a certain sum of money, as prescribed by the twelfth article, or by annuity, the terms of which shall be fixed by the claimant, and the president and board of officers.

15th. In addition to the pecuniary relief to which the families of the deceased members are entitled, the members of this association pledge themselves to endeavor to provide for the permanent establishment in society of the persons composing such families.

16th. A general meeting of the association shall be held on the last Saturday in March, annually; but the president and board of officers may call a general meeting whenever they shall think it necessary.

17th. The regular meetings of the president and board of officers shall be on the first Saturday of January, April, July, and October, annually; but a special meeting of the board of officers may be called by the president, on a requisition in writing from any member thereof.

18th. In all cases where it is not otherwise expressly provided, a majority of the votes of the members of the association, assembled at any meeting, shall prevail.

19th. All legacies or donations made to the association, shall be appropriated to the general purposes thereof.

20th. The president and board of officers shall have power to make by-laws for their government, provided the same be consistent with these articles.

21st. If the association shall be dissolved by any event, or in any manner whatsoever, otherwise than by the expiration of the charter, the funds then belonging to it shall, after all claims and demands thereon are satisfied, be divided among the families of deceased members, according to the sums paid in by such such members respectively.

22d. The debts which the said corporation may, at any time, owe, shall not exceed the value of the property lawfully held and owned by them; and, in case of excess, the directors who may have been assenting thereto, shall be liable for the same in their natural and individual capacities; and an action of debt may, in such case, be brought against them, or any of them, in the proper court, by any creditor or creditors, of the said corporation, and may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, any condition, covenant, or agreement, to the contrary notwithstanding: And the property of the corporation shall also be liable for and chargeable with the excess.

23d. It shall not be lawful for the said corporation to deal or trade in the manner of a bank, nor issue any note in the nature of a bank note, nor transact any other kind of business, or deal in any other manner or thing, than is expressly authorized by the eleventh article of the second section of this act; and any director or directors, who shall have assented to any such dealing or trade, shall, on conviction thereof, in the proper court, forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars; one-half to the use of the poor of the City of Washington, and the other half to the use of the person who may prosecute for the same: Provided always, That Congress may, at any time, amend, alter, or annul, this act.

Approved, February 15, 1819.

An Act to increase the salaries of certain officers of Government.

Be it enacted, &c., That, instead of the salaries now allowed by law to the following officers, there shall be paid to them, quarterly, the following annual salaries respectively; that is to say: to the Secretary of State, six thousand dollars; to the Secretary of the Treasury, six thousand dollars; to the Secretary of War, six thousand dollars; to the Secretary of the Navy, six thousand dollars; to the Attorney General, three thousand five hundred dollars; to the Postmaster General, four thousand dollars; to the Chief Justice of the United States, five thousand dollars; and to each of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, four thousand five hundred dollars; and to the Assistant Postmaster General, and Additional Assistant Postmaster General, two thousand five hundred dollars each; to commence the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen; and to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act authorizing the President of the United States to purchase the lands reserved by the act of the third of March, eighteen hundred and seventeen, to certain Chiefs, Warriors, or other Indians, of the Creek nation.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to purchase for, and on behalf of, the United States, any tract or tracts of land, reserved by the act of the third day of March, eighteen hundred and seventeen, to the chiefs, warriors, or other Indians, of the Creek nation, which they, or either of them, may be disposed to sell; and the amount of such purchase shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any tract or tracts of land, the title to which may be acquired by the United States, by virtue of this act, shall be offered at public sale, at the land offices of the district in which they may be situated, upon such day or days as the President shall, by proclamation, designate for that purpose, in the same manner, and on the same conditions and terms of credit, as is provided by law for the sale of public lands of the United States; and patents shall be granted therefor, as for other public lands and town lots sold by the United States.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act for the relief of Adam Kinsley, Thomas French, and Charles S. Leonard.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War, and he is hereby, authorized to pay unto Adam Kinsley, and Thomas French, such sum of money, in addition to that already paid, under a contract entered into on the twentieth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and eight, between Tench Cox, on the part of the United States, with the said Adam Kinsley and Thomas French, for the manufacture of four thousand stand of arms, as shall increase the price of each stand of arms, delivered under the said contract, to a sum equal to that allowed to others who entered into contracts to manufacture and deliver arms to the United States, on or about the same time, keeping in view the quality of the arms delivered by each; and that the same be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said Secretary make the like additional compensation to Charles S. Leonard, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for arms manufactured and delivered by him, under a contract entered into on or about the time abovementioned, keeping in view the rules prescribed in the preceding section.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act providing for a grant of land for the seat of government in the State of Mississippi, and for the support of a seminary of learning within the said State.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be granted to the State of Mississippi, two entire sections of land, or fractional sections, or quarter sections, not exceeding the quantity contained in two entire sections, for a seat of government in the said State; which land shall be located in one entire tract, at such place as, under the authority of the said State, shall be designated for the seat of government therein, whenever the Indian title shall have been extinguished thereto, and before the commencement of the public sales of the adjoining and surrounding lands belonging to the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the township of land granted for the support of Jefferson College, there shall be granted, in the said State, another township, or a quantity of land equal thereto, to be located in tracts of not less than four entire sections each, which shall be vested in the Legislature of the said State, in trust, for the support of a seminary of learning therein; which lands shall be located by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, whenever an extinguishment of Indian title shall be made for lands, suitable, in his opinion, for that purpose, in the said State: which grant, hereby provided to be made, shall be considered as made in lieu of a township directed to be reserved by the fifth section of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the ascertaining and surveying of the boundary lines fixed by the treaty with the Creek Indians, and for other purposes," passed March three, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen; and which reserve of one township, provided to be made by the aforesaid fifth section of said act, shall be offered for sale, in the same manner as the other public lands in the same district.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act directing the payment of certain bills drawn by General Armstrong in favor of William Morgan.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be paid to Thomas Griffin, administrator of William Morgan, deceased, and trustee of Alexander Macaulay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of five thousand two hundred and nine dollars and twenty-one cents, being the amount of certain bills of exchange drawn by General John Armstrong, in favor of said William Morgan, master of the ship Louisa, for the value of said ship Louisa, and cargo, under the Louisiana convention, and which bills were delivered to Joseph Fenwick, late Consul of the United States at Bordeaux: Provided always, That before such payment shall be made, the said Thomas Griffin shall give bond, with one or more sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify the United States for such payment, against all persons whatsoever, who may hereafter make any claim on account of the said bills, or either of them.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act supplemental to the act, entitled "An act further to amend the charter of the City of Washington."

Be it enacted, &c., That any lot, or part of a lot, or other real estate whatsoever, in the City of Washington, heretofore sold, or hereafter to be sold, for any tax due to the corporation of said city, or laid or assessed under the authority of the said corporation, pursuant to the powers vested in it by virtue of the act to which this is a supplement, or of any other act, passed, or to be passed, shall and may be redeemed, so as effectually to reinstate and invest the proprietor, or his legal representatives, in and with all his former estate, as fully and effectually as if such sale had never been made, upon payment, or tender of payment, being made, at any time within two years from the time of such sale, by such proprietor, or by his heirs, executors, or administrators, or by any other person, in his or their behalf, to the purchaser of such lot or part of a lot, or other real estate, his executors or administrators, of the money actually paid by him for the same, with the addition of interest, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, to be computed from the time of the payment of the said money by such purchaser; and if such purchaser, his executors, or administrators, have no known place of residence within the District of Columbia, or be not to be found at such place of residence, at the time such redemption is desired to be made; or if such proprietor, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or any other person in his behalf, shall offer to pay such money, with interest as aforesaid, and such purchaser, his executors, or administrators, shall refuse to accept the same, and give a sufficient receipt and acquittance in writing for the same, by way of redemption aforesaid, then, and in every such case, it shall and may be lawful for such proprietor, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or other person in his or their behalf, to make the redemption aforesaid, as effectually, by paying the said money, with interest as aforesaid, to the clerk of the circuit court for the county of Washington; whose duty it shall be to make report of the same to the said court, immediately, if in session, otherwise on the first day of session then next ensuing, and to deposit the said money for safe-keeping, and pay the same over to such purchaser, or his legal representatives, under the direction of the said court: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to affect the right of any person now entitled, under any law heretofore enacted, to receive any higher or other premium than an interest of ten per centum per annum, as aforesaid, upon the redemption of any real estate, other than vacant and unimproved lots heretofore sold for taxes, nor to affect the vested legal right of such person to hold such real estate clear of such right of redemption, at any time less than two years from the time of the sale, such legal right being vested prior to the passing of this act; and that the said court may require such higher or other premium to be paid, by the person redeeming, to the purchaser, in any case wherein it shall appear to the said court that a vested legal right to such premium existed before the passing of this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several collectors of the said taxes, or such other officer of the said corporation as shall be charged with the duty of selling any such real estate for taxes, shall, within ten days after every such sale, transmit to the clerk of the said court an accurate report in writing, certified by the clerk or register of the said corporation, containing a particular description of the property sold, the amount of taxes for the raising of which it has been sold, the names and residence of the person or persons to whom such property belongs, or to whom such taxes have been assessed, and of the purchaser or purchasers, the amount of the purchase money; distinguishing how much has been actually paid, and the clear surplus, if any, coming to the proprietor; which report it shall be the duty of the clerk of the said court forthwith to record among the land records of the said county, and the expense thereof shall be paid by the party who redeems the same.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act providing additional penalties for false entries for the benefit of drawback, or bounty on exportation.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in addition to the forfeitures and penalties heretofore provided by law, for making a false entry with the collector of any district, of any goods, wares, or merchandise, for the benefit of drawback or bounty on exportation, the person making such false entry shall, (except in the cases heretofore excepted by law,) forfeit and pay to the United States a sum equal to the value of the articles mentioned or described in such entry; to be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," passed on the second day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-nine.

Approved, February 20, 1819.

An Act for the relief of Thomas Hall Jervey.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be paid to Thomas Hall Jervey, surveyor of the port of Charleston, one-half of the amount received by the United States on account of the condemnation of the schooner the Lovely Cordelia, and of the James and Elizabeth, and that an amount, not exceeding five thousand dollars, be appropriated for this purpose, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act concerning the heirs and legatees of Thomas Turner, deceased.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund are hereby authorized and required to pay, out of the said fund, to the executors of Thomas Turner, deceased, for the benefit of the heirs and legatees of the said Thomas Turner, deceased, the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars; the said sum being in consideration of services rendered by the said Thomas Turner, deceased, as accountant of the Navy Department, in receiving and settling all accounts respecting the said fund, and for which no compensation has heretofore been made.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act for the relief of Kenzie and Forsyth.

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be authorized and directed to settle the accounts of Kenzie and Forsyth, for three mules and ten horses which were lost in the public service at the evacuation of Chicago during the late war; and that the sum found due to said Kenzie and Forsyth be paid to them out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act making provision for the claim of M. Poirrey.

ized to liquidate, settle, and allow the claim of M. Poiray, as secretary and aid-de-camp to Major General Lafayette, during the time of his service, in those capacities, in the time of the Revolutionary war between the United States of America and Great Britain.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act allowing further time to complete the issuing and locating of Military Land Warrants.

Be it enacted, &c., That the authority granted to the Secretary for the Department of War, by the second section of the act to provide for designating, surveying, and granting, the military bounty lands, approved the sixth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, and by the fourth section of the act making further provision for filling the ranks of the Army of the United States, approved December tenth, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, to issue warrants for the military land bounties to persons entitled thereto, shall be revived and continued in force for the term of five years from and after the fourth day of March next.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the time limited by the act supplementary to the act further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes, approved March ninth, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, for issuing military land warrants, shall be extended to the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, and the time limited by the said act for the location of unlocated military land warrants, shall be extended to the first day of October thereafter.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act making provision for the claim of M. de Vienne.

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the War Department be, and they are hereby, authorized to liquidate, settle, and allow the claim of M. de Vienne, for the pay, appointments, and emoluments of lieutenant colonel, for seven months' service during the Revolutionary war between the United States and Great Britain.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to provide for the prompt settlement of Public Accounts."

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the third day of March next, it shall be the duty of the second auditor of the Treasury to receive all unsettled accounts arising out of Indian affairs, with the exception of those appertaining to the Indian trade, and examine the same, and thereafter certify the balance, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificates, to the second comptroller, for his decision thereon: Provided, That if in the opinion of the President of the United States the public interest and convenience would be promoted by assigning all, or any part of, the said accounts to the third auditor, he shall be, and hereby is, authorized to make such assignment accordingly.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the auditor charged with the examination of the accounts, as aforesaid, to keep all accounts of the receipts and expenditures of the public money in regard to them; to receive from the second comptroller the accounts which shall have been finally adjusted, and to preserve such accounts, with the vouchers and certificates. And it shall be the duty of the said auditor to make such reports on the business hereby assigned to him, as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and require, from time to time, for the service of the War Department.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States shall disburse all such moneys as shall have been previously ordered for the use of the Indian Department, with the exception of those relating to Indian trade beforementioned, by warrants from the Treasury; which disbursements shall be made pursuant to warrants drawn by the Secretary of War, and countersigned by the second comptroller, and registered by the second and third auditor, as the case may be.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act to which this is a supplement, as is inconsistent with this act, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act to incorporate a company to build a bridge over the Eastern Branch of Potomac, between Eleventh and Twelfth streets East, in the City of Washington.

Be it enacted, &c., That the following persons, viz: William Prout, William Marbury, Samuel N. Smallwood, Timothy Winn, and Adam Lindsay, or any three of them, be, and are hereby, constituted a board of commissioners, with full power and authority to open, or cause to be opened, books for receiving and entering subscriptions, for raising a capital stock, not exceeding twenty-five thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each, for the purpose of erecting a bridge between Eleventh and Twelfth streets East, in the City of Washington, over the Eastern Branch, to the most convenient landing on the opposite shore, and making such other incidental works, and defraying such other incidental expenses, as shall be required by this act, or deemed necessary or expedient by the company hereinafter named; the time, place, and manner, of receiving and entering such subscriptions, to be ascertained by the said board of commissioners, and duly advertised in such newspapers as they may deem expedient: Provided, That the time to be fixed upon, by the said board of commissioners, for opening books for receiving said subscriptions, shall be on or before the second Monday in March next; and that no subscription shall be received, unless the sum of ten dollars be first paid into the hands of the person authorized to receive the same, on each share subscribed for.

Public Acts of Congress.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, whenever two hundred of the said shares shall be subscribed for, all persons who may then be, or thereafter may become, the actual holders or proprietors of shares in the said capital stock, either as subscribers for the same, or as the legal representatives, successors, or assignees, of such subscribers, shall be, and they are hereby, made and created a body politic and corporate, by the name and style of "The Navy Yard Bridge Company;" and by that name may sue and be sued, implead and be impleaded, and do and suffer all acts, matters, and things, which a body politic and corporate may lawfully do and suffer; and may have a common seal, and the same may break and alter at pleasure, and may make all by-laws, rules, and regulations, and ordinances, for the good government of said company, and for carrying into effect the objects of their institution, so that such by-laws, rules, regulations, and ordinances, be not repugnant to the laws of the United States in force within the District of Columbia.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That at all elections for directors and officers of said company, each and every member of the said company shall be entitled to as many votes as he or she may hold shares of the capital stock of said company, and may vote by proxy, executed under their hands and seals, in the presence of two witnesses; and that when two hundred of the said shares shall be subscribed for, as aforesaid, or as soon after as may be, the said board of commissioners shall call a meeting of the company, at some convenient place in the City of Washington, giving at least three weeks' notice thereof, by public advertisement, in one or more newspapers published in the District of Columbia; and the said company shall then and there elect, by ballot, five directors and a treasurer, and such other officers, agents, and servants, as the company may think fit to appoint; and as soon thereafter as a board of directors shall be formed, they shall elect one of their body to be president of the said board of directors; and all the powers, authority, and duties, whatsoever, by this act vested in the said board of commissioners, shall cease and determine, and thenceforward become vested in the president and directors for the time being of the said company; and the said board of commissioners shall account to the president and directors of the said company, at their first meeting, for all moneys received by them or their agents, on account of subscriptions, and shall immediately pay over the same to the treasurer of said company. And the said directors and treasurer shall hold their offices until the first Tuesday in October next, and until a new election shall be made by the company. And there shall be holden on that day, and annually thereafter, on every first Tuesday in October, a meeting of the said company, for the purpose of electing five directors and a treasurer, and other officers and agents, as aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said shares shall be negotiable and transferrable from one to another, by assignments in writing, executed before two witnesses, at least, and authenticated and registered, as the said company may prescribe and direct in their by-laws and regulations, and shall be deemed personal, and not real, property; and that the shares held by any individual shall be liable to be attached, or taken by fieri facias, to satisfy the debts due from such individual, in like manner as other personal property may be.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That a meeting of the said company may, at any time, be called, at some convenient place in the City of Washington, by a majority of the directors of the company, for the time being, and by one-third of the members of the said company, or by the proprietors of one-third of the shares actually subscribed for, or the legal representatives or proprietors: Provided, however, That no meeting of the said company shall be legal or valid, unless a quorum shall be formed, consisting of the majority of the members of said company, or of the proprietors of at least two-thirds of the number of shares actually subscribed for, their legal representatives, successors, or proxies, nor unless the time of such meeting be previously advertised, for three weeks successively, in one or more gazettes in the District of Columbia; and the said company shall have power, at any meeting legally called and constituted in pursuance of this act, to displace any of their directors or officers, and to supply, by a new election, all vacancies that may happen among the directors or officers of the company; and a majority of the said directors may provisionally supply, by their own election, any vacancies that may happen among the number of directors, or among the number of the officers of the company; and the person so elected, by the said directors, may continue in office till the next legal meeting of the company.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the amount of each share shall be paid by instalments of ten dollars, at such time as the said company shall direct; and in case any instalment or instalments shall not be paid at the time appointed by the said company, or within ten days thereafter, the same may be recovered in the name of the said company, by warrant from a justice of the peace, if the amount due shall not exceed twenty dollars, and if the sum so due shall exceed twenty dollars, the same may be recovered by motion in the name of the said company, on ten days' notice, in any court of record in the county or district where the debtor should be found; and in all such warrants and motions, the certificate of the clerk of the said company, authenticated by the president, under the common seal of the said company, shall be conclusive evidence of the defendant's being a member of the company, and prima facie evidence of the amount due on the shares held by such defendant; and if such instalment be not paid within sixty days after the time limited for the payment of the same, and advertisement for four weeks, successively, in one or more newspapers published in the District of Columbia, the president and directors of the said company may proceed to forfeit, for the use of the company, the share or shares of the person or persons so failing to pay.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said company be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to erect and build, or cause to be erected and built, over the Eastern Branch, between Eleventh and Twelfth streets East, in the City of Washington, and the land of William Marbury, on the opposite shore of the said Eastern Branch, a good and sufficient bridge, at least twenty-five feet wide, of sound and suitable materials, and in all respects adequate for the passage of travellers, horses, cattle, and carriages, with a secure railing on each side, at least four feet high.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the said company shall cause to be built, and maintained in good repair, a convenient and sufficient draw, or passage way, at least thirty feet wide, in the said bridge, over the main channel of the Branch, for the passing and repassing of vessels by day and by night. And the said company shall, at their own cost, and without toll, cause the said draw or passage way to be hoisted, or removed, without delay, for the passage of all vessels with masts, that are unable to pass under the same; and if, through the unskillfulness or negligence of the person or persons employed by the said company, to hoist or remove the said draw, any vessel shall be unjustly or unreasonably hindered or delayed, or shall be damaged in her hull, spars, or rigging, in passing the said draw, the said company shall be liable to the master, or the owner or owners, of such vessel, for damages, at the rate of six cents per ton of such vessel, for each and every hour such vessel shall be hindered or delayed, and for all damages in her hull, masts, and rigging, as aforesaid, to be ascertained and recovered, in a special action on the case, in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That as soon the said bridge shall be erected and built, and completed as required by this act, the said company shall be entitled to demand and receive, by their proper agents, servants, or officers, tolls at the following rates, viz: For each foot passenger, three cents; for each person and a horse, six and one quarter of a cent; for carriages, wagons, or carts, seven cents for each wheel, and three cents for each horse, mule, or ox, drawing the same; for every other horse or mule, three cents; for cattle, three cents per head; for hogs and sheep, two cents each: Provided, That no toll shall be exacted at the said bridge, for the passage of any wagon or carriage laden with the property of the United States, or for the drivers thereof, or for the passage of any troops of the United States, or the militia of any State, or of the District of Columbia, marching in a body, or any cannon, or military equipments belonging to the United States: Provided also, That if the number of two hundred shares shall not be subscribed within one year from the time of opening subscription books by the commissioners, as hereinbefore directed; or if the said bridge be not erected and built, and furnished and completed, by this act, within three years from and after the first day of October next; or if it should remain, at any time thereafter, so out of repair, for two years, as to be unsafe for travelling; then, and in that case, all the powers, authority, privileges, emoluments, and immunities, whatsoever, by this act granted to said company, shall cease and determine, and shall become absolutely forfeited.

Approved, February 24, 1819.

An Act to regulate the pay of the Army when employed on fatigue duty.

Be it enacted, &c., That, whenever it shall be found expedient to employ the army at work on fortifications, in surveys, in cutting roads, and other constant labor, of not less than ten days, the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, so employed, shall be allowed fifteen cents, and an extra gill of whiskey or spirits, each, per day, while so employed.

Approved, March 2, 1819.

An Act regulating passenger ships and vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That if the master or other person on board of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, or the Territories thereof, or by a subject or subjects, citizen or citizens, of any foreign country, shall, after the first day of January next, take on board of such ship or vessel, at any foreign port or place, or shall bring or convey into the United States, or the Territories thereof, from any foreign port or place; or shall carry, convey, or transport, from the United States, or the Territories thereof, to any foreign port or place, a greater number of passengers than two for every five tons of such ship or vessel, according to custom-house measurement, every such master, or other person so offending, and the owner or owners of such ship or vessel, shall severally forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, for each and every passenger so taken on board of such ship or vessel over and above the aforesaid number of two to every five tons of such ship or vessel; to be recovered by suit, in any circuit or district court of the United States, where the said vessel may arrive, or where the owner or owners aforesaid may reside: Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in this act shall be taken to apply to the complement of men usually and ordinarily employed in navigating such ship or vessel.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That if the number of passengers so taken on board of any ship or vessel as aforesaid, or conveyed or brought into the United States, or transported therefrom as aforesaid, shall exceed the said proportion of two to every five tons of such ship or vessel, by the number of twenty passengers, in the whole, every such ship or vessel shall be deemed and taken to be forfeited to the United States, and shall be prosecuted and distributed in the same manner in which the forfeitures and penalties are recovered and distributed under the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage."

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel bound on a voyage from the United States to any port on the continent of Europe, at the time of leaving the last port whence such ship or vessel shall sail, shall have on board, well secured under deck, at least sixty gallons of water, one hundred pounds of salted provisions, one gallon of vinegar, and one hundred pounds of wholesome ship bread, for each and every passenger on board such ship or vessel, over and above such other provisions, stores, and live stock, as may be put on board by such master or passenger for their use, or that of the crew of such ship or vessel; and in like proportion for a shorter or longer voyage; and if the passengers, on board of such ship or vessel in which the proportion of provisions herein directed shall not have been provided, shall at any time be put on short allowance, in water, flesh, vinegar, or bread, during any voyage aforesaid, the master and owner of such ship or vessel shall severally pay to each and every passenger who shall have been put on short allowance as aforesaid, the sum of three dollars for each and every day they may have been on such short allowance; to be recovered in the same manner as seamen's wages are, or may be, recovered.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the captain or master of any ship or vessel arriving in the United States, or any of the Territories thereof, from any foreign place whatever, at the same time that he delivers a manifest of the cargo, and, if there be no cargo, then at the time of making report or entry of the ship or vessel, pursuant to the existing laws of the United States, shall also deliver and report, to the collector of the district in which such ship or vessel shall arrive, a list or manifest of all the passengers taken on board of the said ship or vessel at any foreign port or place; in which list or manifest it shall be the duty of the said master to designate, particularly, the age, sex, and occupation of the said passengers, respectively, the country to which they severally belong, and that of which it is their intention to become inhabitants; and shall further set forth whether any, and what number, have died on the voyage; which report and manifest shall be sworn to by the said master, in the same manner as is directed by the existing laws of the United States, in relation to the manifest of the cargo; and that the refusal or neglect of the master aforesaid, to comply with the provisions of this section, shall incur the same penalties, disabilities, and forfeitures, as are at present provided for a refusal or neglect to report and deliver a manifest of the cargo aforesaid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each and every collector of the customs, to whom such manifest or list of passengers as aforesaid shall be delivered, shall, quarter-yearly, return copies thereof to the Secretary of State of the United States, by whom statements of the same shall be laid before Congress at each and every session.

Approved, March 2, 1819.

An Act to enable the people of the Alabama Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of the Territory of Alabama be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they may deem proper; and that the said Territory, when formed into a State, shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundaries, to wit: Beginning at the point where the thirty-first degree of north latitude intersects the Perdido river; thence, east, to the western boundary line of the State of Georgia; thence, along said line, to the southern boundary line of the State of Tennessee; thence, west, along said boundary line, to the Tennessee river; thence, up the same, to the mouth of Bear creek; thence, by a direct line, to the northwest corner of Washington county; thence, due south, to the Gulf of Mexico; thence, eastwardly, including all islands within six leagues of the shore, to the Perdido river; and thence, up the same, to the beginning.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor of the lands of the United States south of the State of Tennessee, and the surveyor of the public lands in the Alabama Territory, to run and cut out the line of demarcation between the State of Mississippi and the State to be formed of the Alabama Territory; and if it should appear to said surveyors, that so much of said line designated in the preceding section, running due south, from the northwest corner of Washington county to the Gulf of Mexico, will encroach on the counties of Wayne, Green, or Jackson, in said State of Mississippi, then the same shall be so altered as to run in a direct line from the northwest corner of Washington county to a point on the Gulf of Mexico, ten miles east of the mouth of the river Pascagoula.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all white male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and have resided in said Territory three months previous to the day of election, and all persons having, in other respects, the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly of the said Territory, be, and they are hereby, authorized to choose representatives to form a constitution, who shall be appointed among the several counties as follows:

From the county of Madison, eight representatives.

From the county of Monroe, four representatives.

From the county of Blount, three representatives.

From the county of Limestone, three representatives.

From the county of Shelby, two representatives.

From the county of Montgomery, two representatives.

From the county of Washington, two representatives.

From the county of Tuscaloosa, two representatives.

From the county of Lawrence, two representatives.

From the county of Franklin, two representatives.

From the county of Catoosa, two representatives.

From the county of Clark, two representatives.

From the county of Baldwin, one representative.

From the county of Cawhauba, one representative.

From the county of Conecuh, one representative.

From the county of Dallas, one representative.

From the county of Marengo, one representative.

From the county of Marion, one representative.

From the county of Mobile, one representative.

From the county of Lauderdale, one representative.

From the county of St. Clair, one representative.

From the county of Autauga, one representative.

And the election for the representatives aforesaid shall be holden on the first Monday and Tuesday in May next, throughout the several counties in the said Territory, and shall be conducted in the same manner, and under the same regulations, as prescribed by the laws of the said Territory, regulating elections therein for the members of the House of Representatives.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, thus duly elected be, and they are hereby, authorized to meet at the town of Huntsville, on the first Monday in July next; which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the whole number elected, whether it be or be not expedient, at that time, to form a constitution and State government for the people within the said Territory: And if it be determined to be expedient, the convention shall be, and hereby are, authorized to form a constitution and State government: Provided, That the same, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the principles of the ordinance of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between the people and States of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, so far as the same has been extended to the said Territory, by the articles of agreement between the United States and the State of Georgia, or of the Constitution of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby offered to the convention of the said Territory of Alabama, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted by the convention, shall be obligatory upon the United States.

First. That the section numbered sixteen in every township, and when such section has been sold, granted, or disposed of, other lands equivalent thereto, and most contiguous to the same, shall be granted to the inhabitants of such townships for the use of schools.

Second. That all salt springs within the said Territory, and the lands reserved for the use of the same, together with such other lands as may, by the President of the United States, be deemed necessary and proper for working the said salt springs, not exceeding in the whole the quantity contained in thirty-six entire sections, shall be granted to the said State, for the use of the people of the said State, the same to be used, under such terms, conditions, and regulations, as the Legislature of the said State shall direct: Provided, The said Legislature shall never sell, nor lease the same for a longer term than ten years at any one time.

Third. That five per cent. of the net proceeds of the lands lying within the said Territory, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the first day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for making public roads, canals, and improving the navigation of rivers, of which three-fifths shall be applied to those objects within the said State, under the direction of the Legislature thereof, and two-fifths to the making of a road or roads leading to the said State, under the direction of Congress.

Fourth. That thirty-six sections, or one entire township, to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, together with the one heretofore reserved for that purpose, shall be reserved for the use of a seminary of learning, and vested in the Legislature of the said State, to be appropriated solely to the use of such seminary by the said Legislature. And the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction as aforesaid, may reserve the seventy-two sections, or two townships, hereby set apart for the support of a seminary of learning, in small tracts: Provided, That no tract shall consist of less than two sections: And provided, always, That the said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right to the waste or unappropriated lands lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and moreover, that each and every tract of land sold by the United States after the first day of September, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, shall be and remain exempt from any tax laid by the order, or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands belonging to citizens of the United States, residing within the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that all navigable waters within the said State shall forever remain public highways, free to the citizens of said State and of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor, imposed by the said State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of a section of land, provided to be reserved for the seat of government of the said Territory, by an act, entitled "An act respecting the surveying and sale of the public lands in the Alabama Territory," there be granted to the said State, for the seat of the government thereof, a tract of land containing sixteen hundred and twenty acres, and consisting of sundry fractions and a quarter section, in sections thirty-one and thirty-two, in township sixteen, and range ten, and in sections five and six, in township fifteen, and range ten, and in sections twenty-nine and thirty, in the same township and range, lying on both sides of the Alabama and Cahawba rivers, and including the mouth of the river Cahawba, and which heretofore has been reserved from public sale, by order of the President of the United States.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, until the next general census shall be taken, the said State shall be entitled to one representative in the House of Representatives of the United States.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in case the said convention shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the Territory of Alabama, the said convention, as soon thereafter as may be, shall cause a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of government as shall be framed or provided, to be transmitted to Congress for its approbation.

Approved, March 2, 1819.

An Act supplementary to the acts concerning the Coasting Trade.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for the more convenient regulation of the coasting trade, the seacoast and navigable rivers of the United States be, and hereby are, divided into two great districts: the first, to include all the districts on the seacoast and navigable rivers, between the eastern limits of the United States and the southern limits of Georgia; and the second, to include all the districts on the seacoast and navigable rivers, between the river Perdido and the western limits of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel, of the burden of twenty tons or upwards, licensed to trade between the different districts of the United States, shall be, and is hereby, authorized to carry on such trade between the districts included within the aforesaid great districts, respectively, and between a State in one, and another adjoining State in another great district, in manner, and subject only to the regulations that are now by law required to be observed by such ships or vessels, in trading from one district to another in the same State, or from a district in one State to a district in the next adjoining State, anything in any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel, of the burden of twenty tons or upwards, licensed to trade as aforesaid, shall be, and is hereby, required, in trading from one to another great district, other than between a State in one, and an adjoining State in another great district, to conform to and observe the regulations that, at the time of passing this act, are required to be observed by such vessels in trading from a district in one State to a district in any other than an adjoining State.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the trade between the districts not included in either of the two great districts aforesaid, shall continue to be carried on in the manner, and subject to the regulations already provided for this purpose.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence and be in force from and after the thirtieth day of June next after the passing thereof.

Approved, March 2, 1819.

An Act to establish a separate Territorial Government in the southern part of the Territory of Missouri.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the fourth day of July next, all that part of the Territory of Missouri which lies south of a line beginning on the Mississippi river, at thirty-six degrees north latitude, running thence west to the river St. Francois; thence, up the same, to thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude; and thence, west, to the western boundary line; shall, for the purposes of a territorial government, constitute a separate Territory, and be called the Arkansas Territory.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established in the said Territory of Arkansas, a temporary government, to consist of three departments, the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judiciary.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the executive power shall be vested in a Governor, who shall reside in the said Territory, and shall hold his office during three years, unless sooner removed by the President of the United States: he shall be Commander-in-Chief of the militia of said Territory, shall have power to appoint and commission all officers required by law to be appointed for said Territory, whose appointments are not otherwise provided for by this act; shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; shall have power to grant pardons for offences against the said Territory, and reprieves for those against the United States, until the decision of the President thereon shall have been made known; shall, on extraordinary occasions, have power to convene the General Assembly, hereinafter provided for, after one shall have been organized in conformity to law; shall, ex officio, be superintendent of Indian affairs, and shall have such other powers, and perform such further duties, as are by law given to, and imposed on, the Governor of the Missouri Territory, in all cases in which they shall become legally applicable to the Territory of Arkansas.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a secretary for the said Territory, who shall reside therein, and continue in office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President: he shall perform all the duties imposed on the secretary for the Territory of Missouri, by an act of Congress of the fourth of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, entitled "An act providing for the government of Missouri."

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the legislative power shall, until the organization of the General Assembly, hereinafter provided for, be vested in the Governor and the judges of the superior court of the Territory, who shall have power to pass any law for the administration of justice in said Territory, which shall not be repugnant to this act, or inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That whenever the General Assembly shall be organized, all the legislative power of the Territory shall be vested in, and be exercised by, the said General Assembly.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of Congress of the fourth of June, eighteen hundred and twelve, entitled "An act providing for the government of the Territory of Missouri," as relates to the organization of a General Assembly therein, prescribes the powers and privileges thereof, the mode of election, and period of service, of the members thereof, and defines the qualifications and privileges of the electors and elected, shall be in full force and operation in the Arkansas Territory, to the extent of its application, so soon as the Governor thereof shall be satisfied that such is the desire of a majority of freeholders thereof, and not until then: Provided, That, until there shall be five thousand free white males, of the age of twenty-one years and upwards, resident in the said Territory, the whole number of representatives shall not exceed nine.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the judicial power of the Territory shall be vested in a superior court, and in such inferior courts as the legislative department of the Territory shall, from time to time, institute and establish, and in justices of the peace. The superior court shall be composed of three judges, who shall reside in the Territory, and continue in office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President. The superior court shall have jurisdiction in all criminal and penal cases, and exclusive cognizance of all capital cases, and shall have and exercise original jurisdiction, concurrently with the inferior courts, and exclusive appellate jurisdiction in all civil cases in which the amount in controversy shall be one hundred dollars or upwards. The superior court shall be holden at such times and place, or places, as the legislative department shall direct, and continue in session until the business therein shall be disposed of, or as long as shall be prescribed by law: Provided, That any two of the judges shall constitute a court of appellate, and any one a court of original jurisdiction.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the Governor, secretary, judges, and all other officers of the Territory, civil and military, shall, before they enter on the duties of their respective offices, take an oath or affirmation to support the Constitution of the United States, and to discharge, with fidelity, the duties of their offices; the Governor, before a judge of the supreme or district court of the United States, or a judge of the superior court of the said Territory; the secretary and judges, before the said Governor, or a judge of the Supreme or district court of the United States; and all other officers, before the Governor, or any of the judges of the supreme or inferior courts, or justices of said Territory.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Governor, secretary, and judges of the superior court authorized for said Territory, during the temporary government thereof, shall be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided, That the President shall have full power, during the recess of the Senate, to commission all or any of the said officers, until the end of the session of Congress next succeeding the date of the commission. The Governor, secretary, and judges of the superior court, shall receive the same compensation, payable quarter-yearly, which the Governor, secretary, and superior judges, of the Missouri Territory, are entitled to by law.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all the laws which shall be in force in the Territory of Missouri, on the fourth day of July next, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and which shall be applicable to the Territory of Arkansas, shall be, and continue, in force in the latter Territory, until modified or repealed by the legislative authority thereof.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the bounty lands granted, or hereafter to be granted, for military services during the late war, shall, while they continue to be held by the patentees or their heirs, remain exempt from all taxes, for the term of three years from and after the date of the patents, respectively.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That whenever, according to the provisions of this act, the people of the Arkansas Territory shall have a right to elect members of the House of Representatives of their General Assembly, they shall also have the right to elect a Delegate from the said Territory to the Congress of the United States, who shall possess the same powers, enjoy the same privileges, and receive the same compensation, granted and secured by law to the Delegates from other Territories.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That, until otherwise directed by the legislative department of the said Territory of Arkansas, the seat of the Territorial government thereof shall be the post of Arkansas, on the Arkansas river.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the line now established, by law, between the land offices at the seat of justice in the county of Lawrence, and at the town of Jackson, in the county of Cape Girardeau, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be so altered as to run, be the same, and correspond with the northern line of the said Territory of Arkansas, anything in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri," passed the seventeenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, March 2, 1819.

An Act authorizing the Postmaster General to contract, as in other cases, for carrying the mail in steamboats, between New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and Louisville, in the State of Kentucky.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster General may, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the transportation of the mail in steamboats, between New Orleans, in the State of Louisiana, and Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, for any term of time, not exceeding four years in any one contract, in the same way and manner as he lawfully may, for the carriage of it by land; but the whole expense of sending the mail in steamboats shall not exceed that of transmitting the same by land.

entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing for the sale of the lands of the United States northwest of the Ohio, and above the mouth of Kentucky river,' be, and the same is hereby, suspended until the thirty-first day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, in favor of the purchasers of public lands at any of the land offices of the United States: Provided, That the benefit of this act shall not be extended to any one purchaser for a greater quantity than six hundred and forty acres of land.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to enforce those provisions of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," which relate to the right of voting for directors, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, in all elections of directors of the Bank of the United States, hereafter to be held, under, and by virtue of, the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," whenever any person shall offer to the judges of such elections more than thirty votes in the whole, including those offered in his own right, and those offered by him as attorney, proxy, or agent, for any others, the said judges of the elections, or any one of them, are hereby authorized and required to administer to the said person, so offering to vote, the following oath or affirmation, viz:

I, —, do solemnly swear, (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I have no interest, directly or indirectly, in the shares upon which I shall vote at this election, as attorney for others; that those shares are, to the best of my knowledge and belief, truly, and in good faith, owned by the persons in whose names they now stand; and that, in voting at this election, I shall not, in any manner, violate the first fundamental article of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States." And the said judges of elections, or any one of them, shall be authorized and empowered, in their discretion, or at the instance of any stockholder of the bank, to administer the said oath or affirmation to any person offering to vote at any such election.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be entitled to vote at any such election, as attorney, proxy, or agent, for any other person, copartnership, or body politic, without a power, for that purpose, being duly executed, in the presence of a witness, and filed in the bank, and on which power shall be endorsed the oath or affirmation of the person, or one of the copartners, or of the head, or some of the officers, of the body politic granting such power, in the words following: "I —, do solemnly swear, (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I am (or that the copartnership, consisting of myself and —, are, or that the corporation known by the name of —, is, as the case may be, (truly, and in good faith, the owner, (or owners, as the case may be,) of the shares in the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, specified in the within power of attorney, and of no other shares; that no other person has any interest in the said shares, directly or indirectly, except as stated in the said power; and that no other power has been given to any person which is now in force, to vote for me (or for the copartnership aforesaid, or for the body politic aforesaid, as the case may be,) at any election of directors of the said bank;" which oath or affirmation may be taken before a notary public, judge, or justice of the peace, and shall be certified by him.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the judges of any election of directors, to be held as aforesaid, shall permit any person to give more than thirty votes, in the whole, at any such election, without the said person's having taken the aforesaid oath or affirmation, or shall suffer any person whatever to vote as attorney, agent, or proxy, for any other person, or for any copartnership, or body politic, without a power for that purpose, as prescribed in the foregoing section, with the oath or affirmation and certificate aforesaid; such of the said judges as shall consent thereto, shall severally be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on due conviction thereof, shall be subject to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, or to imprisonment not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court before which such conviction shall be had. And if any person shall wilfully and absolutely swear or affirm falsely, in taking any oath or affirmation prescribed by this act, such person so offending, shall, upon due conviction thereof, be subject to the pains and penalties which are by law prescribed for the punishment of wilful and corrupt perjury.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall, directly or indirectly, give any sum or sums of money, or any other bribe, present, or reward, or any promise, contract, obligation, or security, for the payment or delivery of any money, present, or reward, or anything to obtain or procure the opinion, vote, or interest, of the president of the Bank of the United States, or either of the directors thereof, or the president or a director of either of the branches of the said bank, in any election, question, matter, or thing, which shall come before the said president and directors for decision, in relation to the interest and management of the business of said bank, and shall be thereof convicted; such person or persons, so giving, promising, contracting, or securing to be given, paid, or delivered, any sum or sums of money, present, reward, or other bribe, as aforesaid, and the president or director who shall in anywise, accept or receive the same, on conviction thereof, shall be fined and imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and shall forever be disqualified to hold any office of trust or profit under the said corporation, and shall, also, forever be disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act in addition to "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases."

Be it enacted, &c., That the act passed on the twentieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases," be, and the same hereby is, extended, in all its provisions and limitations, to the vessels of Prussia, of the city of Hamburg, and of the city of Bremen.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act passed on the third of March, eighteen hundred and fifteen, entitled "An act to repeal so much of the several acts imposing duties on the tonnage on [of] ships and vessels, [and on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, as imposes a discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels] and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels and vessels of the United States," and also the act to which this is an addition, together with this act, shall cease and expire on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and twenty-four.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to employ so many of the public armed vessels, as, in his judgment, the service may require, with suitable instructions to the commanders thereof, in protecting the merchant vessels of the United States and their crews from piratical aggressions and depredations.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to instruct the commanders of the public armed vessels of the United States to subdue, seize, take, and send into any port of the United States, any armed vessel or boat, or any vessel or boat, the crew whereof shall be armed, and which shall have attempted or committed any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, upon any vessel of the United States, or of the citizens thereof, or upon any other vessel; and also to retake any vessel of the United States, or its citizens, which may have been unlawfully captured upon the high seas.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the commander and crew of any merchant vessel of the United States, owned wholly, or in part, by a citizen thereof, may oppose and defend against any aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, which shall be attempted upon such vessel, or upon any other vessel owned as aforesaid, by the commander or crew of any armed vessel whatsoever, not being a public armed vessel of some nation in amity with the United States; and may subdue and capture the same; and may also retake any vessel, owned as aforesaid, which may have been captured by the commander or crew of any such armed vessel, and send the same into any port of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever any vessel or boat, from which any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure, shall have been first attempted or made, shall be captured and brought into any port of the United States, the same shall and may be adjudged and condemned to their use, and that of the captors, after due process and trial, in any court having admiralty jurisdiction, and which shall be holden for the district in which such captured vessel shall be brought; and the same court shall thereupon order a sale and distribution thereof accordingly, and at their discretion.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons whatsoever, shall, on the high seas, commit the crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations, and such offender or offenders shall afterwards be brought into, or found in, the United States, every such offender or offenders shall, upon conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he or they may be brought, or in which he or they shall be found, be punished with death.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force until the end of the next session of Congress.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to continue in force for a further term the act entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," and for other purposes.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, in every case where he shall judge it expedient, to transfer any of the Indian agents, whose compensation was fixed by the act, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors," from the places designated by the said act, for the discharge of their duties, respectively, to such other places as the public service may require; and shall also have power to appoint, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, an Indian agent for the Upper Missouri, whose annual compensation shall be one thousand eight hundred dollars.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act regulating the payments to Invalid Pensioners.

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases of application for the payment of pensions to invalids, under the several laws of Congress granting pensions to invalids, the affidavit of two surgeons or physicians, whose credibility, as such, shall be certified by the magistrate before whom the affidavit is made, stating the continuance of the disability for which the pension was originally granted, (describing it,) and the rate of such disability at the time of making the affidavit, shall accompany the application of the first payment which shall fall due after the fourth day of March next, and at the end of every two years thereafter; and if, in a case of a continued disability, it shall be stated at a rate below that for which the pension was originally granted, the applicant shall only be paid at the rate stated in the affidavit: Provided, That where the pension shall have been originally granted for a total disability, in consequence of the loss of a limb, or other cause, which cannot, either in whole or in part, be removed, the above affidavit shall not be necessary to entitle the applicant to payment: And provided also, That this act shall not extend to the invalids of the Revolution, who have been, or shall be, placed on the pension list pursuant to an act of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," approved the eighteenth day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to regulate the duties on certain Wines.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, the duties now by law levied, collected, and paid, on wine not enumerated in the "Act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," passed the twenty-seventh day of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, when imported in bottles or cases, of seventy cents per gallon, and on wine not enumerated in said act, when imported otherwise than in bottles or cases, of twenty-five cents per gallon, shall cease and determine; and there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu thereof, the several and specific duties hereinafter mentioned; that is to say, on wines not enumerated in the act aforesaid, when imported in bottles or cases, thirty cents per gallon, and when imported otherwise than in bottles or cases, fifteen cents per gallon.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That an addition of ten per centum shall be made to the several rates of duties above specified, and imposed upon the several goods, wares, and merchandise, aforesaid, which, after the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States: Provided, That this additional duty shall not apply to such goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, entitled by treaty, or by any act or acts of Congress, to be entered in the ports of the United States, on the payment of the same duties as are paid on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed a drawback of the duties by this act imposed on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, upon the exportation thereof, within the time, and in the manner, prescribed in the fourth section of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," passed on the twenty-seventh day of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the existing laws shall extend to, and be in force for, the collection of the duties, imposed by this act on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States; and for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission, of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, forfeiture, provision, clause, matter, and thing, in the existing laws contained, had been inserted in, and reenacted by this act.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That wines and distilled spirits, imported and deposited in the public stores, under the direction of the surveyor, in the manner prescribed by the "Act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses," passed the twentieth April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, may be transported coastwise, from the public warehouses in one district, to those in another district, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, without loss of debenture.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act respecting the location of certain sections of land to be granted for the seat of government in the State of Indiana.

Be it enacted, &c., That, instead of four sections, provided to be located under the direction of the Legislature of the State of Indiana, and to be granted for the purpose of fixing thereon the seat of government for that State, it shall be lawful to locate, for that purpose, under the direction of the Legislature aforesaid, any contiguous quarter sections, fractions, or parts of sections, not to exceed, in the whole, the quantity contained in four entire sections: Such locations shall be made before the commencement of the public sales of the adjoining and surrounding lands, belonging to the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act making appropriations for the public buildings, for the purchase of a lot of land, and furnishing a supply of water for the use of certain public buildings.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated for finishing the wings of the Capitol, in addition to the sums already appropriated, the further sum of fifty-one thousand three hundred and thirty-two dollars.

For erecting the centre building of the Capitol one hundred and thirty-six thousand six hundred and forty-four dollars.

For finishing the gates, the iron railing, and the enclosure north of the President's house, five thousand three hundred and forty-four dollars.

For enlarging the offices west of the President's house, eight thousand one hundred and thirty-seven dollars.

For purchasing a lot of land, and for constructing pipes, for supplying the Executive offices and President's house with water, nine thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Which said several sums of money, hereby appropriated, shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several sums hereby appropriated, shall be expended under the direction of the President of the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act making provision for the civilization of the Indian tribes adjoining the frontier settlements.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for the purpose of providing against the further decline and final extinction of the Indian tribes, adjoining to the frontier settlements of the United States, and for introducing among them the habits and arts of civilization, the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, in every case where he shall judge improvement in the habits and condition of such Indians practicable, and that the means of instruction can be introduced with their own consent, to employ capable persons, of good moral character, to instruct them in the mode of agriculture suited to their situation; and for teaching their children in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and for performing such other duties as may be enjoined, according to such instructions and rules as the President may give and prescribe for the regulation of their conduct, in the discharge of their duties.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the annual sum of ten thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act; and an account of the expenditure of the money, and proceedings, in execution of the foregoing provisions, shall be laid annually before Congress.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act explanatory of the act, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri."

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of the fifth section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of land titles in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri," passed the twelfth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, shall be so construed as to extend to the citizens of the county of Howard, in the Missouri Territory, as established by the act of the Legislature of the Territory, passed the twenty-third day of January, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, any construction to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the right of pre-emption given by the aforesaid provisions, as explained and extended by this act, shall not be so construed as to affect any right derived from the United States, by purchase, at public or private sale, of the lands claimed under the aforesaid act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That any person or persons who have settled on, and improved, any of the lands in the said Territory, reserved for the use of schools, before the survey of such lands were actually made, and who would have had the right of pre-emption thereto by the existing laws had not the same been so reserved, shall have the right of pre-emption thereto, under the same terms and conditions, and subject to the same restrictions, provided for other cases of a right of pre-emption in said Territory; and the register of the land office, and receiver of public moneys, for the district, shall have power to select any other vacant and unappropriated lands, in the same township, and as near adjacent as lands of equal quantity and like quality can be obtained, in lieu of the section, or parts of a section, which shall have been entered in right of pre-emption, according to the provision of this section.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act making appropriations to carry into effect treaties concluded with several Indian tribes therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That, for the purpose of carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanee, Pattawatima, Ottawa, and Chippewa, tribes of Indians, concluded at the foot of the Rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, on the twenty-ninth day of September, eighteen hundred and seventeen, and the supplementary treaty concluded with said tribes, at St. Mary's, in the State of Ohio, on the seventeenth of September, eighteen hundred and eighteen, the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, in conformity with the stipulations contained in said treaty and supplement, to wit:

The sum of thirteen thousand three hundred dollars, for the payment of the annuities granted to said tribes, in the manner and proportions following:

To the Chickasaw nation, annually, for fifteen successive years, twenty thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the treaties concluded at St. Mary's, in the State of Ohio, with the Wea tribe, on the second of October, eighteen hundred and eighteen; the Pattawatima tribe, on the second of October, eighteen hundred and eighteen; the Delaware tribe, on the third of October, eighteen hundred and eighteen; and with the Miami tribe, on the sixth of October, eighteen hundred and eighteen; the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, in conformity with the stipulations contained in said treaties; that is to say:

To the Wea tribe, the annual sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars; which sum, in addition to their former annuity of eleven hundred and fifty dollars, will make a sum total of three thousand dollars.

To the Pattawatima tribe, the annual sum of two thousand five hundred dollars.

To the Delaware tribe, the annual sum of four thousand dollars.

And a sum not exceeding thirteen thousand three hundred and twelve dollars twenty-five cents, to satisfy certain claims against the Delaware nation, stipulated to be paid by the United States, and to be expended by the Indian agent at Piqua and Fort Wayne, agreeably to a schedule examined and approved by the commissioners.

15th CON. 2d Sess.—80

To the Miami tribe, the annual sum of fifteen thousand dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the treaty concluded on the fourth [24th] of August, eighteen hundred and eighteen, with the Quapaw tribe of Indians; and the treaty concluded on the twenty-fifth September, eighteen hundred and eighteen, with the Peoria, Kaskaskia, Michigania, Cahokia, and Tamarois, tribes of the Illinois nation of Indians; the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, in conformity with the stipulations contained in the said treaties; that is to say:

To the Quapaw tribe, the sum of four thousand dollars, and the further annual sum of one thousand dollars.

To the Peoria, Kaskaskia, the Michigania, Cahokia, and Tamarois, tribes of the Illinois nation, the annual sum of three hundred dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the treaty concluded on the twenty-fifth of September, eighteen hundred and eighteen, with the Great and Little Osage nation of Indians, a sum, not exceeding four thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, to satisfy claims of citizens of the United States, for property stolen or destroyed by the Osages, agreeably to the stipulation contained in said treaty.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, for the payment of the annuity granted to the Creek nation of Indians, by the treaty concluded near Fort Wilkinson, on the Oconee, the sixteenth of June, one thousand eight hundred and two, and for which no appropriation has heretofore been made, the annual sum of three thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated; and that, for the purpose of carrying into effect the treaty concluded with said nation at the Creek agency, on the twenty-second day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, the further annual sum of ten thousand dollars, for the term of ten successive years, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, conformably to the stipulations contained in the said treaty.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect sundry other stipulations, contained in several of the treaties hereinbefore mentioned, the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That there be appointed, agreeably to the ninth article of the treaty concluded with the Wyandot, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanee, Pattawatima, Ottawa, and Chippewa, tribes of Indians, on the twenty-ninth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, an agent, to reside among or near the Wyandots, who shall also execute the duties of agent for the Senecas, and the Delawares on the Sandusky river; and an agent to reside among or near the Shawanees; who shall each receive twelve hundred dollars per annum, as a full compensation for their services.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the several sums hereinbefore appropriated, be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.—Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act authorizing the sale of certain military sites.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under the direction of the President of the United States, to cause to be sold such military sites, belonging to the United States, as may have been found, or become useless for military purposes. And the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, on the payment of the consideration agreed for, into the Treasury of the United States, to make, execute, and deliver, all needful instruments, conveying and transferring the same in fee; and the jurisdiction, which had been specially ceded, for military purposes, to the United States, by a State, over such site or sites, shall thereafter cease.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act in addition to, and alteration of an act, entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries."

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be paid, on the last day of December, annually, to the owner of every fishing boat or vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such boat or vessel may belong, that shall be qualified, agreeably to law, for carrying on the Bank and other Cod fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein, at sea, for the term of four months, at least, of the fishing season next preceding, which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year, for each and every ton of such boats or vessels, burdened according to her admeasurement as licensed or enrolled, if of more than five tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, three dollars and fifty cents; if above thirty tons, four dollars; and if above thirty tons, and having had a crew of not less than ten persons, and having actually been employed in the cod fishery, at sea, for the term of three and one-half months, at the least, but less than four months, of the season, at least, three dollars and fifty cents: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed three hundred and sixty dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such parts of the fifth and sixth sections of the act hereby amended, as are contrary to the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.—Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to authorize the Secretary at War to appoint an additional agent for paying pensioners of the United States in the State of Tennessee.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the Secretary for the Department of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, to appoint an agent, in addition to the one already appointed in the State of Tennessee, under the act of the twenty-fourth of April, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, for the purpose of paying pensioners of the United States, residing in East Tennessee; whose duties shall be, in all respects, similar to those appointed under the aforementioned act.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to authorize the Secretary of War to convey a lot or parcel of land, belonging to the United States, lying in Jefferson county, in the State of Virginia.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey, by deed, in fee simple, to a certain John Peacher, a lot, or parcel of land, with the appurtenances belonging to the same, lying in Jefferson county, in the State of Virginia, called the Keep-Tryst Furnace, and containing two hundred and twenty-one acres, belonging to the United States, upon such terms as he may think most conducive to the interest of the United States; and the money arising from the sale thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to designate the boundaries of districts, and establish land offices, for the disposal of the public lands not heretofore offered for sale in the States of Ohio and Indiana.

Be it further enacted, &c., That, for the sale of the unappropriated public lands, in the State of Ohio, to which the Indian title is extinguished, the following districts shall be formed, and land offices therefor established: All the public lands, as aforesaid, lying between the western boundary line of the State of Ohio, and a north and south line to be drawn at forty-eight miles east of the said boundary line, and bounded on the south by the Indian boundary established by the Treaty of Greenville, and on the north by the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, shall form a district, for which a land office shall be established at Piqua. And all the public lands, as aforesaid, lying between the above described district and the western limits of the Connecticut Reserve and Canton land district as first established, and bounded on the south by the Indian boundary established by the Treaty of Greenville, and on the north by the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, shall form a district, for which a land office shall be established at the town of Delaware. And for the disposal of the unappropriated public lands in the State of Indiana, to which the Indian title is extinguished, the following districts shall be formed, and land offices established: All the public lands, as aforesaid, to which the Indian title was extinguished by the treaties concluded at St. Mary's, in the month of October, eighteen hundred and eighteen, lying east of the range line, separating the first and second ranges, east of the second principal meridian extended north to the present Indian boundary, and north of a line to be run, separating the ninth and tenth tiers of townships north of the base line, shall form a district, for which a land office shall be established at Brookville. And all the public lands, as aforesaid, the Indian title to which was extinguished by the treaties aforesaid, and lying west of the last described district, shall form a district, for which a land office shall be established at the town of Terre Haute. And all the public lands, as aforesaid, the Indian title to which was extinguished by the treaties aforesaid, lying east of the second principal meridian, and south of a line, to be run, separating the ninth and tenth tiers of townships north of the base line, shall be, and are hereby, attached to the district of Jeffersonville; and the said lands shall be offered for sale, with the same exceptions, and on the terms and conditions, in every respect, both at public and private sales, as is provided for the sale of the lands in the districts aforesaid: Provided, also, That the President of the United States shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, to remove, whenever he shall judge it expedient so to do, the land office from Jeffersonville, to some central and suitable place within the district.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the consent and advice of the Senate, for each of the districts aforesaid, a register of the land office and receiver of public moneys; which appointments shall not be made, for any of the aforesaid respective land districts, until a sufficient quantity of public lands shall have been surveyed within such district as to authorize, in the opinion of the President, a public sale of land within the same; which registers of the land office and receivers of public moneys, when appointed, shall each, respectively, give security, in the same sums, and in the same manner, and whose compensation, emoluments, and duties, and authority, shall, in every respect, be the same, in respect to the lands which shall be disposed of at their offices, as are or may be provided by law in relation to the registers and receivers of public moneys in the several land offices, established for the disposal of the public lands of the United States, in the States of Ohio and Indiana.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all the public lands within the aforesaid several districts, to which the Indian title has been extinguished, and which have not been granted to, or reserved for, the use of any individual or individuals, or appropriated and reserved for any other purpose, by any existing treaties or laws, and, with the exception of section numbered sixteen, in each township, which shall be reserved for the support of schools therein, shall be offered for sale, to the highest bidder, at the land offices for the respective districts, under the direction of the register of the land office and receiver of public moneys, on such day or days as shall, by proclamation of the President of the United States, be designated for that purpose: the sales shall remain open at each place for three weeks, and no longer; the lands shall not be sold for less than two dollars an acre; and shall, in every other respect, be sold in tracts of the same size, on the same terms and conditions as have been, or may be, by law, provided for the sale of the lands of the United States in the States of Ohio and Indiana. All the public lands in the said districts, with these exceptions abovementioned, remaining unsold at the close of the public sales, may be disposed of at private sale, by the register of the respective land offices, in the same manner, under the same regulations, for the same price, and on the same terms and conditions, in every respect, as are or may be provided by law for the sale of the lands of the United States in the States of Ohio and Indiana. And patents shall be obtained, for the lands sold in the said districts, in the same manner, and on the same terms, as are or may be by law provided for other public lands in the States of Ohio and Indiana.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall have power, and he is hereby authorized, to remove, whenever he shall judge it expedient so to do, any and each of the land offices established by this act, to such suitable place, within the district for which it was established, as he shall judge most proper.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted That each of the registers of the land office, and receivers of public moneys, shall receive five dollars for each day's attendance in superintending the public sales in their respective districts.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to authorize the President of the United States to take possession of East and West Florida, and establish a temporary government therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to take possession of and occupy the territories of East and West Florida, and the appendages and appurtenances thereof; and to remove and transport the officers and soldiers of the King of Spain, being there, to the Havana, agreeably to the stipulations of a treaty between the United States and Spain, executed at Washington, on the twenty-second day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, providing for the cession of said territories to the United States; and he may, for these purposes, and in order to maintain in said territories the authority of the United States, employ any part of the army and navy of the United States, and the militia of any State or Territory which he may deem necessary.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, until the end of the first session of the next Congress, unless provision for the temporary government of said territories be sooner made by Congress all the military, civil, and judicial powers, exercised by the officers of the existing government of the same territories, shall be vested in such person and persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct, for the maintaining the inhabitants of said territories in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion; and the laws of the United States, relative to the collection of revenue, and the importation of persons of color, shall be extended to the said territories; and the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized, within the term aforesaid, to establish such districts for the collection of the revenue, and, during the recess of Congress, to appoint such officers, whose commissions shall expire at the end of the next session of Congress, to enforce the said laws, as to him shall seem expedient.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the sum of twenty thousand dollars is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying this act into effect, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect and be in force whenever the aforesaid treaty, providing for the cession of said territories to the United States, shall have been ratified by the King of Spain, and the ratifications exchanged, and the King of Spain shall be ready to surrender said territory to the United States, according to the provisions of said treaty.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act concerning the allowance of pensions upon a relinquishment of bounty lands.

Be it enacted, &c., That the second section of the act making further provision for military services during the late war, and for other purposes, approved April sixteenth, one thousand eight hundred and sixteen, and so much of the act to amend the same, approved March third, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, as relates to the subject of that section, shall be continued in force for the term of three years from and after the passing of this act: Provided, nevertheless, That no pension shall be granted under the said acts after the sixteenth day of April next, unless, at the time of relinquishing the bounty land, in the manner therein described, the children, for whose benefit the same may be granted, or one of them, shall be under sixteen years of age: And provided, also, That the pensions shall commence at the date of the relinquishments respectively.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act granting a donation of land to the State of Illinois, for the seat of government of said State.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be granted to the State of Illinois four sections of land, or contiguous quarter sections and fractions, not exceeding the quantity contained in four entire sections, for the purpose of fixing thereon the seat of government for the said State; which lands shall be selected in the manner provided in the thirtieth section of the schedule to the constitution of the said State: Provided, That such selection shall be made before the public sale of the adjoining public lands shall have taken place.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act authorizing the purchase of fire engines, and for building houses for the safekeeping of the same.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to cause to be purchased two fire engines, of the first class, with proper copper suction pipes, and six hundred feet of rivet leathern hose, for the purpose of protecting the public and other buildings in the city of Washington from fire.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States cause to be built two good and sufficient houses, for the safekeeping of the said engines; one to be located on the Capitol Hill, near the Capitol, and one near the President's house and public offices.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for defraying the expenses of the same, the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to continue in force an act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain, and the crowns of France and five-franc pieces.

Be it enacted, &c., That the gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal, of their present standard, shall be a legal tender in the payment of all debts, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains, or eighty-eight cents and eight-ninths per penny weight: the gold coins of France, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven and a half grains, or eighty-seven and a quarter cents per penny weight: the gold coins of Spain at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-eight and a half grains, or eighty-four cents per penny weight, until the first day of November next: and that, from and after that day, foreign gold coins shall cease to be a tender within the United States, for the payment of debts or demands.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act regulating the currency within the United States of the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain," passed on the twenty-ninth day of April, eighteen hundred and sixteen, as relates to foreign silver coins, shall be, and the same is hereby, continued in force for two years from and after the twenty-ninth day of April next, and no longer.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act providing for the correction of errors in making entries of land at the land offices.

Be it enacted, &c., That in every case of a purchaser of public lands, at private sale, having entered at the land office a tract different from that he intended to purchase, and being desirous of having the error in his entry corrected, he shall make his application for that purpose to the register of the land office; and if it shall appear, from testimony satisfactory to the register and receiver of public moneys, that an error in the entry has been made, and that the same was occasioned by original incorrect marks made by the surveyor, or by the obliteration or change of the original marks and numbers at the corners of the tract of land; or that it has in any otherwise arisen from mistake or error of the surveyor, or officers of the land office; the said register and receiver of public moneys shall report the case, with the testimony, and their opinion thereon, to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall have power to direct, if in his opinion it shall be proper, that the purchaser shall be at liberty to withdraw the entry so erroneously made, and that the moneys which had been paid, shall be applied in the purchase of other lands in the same district, or credited in the payment for other lands which shall have been purchased at the same office.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act concerning Invalid Pensions.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to place the following named persons on the pension list of invalid pensioners of the United States, who shall be entitled to and receive pensions, according to the rates, and commencing at the times, hereinafter mentioned; that is to say:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any pension granted by this act, or any other act hereafter to be passed, to any officer, soldier, or marine, who served in the Revolutionary war, shall cease and be discontinued, in case the individual to whom the same may be granted hath availed himself, or shall hereafter avail himself, of the provisions of an act, passed the eighteenth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war."

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all persons entitled to pensions in conformity with the provision of the act, entitled "An act to provide for persons disabled by known wounds during the Revolutionary war," passed April the eighteenth, eighteen hundred and six, and also, the fourth section of an act, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," passed the twenty-fifth of April, one thousand eight hundred and eight, may be placed on the pension list by the Secretary of War without reporting the same to Congress.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the island of New Orleans.

Be it enacted, &c., That all the claims to land founded on complete grants from the Spanish Government, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury by the commissioners from the districts east and west of Pearl river, appointed under the authority of an act, entitled "An act for ascertaining the titles and claims to lands in that part of Louisiana, which lies east of the river Mississippi and island of New Orleans," which are contained in the several reports of the commissioners, and which are, in the opinion of the commissioners, valid, agreeably to the laws, usages, and customs of the said Government, be, and the same are hereby, recognised as valid and complete titles, against any claim on the part of the United States, or right derived from the United States: And that all claims founded on British grants, contained in the said reports, which have been sold and conveyed according to the provisions of the treaty of peace between Great Britain and Spain, of the third of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, by which that part of Louisiana, lying east of the island of Orleans, was ceded to Spain, under the denomination of West Florida, or which were settled and cultivated by the person having the legal title therein, at the date of said treaty, are recognised as valid and complete titles against any claim on the part of the United States, or derived from the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted That all claims, reported as aforesaid, and contained in the several reports of the said commissioners, founded on any order of survey, requette, permission to settle, or any written evidence of claim, derived from the Spanish authorities, which ought, in the opinion of the commissioners, to be confirmed, and which, by the said reports, appear to be derived from the Spanish Government before the twentieth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and three, and the land claimed to have been cultivated and inhabited on or before that day, shall be confirmed in the same manner as if the title had been completed: Provided, That, in all such claims where the plat and certificate of survey made prior to the fifteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, under the authority of the Spanish Government, in pursuance of such claim, has not been filed with the said commissioners, such claim shall not be confirmed to any one person for more than twelve hundred and eighty acres; and that for all the other claims to land comprised in the reports aforesaid, and which ought, in the opinion of the commissioners, to be confirmed, the claimant to such lands shall be entitled to a grant therefor as a donation: Provided, That such grant, as a donation, shall not be made to any one person for more than twelve hundred and eighty acres; which confirmation of the said incomplete titles and grants of donations, hereby provided to be made, shall amount only to a relinquishment forever, on the part of the United States, of any claim whatever to the tract of land so confirmed or granted: And provided, also, That no such claim shall be confirmed to any person to whom the title to any tract of land shall have been recognised under the preceding provisions.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person, or his or her legal representative, whose claim is comprised in the lists or register of claims, reported by the said commissioners, and the persons embraced in the list of actual settlers, or their legal representatives, not having any written evidence of claim reported as aforesaid, shall, where it appears, by the said reports, or by the said lists, that the land claimed or settled on had been actually inhabited or cultivated, by such person or persons in whose rights he claims, on or before the fifteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, be entitled to a grant for the land so claimed, or settled on, as a donation: Provided, That not more than one tract shall be thus granted to any one person, and the same shall not contain more than six hundred and forty acres; and that no lands shall be thus granted which are claimed or recognised by the preceding sections of this act.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person comprised in the said list of actual settlers, not having any written evidence of claim to land in said districts, and who, on the twelfth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, shall have inhabited or cultivated a tract of land in either of the said districts, not claimed by virtue of either of the preceding sections of this act, shall be entitled to a preference, on becoming a purchaser, from the United States, of such tract of land, on the same terms and conditions, and at the same price, for which the other public lands are sold at private sale: Provided, That the first instalment of the purchase money shall be paid to the receiver of public moneys of the district within which the land lies, within two years after the opening of the land office for such district.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of adjusting the titles and claims to lands in the districts aforesaid, and for the disposal of the lands which may remain the property of the United States therein, a land office shall be established in each of the said districts, to be kept for the western district, at St. Helena Courthouse, and, for the eastern district, at Jackson Courthouse; and a register and receiver of public moneys shall be appointed for each of the said land offices, who shall give security in the same manner, and in the same sums, and whose compensation, duties, and authority, shall, in every respect, be the same, in relation to the lands which shall hereafter be disposed of, at their respective offices, as are by law provided in relation to the other registers and receivers of public moneys for the several land offices of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person or persons, claiming lands in either of the said districts, whose claims have not heretofore been filed with the commissioner of the land office, of the district wherein the lands lie, shall be allowed until the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, to deliver notices in writing, and the evidences of their claims, in the said districts, respectively, to the register of the land office at Jackson Courthouse and at St. Helena Courthouse; and the notices and evidences so delivered, within the time limited by this act, shall be recorded in the same manner, and on the payment of the same fees, as if the same had been delivered before the commissioners closed their said registers.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every person or persons, who had filed his or their notice of claims to land, within either of the said districts, with the commissioner of the land office, according to the former laws, but have not exhibited sufficient testimony in support of the same, and whose claim has not been recommended for confirmation, shall be allowed until the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, to deliver written evidence, or other testimony, in support of his or their claim, the notice of which had been filed as aforesaid, to the register of the land office at St. Helena, for lands lying in the district west of Pearl river, and to the register of the land office at Jackson Courthouse, for the lands lying in the district east of Pearl river; and the evidence of claims, the notice whereof had been filed, as aforesaid, for lands lying in the said district, delivered, within the time limited by this section, to the said registers, shall be recorded by them, respectively, in the same manner as was directed by former acts, on receiving the same fees allowed by said acts, for recording evidence of claims to lands in the same districts.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the register and receiver of public moneys of the said respective land offices, at Jackson Courthouse and at St. Helena Courthouse, shall have the same powers, and perform the same duties, in every respect, in relation to the claims that may be filed in virtue of the sixth section of this act, and in relation to the claims, the notices of which had been filed under former acts, as well as to the additional evidence which shall be adduced in support thereof, agreeably to the seventh section of this act, as the commissioners for the districts east and west of Pearl river would have had, or should have performed, if such notices had been filed, and such evidence adduced, before the said commissioners closed their registers.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the register of each of the said land offices, respectively, to make, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a report of all the claims filed with the register aforesaid, with the substance of the evidence in support thereof; and of the claims formerly filed, in support of which additional evidence shall have been received, with the substance of such evidence; and also their opinion, and such remarks respecting the claim as they may think proper to make; which report, together with a list of the claims, which, in the opinion of the register and receiver, ought to be confirmed, and also a list of actual settlers, prior to the passage of this act, noting the time of their respective settlements, shall be laid, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, before Congress, at their next session, for their determination thereon.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said registers and receivers shall, respectively, have power to appoint a clerk, who shall be a person capable of translating the French and Spanish languages, and who shall perform the duty of translator, when required by said registers and receivers; and each of the said registers and receivers shall be allowed, as a compensation for their services in relation to the said claims, at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars a year; and each of the clerks at the rate of one thousand dollars a year: Provided, That not more than eighteen months' compensation be thus allowed to the register, receiver, and clerk, for the district east of Pearl river; nor more than eighteen months' compensation be allowed to the register, receiver, and clerk, of the district west of Pearl river.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the surveyor for the lands south of the State of Tennessee shall, with the consent and approbation of the President of the United States, appoint a principal deputy surveyor for the lands within the said districts, who shall receive an annual salary of five hundred dollars, and, in addition thereto, the following fees; that is to say: for examining and recording the surveys executed by any of the deputies, at the rate of twenty-five cents for every mile of the boundary line of such survey; and for a certified copy of any plat of a survey in the office, twenty-five cents; and whose duty it shall be to survey, or cause to be surveyed, by his other deputies, the lands, the claims to which are confirmed, and that are directed to be granted as donations, where the same have not been already surveyed, and the lands which may be claimed by right of pre-emption, whenever directed by the register and receiver, and to execute such other surveys as may be necessary for the ascertainment of the lands, the title or claim to which is embraced in the report of the commissioners aforesaid. And the said principal deputy surveyor shall make out particular plats of the surveys directed by this act, which he shall return to the register of the proper district; and also, a general and connected plat, which he shall return to the surveyor of the lands south of the State of Tennessee; and the expense of surveying shall be paid by the United States: Provided, The same shall not exceed, in the whole, four dollars a mile, for every mile which shall be actually surveyed and marked.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the books of the former commissioners, in which the claims, and evidence of claims, are recorded, shall be lodged with the registers of the land office, for the respective districts; and the register and receiver of public moneys, in each respective district, shall have power to examine the claims recognized, confirmed, or provided to be granted, by the provisions of this act, as also, claims to the right of pre-emption; and they shall make out to each claimant, entitled, in their opinion, thereto, a certificate, according to the nature of the case, under such instructions as they may receive from the Commissioner of the General Land Office; and on presentation at the General Land Office of such certificate for a confirmed claim, or for a donation, according to the provisions of this act; and where it shall appear, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, that the certificate has been fairly obtained, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, then, and in that case, a patent shall be granted, in like manner as for other lands of the United States.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to appoint the register and receiver of public moneys for the said districts in the recess of the Senate, who shall be nominated to them at their next meeting.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act in addition to the acts prohibiting the Slave Trade.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to cause any of the armed vessels of the United States to be employed to cruise on any of the coasts of the United States, or Territories thereof, or of the coast of Africa, or elsewhere, where he may judge attempts may be made to carry on the slave trade by citizens or residents of the United States, in contravention of the acts of Congress prohibiting the same, and to instruct and direct the commanders of all armed vessels of the United States, to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, all ships or vessels of the United States, wheresoever found, which may have taken on board, or which may be intended for the purpose of taking on board, or of transporting, or may have transported, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, in violation of any of the provisions of the act, entitled "An act in addition to an act to prohibit the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eight, and to repeal certain parts of the same," or of any other act or acts prohibiting the traffic in slaves, to be proceeded against according to law. And the proceeds of all ships and vessels, their tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods and effects on board of them, which shall be so seized, prosecuted, and condemned, shall be divided equally between the United States and the officers and men who shall seize, take, or bring, the same into port for condemnation, whether such seizure be made by an armed vessel of the United States or revenue cutter thereof. And the same shall be distributed in like manner as is provided by law for the distribution of prizes taken from an enemy. Provided, That the officers and men, to be entitled to one half of the proceeds aforesaid, shall safe keep every negro, mulatto, or person of color, found on board of any ship or vessel so seized, taken, or brought into port, for condemnation, and shall deliver every such negro, mulatto, or person of color, to the marshal of the district in which they are brought, if into a port of the United States, or, if elsewhere, to such person or persons as shall be lawfully appointed by the President of the United States, in the manner hereinafter directed, transmitting to the President of the United States, as soon as may be after such delivery, a descriptive list of such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, that he may give directions for the disposal of them. And provided further, That the commanders of such commissioned vessels do cause to be apprehended, and taken into custody, every person found on board of such vessel, so seized and taken, being of the officers or crew thereof, and him or them convey, as soon as conveniently may be, to the civil authority of the United States, to be proceeded against, in due course of law, in some of the districts thereof.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, to make such regulations and arrangements, as he may deem expedient, for the safekeeping, support, and removal beyond the limits of the United States, of all such negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, as may be so delivered and brought within their jurisdiction; and to appoint a proper person or persons, residing upon the coast of Africa, as agent or agents for receiving the negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, delivered from on board vessels, seized in the prosecution of the slave trade, by commanders of the United States' armed vessels.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That a bounty of twenty-five dollars be paid to the officers and crews of the commissioned vessels of the United States, or revenue cutters, for each and every negro, mulatto, or person of color, who shall have been, as hereinbefore provided, delivered to the marshal or agent duly appointed to receive them: And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, to such officers and crews, or their agent, the aforesaid bounty, for each person delivered as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That when any citizen, or other person, shall lodge information with the attorney for the district of any State or Territory, as the case may be, that any negro, mulatto, or person of color, has been imported therein, contrary to the provisions of the acts in such case made and provided, it shall be the duty of the said attorney forthwith to commence a prosecution, by information; and process shall issue against the person charged with holding such negro, negroes, mulatto, mulattoes, person or persons of color, so alleged to be imported contrary to the provisions of the acts aforesaid: And if, upon the return of the process executed, it shall be ascertained, by the verdict of a jury, that such negro, negroes, mulatto, mulattoes, person or persons of color, have been brought in, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the acts in such cases made and provided, then the court shall direct the marshal of the said district to take the said negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, into his custody, for safekeeping, subject to the orders of the President of the United States: and the informer or informers, who shall have lodged the information, shall be entitled to receive, over and above the portion of the penalties accruing to him or them by the provisions of the acts in such case made and provided, a bounty of fifty dollars, for each and every negro, mulatto, or person of color, who shall have been delivered into the custody of the marshal; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to pay, or cause to be paid, the aforesaid bounty, upon the certificate of the clerk of the court for the district where the prosecution may have been had, with the seal of office thereto annexed, stating the number of negroes, mulattoes, or persons of color, so delivered.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the commander of any armed vessel of the United States, whenever he shall make any capture under the provisions of this act, to bring the vessel and her cargo, for adjudication, into some of the ports of the State or Territory to which such vessel, so captured, shall belong, if he can ascertain the same; if not, then to be sent into any convenient port of the United States.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all such acts, or parts of acts, as may be repugnant to the provisions of this act, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That a sum not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to carry this law into effect.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

An Act to authorize the building, erecting, and placing light-houses, beacons, and buoys, on places designated in Boston, Buzzard, and Chesapeake Bays, Lakes Ontario and Erie, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide, by contract, which shall be approved by the President of the United States, for building light-houses, erecting beacons or landmarks, and placing light vessels or boats, on the following sites or shoals, to wit:

A light-house on Long Island Head, and a beacon or landmark on Half-way Rock, in Boston Bay; and also a light-house on Bird's Island, in Buzzard's Bay, in the State of Massachusetts.

A light-house on Galloo Island, near the outlet of Lake Ontario, in the State of New York.

A light-house, at a proper place, at or between the mouth of Grand River, in the State of Ohio, and the mouth of Detroit River, in the Territory of Michigan.

Three light-houses, on the following sites: one on the Bodkin, one on North Point, and one on Sparrow's Point, in the State of Maryland.

A light-house on Windmill Point, at the mouth of Rappahannock river, or a light vessel or boat on the Wolf-trap shoals, if the latter shall be deemed preferable to a light-house on Windmill Point; a light-house on Craney Island, at the mouth of Elizabeth river, and a light vessel, or boat, on Willoughby's Spit, between Lynnhaven Bay and Hampton Roads, in the State of Virginia: And a beacon, or landmark, on Wolf Island, near the port of Darien, in the State of Georgia.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause three buoys to be placed in such manner as to mark out the channel leading into the harbor of Boston, and one buoy to be placed on West Island Ledge, in Buzzard's Bay; a spindle, or buoy, on the outer rock of the reef running from Cochney's Island to Eastern Norwalk Island; another spindle, or buoy, on the reef running about southwest from the western point of the Western Norwalk Island; and a spindle on the rock off the point of Fairweather Island, in the State of Connecticut: And twenty buoys in the Chesapeake Bay, and Patapsco river, for designating the shoals and channel, in the State of Maryland.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a pier to be carried out to nine feet water, at the light-house heretofore authorized to be erected at the mouth of the Mississippi; and, also, that he cause the present wood tower, at the Seguin light-house, in the State of Massachusetts, to be replaced with one of stone.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States, not otherwise appropriated, the following sums of money, to accomplish the purposes heretofore enumerated in this act, to wit: For the erection and establishment of light-houses on Long Island Head, on Bird's Island, and a beacon or landmark on Half-way Rock, eleven thousand five hundred dollars: For a light-house on Galloo Island, near the outlet of Lake Ontario, twelve thousand five hundred dollars: For a light-house, at a proper place, at or between the mouth of Grand river and Detroit river, five thousand dollars: For three light-houses, one on the Bodkin, one on North Point, and one on Sparrow's Point, in the Chesapeake Bay, and on the Patapsco river, nine thousand dollars: For a light-house on Windmill Point, or light vessel or boat on the Wolf-trap shoals, a light vessel or boat on Willoughby's Spit, between Lynnhaven Bay and Hampton Roads, and a light-house on Craney Island, at the mouth of Elizabeth river, twelve thousand dollars: For three buoys, to mark out the channel leading into Boston harbor, and for one to be placed on West Island Ledge, in Buzzard's Bay, sixteen hundred dollars: For the spindles or buoys on the reef running from Cochney's Island; for that on the reef running about southwest from the western point of the Western Norwalk's Island, and for that on the rock off the point of Fairweather Island, twelve hundred dollars: For twenty buoys, to be placed in the Chesapeake Bay and Patapsco river, eight thousand dollars: For the pier to be carried out from the light-house at the mouth of the Mississippi, four thousand dollars; and for replacing the tower at the Seguin light-house, twenty-five hundred dollars; and for a beacon or landmark on Wolf Island, near the port of Darien, in the State of Georgia, one thousand dollars.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, to make up the deficiencies of the appropriations heretofore made, for the purposes following, the several sums, respectively named, be, and they are hereby, appropriated, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to wit: To pay for the land, and erecting the light-house, at Holmes's Hole, sixty-three dollars: For erecting a light-house on the south point of Sapelo Island, two thousand five hundred and five dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of three thousand and twenty-seven dollars be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to the sums heretofore appropriated, to pay the salaries to the several keepers of the light-houses within the United States; to be applied, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to fix the annual salary of each keeper aforesaid, at the rate of three hundred and fifty dollars per annum.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, in case he shall deem it expedient and proper, may cause the light-house heretofore authorized to be erected on the south point of Sapelo Island, to be changed to, and placed on, Wolf's Island.

Approved, March 3, 1819

An Act to repeal part of an passed on the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act regulating the Post Office Establishment.'"

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the last clause of the "Act in addition to 'An act regulating the Post Office Establishment,'" passed the twenty-seventh day of February, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, as contains these words, being the concluding words of the clause, namely: "And that such contracts shall secure the regular transportation of the mail throughout the year;" be, and the same is hereby, annulled and repealed.

Approved, March 3, 1819.

RESOLUTIONS.

Resolution declaring the admission of the State of Illinois into the Union.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress, passed on the eighteenth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," the people of said Territory did, on the twenty-sixth day of August, in the present year, by a convention called for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government, so formed, is republican, and in conformity to the principles of the articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the territory northwest of the river Ohio, passed on the thirteenth day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven: Resolved by the Sen-

Resolved, &c., That the Members of Congress, the Delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, authorized, to transmit, free of postage, to any post office within the United States, or the Territories thereof, the documents accompanying the report of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to examine into the proceedings of the Bank of the United States.

Approved, February 15, 1819.

Resolutions directing the manner in which the printing of Congress shall be executed, fixing the prices thereof, and providing for the appointment of a printer or printers.

Resolved, &c., That the printing of Congress, unless when otherwise specially ordered, shall be done in the following form and manner, viz:

Bills, as heretofore, with English type, on foolscap paper. Rule or table-work, in royal octavo size, where it can be brought into that size, by any type not smaller than brevier; and where it cannot, in such form as to fold conveniently into the volume. All other printing with a small pica type, on royal paper, in pages of the same size as those of the last edition of the laws of the United States, including the marginal notes.

And the following prices shall be allowed and paid for the above described work: For the composition of every page of bills, one dollar; of every page of small pica, plain work, one dollar; of every page of small pica, rule-work, two dollars; every page of brevier, rule-work, three dollars and fifty cents; and for a larger form of brevier rule-work, in proportion.

For the press-work of bills, including paper, folding, and stitching—for fifty copies, twenty-five cents per page; for four hundred copies, one dollar and twenty-five cents per page; for the press-work of tables, other than those in the regular octavo form, for six hundred copies, including as above, five dollars and fifty cents, per form; for the press-work of the Journals, of nine hundred copies, including as above, one dollar per page; for all other printing, in the octavo form, of six hundred copies, including as above, eighty-seven and a half cents per page; and for a larger or smaller number, in proportion.

That, as soon as this resolution shall have been approved by the President of the United States, each House shall proceed to ballot for a printer, to execute its work during the next Congress; and the person having the greater number of votes shall be considered duly elected, and shall give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the
